"—it is difficult, perhaps impossible, for even an experienced physician to distinguish a case of arsenical poisoning from cholera infantum, the symptoms being so similar. How many children have been poisoned from these fly poisons, amid the deaths ascribed to cholera infantum, can never be known."

Mothers who have intuitively avoided fly poisons, now have their good judgment complimented by these actual facts. The danger is even greater than most of them knew.

"Arsenical fly-destroying devices are as dangerous as the phosphorus match. They should be abolished. There are as efficient and more sanitary ways of catching or killing flies, and fly poisons, if used at all, should not be used in homes where there are children, or where children visit."

SHE QUIT

But It Was a Hard Pull.

It is hard to believe that coffee will put a person in such a condition as it did an Ohio woman. She tells her own story:

"I did not believe coffee caused my trouble, and frequently said I liked it so well I would not, and could not, quit drinking it, but I was a miserable sufferer from heart trouble and nervous prostration for four years.

"I was scarcely able to be around, had no energy and did not care for anything. Was emaciated and had a constant pain around my heart until I thought I could not endure it.

"Frequently I had nervous chills and the least excitement would drive sleep away, and any little noise would upset me terribly. I was gradually getting worse until finally I asked myself what's the use of being sick all the time and buying medicine so that I could indulge myself in coffee?

"So I got some Postum to help me quit. I made it strictly according to directions and I want to tell you that change was the greatest step in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I now like Postum better than the coffee.

"One by one of the old troubles left until now I am in splendid health, nerves steady, heart all right and the pain all gone. Never have any more nervous chills, don't take any medicine, can do all my house work and have done a great deal beside."

DAVID, THE SHEPHERD OF ISRAEL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 27.
(READ PS. 78: 65-72)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"I myself will be the shepherd of my sheep." Ezek. 34: 15.

Christ's sheep shall never perish. They may wander far from him, lose all joy and comfort, fall under the rebuke of men, and seem to live under a cloud; but if they are real, his honor is pledged to seek them out in the cloudy and dark day, and bring them back to himself. His body cannot be dismembered; he cannot forfeit what has cost him tears and blood. He would rather lose his throne than one of his sheep; for the lion of the tribe of Judah would glory over him; and it would blemish his escutcheon, had he failed in one item of his great program. You may be a very lame, timid, and worthless sheep; but you were purchased by the Shepherd's blood, because he loved you so. There is not a wild beast in the world that he has not vanquished; there is no fear, therefore, of his ability, as there is none of his love. He will deliver you from the lion and the bear, and bring you in triumph to the fold, with all the rest. If he has to carry you on his shoulders he will do it, rejoicing. Therefore, and change wear out all things else, but it cannot impair or alter the love and truth of Christ for those whom the Father has entrusted to his care.

The Shepherd and His Under Shepherds

By Amos R. Wells

THE subject the lesson committee has chosen for this review is a significant one: "David, the Shepherd of Israel." The entire three months have been a series of studies in the shepherding of a people. That is what national life is for—to guard the sheep from harm, and to lead them to green pastures and beside the still waters.

Not that the people of a nation are to be like "silly sheep." They are not to go bleating blindly after their leaders. In early days that was more or less true, of necessity, but not in these days of universal education. Always, however, it is true of the divine Shepherd that he shall lead his people "like a flock." He knows so much more than the wisest of earthly shepherds that in comparison the greatest human leaders are but as sheep.

The lovely Twenty-third Psalm is the best expression in all literature of the thought of divine guidance, but in individual rather than national life. It is deeply interesting to trace through these twelve lessons and those that are to come the thought of the heavenly shepherding in national life also.

When Saul, after the defeat of the Amalekites, saved the best of the sheep and other animals with the king, he allowed his individual greed and pride to override the best interests of his kingdom; he was not a true shepherd. Samuel thought only of the people, never of himself, and in his eyes Saul's selfishness amounted to an abdication of the throne. How sternly, if Samuel were living now, would he rebuke all self-seeking in high places, all twisting of policy to get votes, all graft, however respectable, and all official vain-glory!

Thus it was profoundly significant that Samuel was led, in his choice of a successor to Saul, toward a family of shepherds, and that his selection was not of a giant like Saul, but of a tender, poetic shepherd lad. It was the wise old thought, "A little child shall lead them." It was the Master's thought, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom." The child's humility as against Saul's arrogance, the child's teachableness as against Saul's wilfulness, the child's courage and innocence and friendliness and truth—these are still the prime necessities for success in ruling men. We sometimes find still the public official of the bludgeon type or the sponge type; but they do not last long, though they work much harm while they do last.

That true shepherding does not mean weakness or cowardice is illustrated in David's fight with Goliath. He used the shepherd's weapon, the sling, and with it put to flight a foe that even Saul had not dared to meet. It is so with the giant enemies of our civilization: war, and strong drink, and licentiousness, and infidelity. They are to be met and conquered by the David methods. Mothers and wives will subdue them, and those that honor mothers and wives. The shepherd thought will overcome them; the fact that we are our brothers' keepers, at national boundaries merely conventional and comfortable folds. Our present bristling and selfish conception of nations is as far from this conception of David's as hell is from heaven.

The friendship of David and Nathan illustrates the fellowship that is necessary for the shepherding of a people. What a duumvirate the world would have made! What a president and vice-president, and neither would have cared which held the higher office. It is never possible for one alone to govern many people. The wisest ruler, the larger is the number of assistants and councilors he summons to aid him. Friendship and co-operation are the basis of all undertakings of amount to much.

When David brought the ark to Jerusalem, he showed by his rejoicing and the prominence he gave the ark his belief that he was only an under shepherd, and that Jehovah was the great Shepherd of Israel. So it should be with all that control or direct others, from the mother and father in the home, through the public school and Sunday school teachers, and the men in charge of clerks and clerical workers, up to the mightiest president and emperor. It is only as we feel that we are responsible to the great Head Shepherd that we can shepherd any flock, however small.

Alas that David, the shepherd of Israel, should have led one of his sheep so far astray, and have even in another! Was ever a shepherd so fallen from his noble task? Yet even he was forgiven and reinstated, for all time to come a proof and example of the divine mercy.

Toward the Goal

By Arthur H. Howland

LIBERTY—fraternity—equality. These were the watchwords of the French Revolution. If the people had added one more word—piety—the revolution might not have collapsed so completely and the final replica would have been far more perfect.

We can trace human development by the progress made in these four points. For the senior and all grades, a review of the lessons of the quarter just closing may take the form of a study of the development of the period covered by these lessons in these four great points. What did these years of Jewish history contribute to the whole forward movement of mankind? In some respects we may find that they set back the movement; in others that they advanced it.

Liberty. The cause of liberty as both set backward and set forward. It was set backward because the monarchical system is fundamentally opposed to the principle of personal liberty. We do not know all that Samuel meant by his impassioned pleadings with Israel not to insist on having a king, and his stinging rebuke when they had decided to do so.

it may be that he was urging them to a truer democracy and trying to lead them in a path that would have been more directly and far quicker to complete and universal liberty. But the organization of the kingdom also had, indirectly, the cause of liberty. Mankind naturally inclines toward self-interest. A man's thoughts center in himself and family. Now the broader group can be made in which man's interests revolve the farther he has gone on the road to social perfection. Family life is better than single life; so interest in tribe is better than interest in family; so interest in national welfare, even though that nation be a kingdom, is better than interest in a tribe. A kingdom, with its accompaniments of pride and patriotism and loyalty, means that broader interest. And in the evolution of society toward its final goal of liberty and brotherhood, the kingdom seems after all to have been a necessary step. Make a man intensely interested in his own nation; then by some higher appeal make him break down the national limits and boundaries and extend his interest to all the world—and we have real progress toward the ideal civilization.

Certainly David's career did that thing for the Jews. It made them a self nation. It stimulated love for country so that the Jewish citizens could say with their national poet, "I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning." There is no doubt that the Jews learned the lesson of patriotism. God's plan was that this patriotism was to be expanded by the teachings and example and power of Jesus, till it should embrace all mankind.

And that development toward liberty was also the development toward brotherhood. The Jews became in unique fashion the brothers of one another. The great head of their race Jesus, was to urge them to become brothers of all.

Equality. That, too, is linked up with liberty and fraternity. Justice for every man—a just and fair opportunity to every man to develop his own life to its fullest perfection and usefulness. The organization of a powerful and successful kingdom guaranteed the right of all to just treatment. So long as a judge like Samuel was in charge of the courts Israel's people had a chance for fair treatment. But with his passing, there came disintegration and anarchy. David's organization of the kingdom gave every man a fairer and wider opportunity. Later kings robbed the people of these rights, but David's kingdom was a firm step toward justice and equality.

Equality. This was David's greatest contribution to civilization. Through and through his nature there was the thought of God. God was to be King; God was to be Shepherd; the people were to find peace and safety and prosperity as they followed God. They must be a worshipful people. David longed to build the temple for Jehovah, and though it was his son who built it instead, the stamp of David's character and experience, his songs and prayers upon the people made them religious, made them ready to worship God, ready—all too falteringly and imperfectly and inefficiently—to obey him.

Nor must we forget that David's kingdom and David's family were the human channels through which at last the Messiah came—mankind's great Emancipator, mankind's great Prince of Brotherhood, mankind's great Leader toward life's highest opportunities, mankind's great Guide into the presence and into the joys of God.

Echoes from the Holy Land

DAVID, the shepherd of Israel. David easily occupies the central place in Old Testament history, as David's greater Son occupies the central place in all history, human and divine. David lived about half between Abraham and Christ, distant from each about one thousand years. After three thousand years he is revered as a saint and man of God by three great religions of the earth: Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism. The name David is an extreme favorite in Jewish, Christian and Moslem families, and invariably David's first-born son is called Solomon. "Ala Daoud" father of David, "Im Daoud"—mother of David, and "Daoud" David with "Ala, Solomon"—father of Solomon, "Im Suleiman"—mother of Solomon, and "Suleiman"—Solomon, may be said to designate a larger number of individuals than any other ten names combined. Their total number would reach hundreds of thousands in Syria alone.

David lived at the point in human history where the ancient fear of God was for the first time passing over into the love of God, and the hinge, as it were, on which the larger faith and idea turned was the person and life and service of the shepherd. It is almost the oldest occupation of the human race, and one which kept the people close to the stars, the midnight sky, the gentle winds, the raging storms, the sunrise, the quiet waters and the green meadows of human existence. David, the shepherd boy, was led by God's providence through the whole round of human conditions from the shepherd to the throne, and given freedom to voice in psalm, song and poetic lyric of the human soul, the longings of man's utter dependence on God, and God's loving care for the weak, the helpless, the distressed, the distressed, all in shepherd language of such unparallelled tenderness that it has never been matched, much less surpassed.

Israel was God's flock, and David, his servant, was the shepherd. When David's greater Son came to carry forth the greater revelation of God's love, he flung new light and meaning into every phase of shepherd life, the shepherd psalms, the shepherd music, but he changed nothing and is today the Shepherd of the sky—the Shepherd of our souls.

God's tender shepherd love for the small, the weak, the helpless, reveals itself in human love, for never yet was a little child born to human mother who was not that mother's "little lamb." It follows us into eternity, and who dare even suggest what lies behind those scenes in Revelation before "the throne of God and the Lamb?"

THE "JESUS ONLY" GIRL

SHE came to us, poor Nellie, in a terrible condition. Her beauty of countenance and wilfulness of character had proved her ruin. Shortly after entering upon a fearful career, these of morphine and opium was resorted to.

For months we labored with her, calling continually upon divine strength, guidance and love. Our efforts were magnificently rewarded, and we had the great joy of seeing a submissive spirit late asserting itself and a true yielding Christ. Later upon obtaining a position in a quiet country town with a loved person, one evening she was asked concerning the denomination of the poor of Hope. With some apparent confusion, not even understanding the meaning of such a word, and yet not desiring to display her ignorance, she quietly answered "We never heard of any denominations there."

"Ah, perhaps not," replied her mistress "but you attended some church, didn't you, dear?"

Quickly Nellie informed her that the girl always attended church, adding: "It is just a lovely church, too."

With a smile her employer then inquired if it was a Baptist, Methodist or Presbyterian one. The light dawned upon Nellie, and she said: "Oh, I know now what you mean. Why, the church we went to was down town, and over the pulpit there hung a banner. Oh, ma'am, though, you just ought to have seen it, it was just a beauty of a banner, and on it was in big letters so all could read, 'Jesus Only.' I guess, ma'am, it was a 'Jesus Only' church."

For days afterward when going out on errands (as the incident became known throughout that little village) she was pointed out as that "Jesus Only" girl, and in this way God used her to advertise the fact as well as the thought that the church of all denominations should be indeed "Jesus Only." Nellie married a year or two later, and I have had the pleasure of more than once visiting that happy home, and with gratitude we cannot but exclaim together: "Behold what God hath wrought!" and take courage and go on.

GOODYEAR CORD TIRES

An 11-Year Attainment

The Cord Tire itself is not new. The newness lies in the Goodyear perfections. The English-French type, brought out years ago, never attained great vogue. Its virtues were dimmed by too many shortcomings, including high cost per mile.

But, starting with that, we have for 11 years been constantly working on Cord Tires. This type of construction is rather expensive. So Cord Tires, in cost per tire, exceed other types somewhat. Our aim has been to make extra mileage offset that higher cost.

Multiplying Mileage

Goodyear Cord Tires, to this end, are built greatly oversize. We increased the air capacity by 30 per cent over other cord tires. That, according to accepted formula, adds 75 per cent to the life.

Goodyear Cord Tires have from 6 to 10 cord layers. Our 4-inch Cord Tire is an 8-ply tire. Our larger sizes are 10-ply. That means extreme reinforcement. Goodyear Cord Tires have our No-Rim-Cut feature, which combats a major waste.

These three great improvements—each exclusive to Goodyear—have multiplied Cord Tire mileage. Yet they sacrifice no iota of resiliency or comfort. And they add no extra price. Goodyear Cord Tires cost about the same as others of this type.

Then, to make them utterly secure, we vulcanize 126 braided piano wires into each tire base. Goodyear Cord Tires need no hooks on the base—those hooks which "freeze" into the rim flange. To prevent skidding, we offer the All-Weather tread, tough and double-thick, with resistless grips. Also, we retain the Ribbed tread, always so popular with foreign makers. Those are some Goodyear supremacies.

Cord Tire Virtues

Goodyear Cord Tires are tires of super-comfort. They are wondrous shock-absorbers. Never was a Cord Tire more resilient. Never was one better adapted to minimize trouble, give unusual mileage, increase speed and save power.

On electric cars, Cord Tires have long been the only advised pneumatics. Ease and comfort were most appealing there, and power-saving was of prime importance.

Now, with Goodyear improvements, many gasoline car owners are adopting these comfort tires.

When you come to Cord Tires insist on the Goodyear perfections. In them will lie this type's permanent popularity.

Most electric car makers supply Goodyear Cord Tires on request. Most gasoline car makers who do not equip with them will supply them at a little added price. Any Goodyear dealer can get them for you. Any Goodyear branch—in 65 cities—will direct you to a stock.

Questions and Answers

Anxious Reader. Does a Christian ever have evil desires? For instance, a certain occasion arises and one does or says something, thinking that the acts or words are not pleasing to God, yet persisting in the speech or action begun. One feels grieved at having disobeyed, yet knows that if the occasion arose again one would do the same thing. Can one be a Christian and feel this way?

The word "desires" hardly covers the problem you have presented. It deals not so much with desires as with the question of love or good feeling toward another, or the lack of such good feeling. In discussing these problems it helps us to remember Jesus' summary of the law: "Thou shalt love God; thou shalt love thy neighbor," and Paul's statement: "Love is the fulfilling of the law." Whenever we have an unloving or unkind feeling toward another we have sinned. Whenever we are indifferent as to whether or not an act pleases God, particularly when we persist in an action after we know it to be displeasing to God, we have sinned. The Scriptures teach very clearly that God, through Christ, provides a grace which will keep our hearts kind and loving all the time and will keep alive there the sense of our love to God. Of course, when another commits an act that is hurtful to ourselves or to others, there can be displeasure at the act, there can even be indignation; but in the perfect Christian the very displeasure or indignation would be connected in some way with love. This was the case with the anger of Jesus; he was angry that people were trying to thwart his works of love. In the special circumstances your letter describes it may be that you were justly indignant, and unless you were positive that the rebuke administered was displeasing to God and lacked love, there may have been no sin. But, as stated before, there is sin the moment one persists in an action while believing that it is displeasing to God. A person may be a Christian and still have such lapses, but he may also press on to a higher Christian state in which the soul is so filled with love that such lapses do not occur.

E. C. B., Monroe, Wis. 1. The verses you mention are not in our collection. 2. The infidel argument is a quibble and unworthy of attention. 3. The passage in I Cor. 15: 20, which mentions "first-fruits," means that it was an earnest or pledge that the whole resurrection harvest would follow. 4. Rev. 1: 5 refers to the "first begotten of the dead." (See Col. 1: 18.) Lazarus was raised, but only to die again; whereas Christ rose nevermore to taste death. His resurrection is regarded by the whole of his church as the event which fulfilled the Scripture. (See Psalm 2.) "This day have I begotten thee." It was the complete attestation of his divine Sonship as the God-man, and our resurrection, which will manifest our sonship, is connected with it. The cases of Moses, Enoch and Elijah do not come under the Gospel dispensation, and consequently Paul did not mention them in this connection. When Jesus came into the world, he brought with him the new revelation of life and immortality for all who would believe on him and accept him as the world's Saviour. In all ages, God has had his witnesses; but it was not until the Gospel revelation came through his Son that his plan for the salvation of men was clearly known and understood.

M. M. S. According to most orthodox churches a person to be saved must believe in the divine inspiration of the Bible, especially the Biblical account of creation and the fall of man. Now what is a person to do who cannot make this harmonize with a scientific education? Must he just shut his eyes to all scientific teaching and blindly cling to the story when his better judgment says it cannot be a fact?

You have not stated the situation quite accurately, and your suggested solution is hardly satisfactory. We do not know of any denomination at one which would insist that its members regard as inspired every paragraph of our present version of the Bible. For instance, one or two passages of the Authorized Version are omitted in the American Revision and one or two more are indicated as having been omitted from the earliest manuscripts. Under such circumstances it would hardly be fair for any church (except the Catholic) to excommunicate a person who found it difficult to accept one or two more paragraphs of the present version. The new emphasis in regard to the Bible is that it is not a text-book of science, or geography, or history—but of salvation. It shows how God has dealt with the souls of men in the past and promises that he will do even greater things for those who will trust him now. It gets us acquainted with Christ as Saviour and Friend and shows how we may live in his companionship and service. But again, we must not be too sure of our own scientific knowledge. Science is constantly being compelled to shift its position. The most scholarly attitude is that of the greatest humility. It is never necessary to violate one's "better judgment," but it is necessary, in order to find salvation, to be humble and reverent and to be willing to receive into one's soul the light and truth of the Holy Spirit.

J. H. R., Riverbank, Calif., writes: The San Francisco Bulletin says 'Old Sol is a poor time-keeper. Twenty-four hours shy on each year, says an astronomer.' Is this correct?"

This expression is one among many that are used by unscientific people, caught up, doubtless, from some "old saying" of the long ago. The sun is never "shy a day," nor a minute. The earth has some slight irregularities, caused by the influence of other planets; but these are so well settled that they are taken into account by mathematicians. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

P. E. B., Stirling, Ohio. War is an evil which has afflicted the world since the beginning of recorded history. But all wars may not be evil in the same degree. Thus, a war in opposition to ruthless aggression, which calls on us to defend our homes and hearths and dear ones, is everywhere regarded as the most justifiable. There are many wars recorded in the Old Testament books, a number of which are largely devoted to Jewish history. Indeed, the whole subject of war bears a different aspect in the Old Testament from that in which it is given in the New Testament. Under the Gospel dispensation, all war is regarded as the product of the world's wickedness; yet it is clearly implied that war will continue to the very end of the dispensation. It has often been said that if the good people had strong enough faith, there would be no war, but this is practically equivalent to saying that if all the world were righteous there would be no wickedness on earth, and consequently none of the results of wickedness.

Mrs. H. S. L., Denver, Colo., asks if any of our readers can complete the following lines, which put the books of the Bible into rhyme:

The great Jehovah speaks to us
Through Genesis and Exodus.
Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy.
Joshua and Judges rule the land.
Ruth glean a sheaf with trembling hand.

I. H. G., South Portland, Me. 1. That God visits upon a nation the sins against his law of which it has been guilty is proved by history, both sacred and profane. 2. The passage in Matt. 26: 28 is interpreted to mean that all of those who sat at the table should partake of the cup, which was to be their last as well as his, "until the kingdom of God shall come." It was a point of transition between two economies; or, as one commentator expresses it, "the dividing line between two great festivals, one about to close forever, the other immediately to open and run its majestic career until it should be transferred from earth to heaven."

Justly Proud of Her Father. Whittier, Calif., January 23, 1915. Christian Herald: Upon reading your little article about the work of Mr. E. A. Eggers in getting Sunday next for post office employees, I thought I would tell you of a case that has few equals. My father, Mr. C. E. Hodgman, now residing in Grand Rapids, Mich., has been working for Uncle Sam in the Post Office Department and railway mail service for over 53 years. He started at the age of sixteen, soon after the war broke out. In all he has traveled nearly two and one-half million miles, or enough to have gone around the globe nearly 100 times.—Mrs. C.

A Wife, Nebraska. Is it in accordance with God's will that one should refuse to go to church because there are those in the choir and other honorable positions who do not live right, but seem to use the church as a cloak to cover up their sinfulness? Is it not encouraging them in their deceitfulness and is it not better to show one's disapproval by staying at home?

If this theory had been correct Peter and John would have left the group of apostles because Judas was a member of the group. They were there not for the sake of associating with Judas, but for the sake of associating with Jesus. They could get the benefit of the words of Jesus; they could receive the power of his presence for their own spiritual needs and for the work they had to do; they could help him in his work and help other people, as they went about with him and for him; they could derive help from the characters and experiences of the faithful disciples. Judas could not hinder or lessen any of these things by his own unfaithfulness. Now your problem is precisely the same. You can find Jesus in your church; you can worship him and enjoy his friendship there; you can help others and by your faithfulness and earnestness can help him. By standing for all that is right and noble and pure; by being firm in declaring that those who are not true should not be advanced to positions of responsibility; by trying in every way to be like Christ and to help others to be like him you can and honor him in any church. Paul's statement in I Cor. 5: 11 certainly does not mean that good members should leave the church rather than keep company with evil members that they should not contenance their evil by personal, social intimacy.

H. Y., Tascara, Pa. The passage in Matt. 5: 22 sets forth the divine retribution against offenders who violate the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill." The "judgment" was the award for causeless anger, and the "Council," or Sanhedrin, the condemnation for calling a brother brainless. These are degrees of temporal punishment; but the deeper offense—the bitter hatred of a brother that is expressed in the last degree, there shall be divine retribution. Commentators hold that in this and the preceding verse Jesus had in mind the Jewish tribunals, and that the passage which has been translated "hell fire" was an allusion to the valley of Hinnom, where what was worthless and impure was cast to be consumed by a continual fire. So those who elude bitter hatred in their hearts were in danger of being irretrievably cast away as worthless.

Reader, Millington, Md. The word "day" in Genesis has been a prolific subject of discussion. "It is impossible," writes one distinguished commentator, "in the absence of all data to ascertain the length of the first day which transpired before the sun was visible." The word employed by Moses does not serve to mark the duration in the presence of light. The first acts of the creative work, it designates intervals whose duration is undefined."

M. R., Kendrick, Idaho. The first and most important council of Nice assembled in the city A.D. 325. Its most important act was the settlement of the controversy between the orthodox wing and the Arians, giving the church the positive statement of belief in the deity of Christ and the doctrine of the Trinity.

L., Wyoming, Pa. The seven sons of Jesse were Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah, Netanel, Raddai, Ozem and David. Jerome, in one of his early writings, says that the prophet Nathan or Jonathan was reckoned as one of the sons of Jesse (the eighth), that is, as a member of the patriarch's household and entitled to the privileges of sonship.

H. P., Weldon Springs, Mo. If you think it impossible to make restitution (seeing that the matter happened some years ago) you can, if you so desired, make a conscience offering to the Lord's work of a sum equal to the amount involved. Of course, if an opportunity arose later through finding the parties, you could settle with them direct. This double restitution would be no hardship.

C. O. H., Palmyra, Ill. You ask, Does God permit evil that good may result from it? He permits evil, or removes the restraint of the Spirit from evil-doers who are flagrant and persistent, is shown by many instances in Scripture and even in modern history. If we accept as true the Scripture statement that God "loves the wrath of man to praise him," we have no reason to doubt that he many times overrules the evil acts of men for ultimate good.

Mrs. O. T., Canute, Okla. 1. The passage in I Peter 4: 6 has been variously interpreted. It is generally believed to have reference to the well-known passage in the preceding chapter (verses 19, 20), which is mentioned by no other writer, and which is generally regarded as meaning simply the proclamation of the first Gospel. 2. In Rom. 5: 14 the apostle uses that death came upon all as a consequence of Adam's transgression; it was a penalty that involved the whole race. The verse should be read in connection with verse 15. This, of course, referred to a period before the law—although (verse 13) "sin is not imputed when there is no law."

Mrs. T. H. W., Hillsville, Va. Sin is sin and righteousness is righteousness, in whatever age of the world we find them. But while this great principle holds, there are modifying influences to be taken into account. Thus, in a barbaric or semi-barbaric age, when the people were unenlightened, sin, while it might abound, would be less heinous, in some cases at least, than the same sin happened in an age of enlightenment and spiritual progress. In the latter case it would be a sin against light and far less excusable. In David's day there were fewer many rude customs. The people of that day therefore should not be judged by present-day standards.

an outer ring of forts and batteries, in all twenty-one, which ring varies in distance from such center, from three to six miles.

Inside of this outer ring is another almost continuous line of fortifications, ten in all, surrounding the town and varying from one and one-half to two miles from the center, and inside of this again a continuous line of defenses immediately surrounding the town proper, like a wall. The town averages under a mile in breadth and about two in length, so that at points the second and inner line of defenses almost coincide.

On Friday, May 28, the fortified camp was completely surrounded, as regards that portion of it which lies to the west of the River San, and practically so on the eastern side of the river, and a general assault was begun. On Sunday evening the assailants took by storm three forts on the northwest of the outer ring of defenses and on Monday morning two others fell, thus making a breach. While these positions were being stormed, the celebrated 42-centimeter guns, which had won their spurs in the West, had been gotten into position, and Monday evening these began to bombard the inner fortifications. As a result, at 3:30 Thursday morning, June 3, the Austro-German forces took the inner fortifications and the city by storm, through the breaches their cannon had made. The losses on both sides are said to have been appalling, perhaps the heaviest of the war. The full details of the capture have not at this writing come to hand.

Farther to the southeast there was heavy fighting nearly all the week, on the line from Drobobyzo to Stryj, directly south of Lemberg. This culminated on May 31 by the capture of Stryj by the Austro-Germans, where they took 12,000 Russians, and the general retreat of the Russians north-eastward from this line. In extreme eastern Galicia, along the north bank of the River Pruth, there was intermittent skirmishing during the week, but no serious fighting.

The German general staff officially states the number of prisoners taken during the month of May in the Polish and Galician campaigns as over 300,000, which, if true, would indicate a total Russian casualty list during that month of over a million.

In South Poland combats occurred during the week northeast of Kielce, and there was some skirmishing along the Bzura River in front of Warsaw, but operations along this front were waiting the issue of the great Galician battle. Still farther north much the same quietness prevailed, there being the usual series of attacks and counter-attacks along the Dubysa River, and in Courland, near Shavli, there were some quite heavy cavalry actions.

My readers will remember the adventure of the Russian governor of Warsaw, who some time ago went out for a motor ride and ended the ride a German prisoner. The same thing happened to the German governor of Libau last week, who thought to take a motor ride out to the German advanced positions near Shavli, and who, during the ride, fell in with a patrol of Russian cavalry, who took him off to durance vile.

While these events were taking place in the east, Serbia for the first time in months showed some military activity, and a small detachment of her troops crossed the frontier into Bosnia and advanced a short distance into that province, subsequently retreating to near their own frontier again. This movement may be looked upon as in the character of a reconnoitering expedition, and possibly is the forerunner of active hostilities on this border.

The French had a successful week on the western line, continuing their advance on the line from Neuville, just north of Arras, to Richebourg l'Avone, the point where the battle

You know this trade-mark
through national periodical advertising

THE purpose of a trade-mark or trade name on goods is to identify them, so that the buyer may know the origin of the goods, may have a convenient means of getting the same goods a second time if he is pleased, or of fixing the responsibility for his disappointment if he finds the goods to be inferior.

"The purpose of national advertising is to make widely known the names and trade-marks of goods upon which the manufacturer places this stamp of his responsibility—this sign of his willingness to be judged by the quality of his goods. The trade-mark identifies the goods—advertising makes them known. The two things work together automatically for higher standards of quality."

It is obvious that when goods can be identified by the purchaser they are as easy to avoid a second time as they are to buy—therefore, second and subsequent sales will depend upon the satisfaction of the buyer with his first purchase.

Advertising reduces the cost of selling superior goods, because it introduces such goods to millions of new customers whose second and subsequent purchases more than pay for the cost of the introduction.

Advertising is death to inferior goods, because inferior goods do not make permanent customers.

Trade-marks and national advertising are the two greatest public servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while reducing prices and stabilizing them.

line begins to turn eastwardly towards Ypres.

L'Abaine and Souches fell completely into their hands, and very considerable ground was gained all along this line, particularly on the heights of Loretto. All of this movement, which has La Bassée and Lille as its ultimate objective, made such progress during the week that another week or so of similar success will bring the French within striking distance of their goal.

During May, on this line, the French state that they took over 3,200 prisoners. From this we can compute that the total German losses must have been 12,000 to 14,000. Still farther west on this line there was hard fighting between the British and the Germans at Hill No. 60 and at Château Hooze, a little to the north of this hill, in which fighting the British gained the upper hand.

Still farther west, the week was quieter in the vicinity of Ypres than for some time lately, though the town was bombarded a couple of times. The Germans say that the Canadians are the best troops which have been pitted against them at this point on the Western line; in fact, they praise their soldierly qualities highly. Farther west, there was some skirmishing near Nieuport with the Belgians.

In the center of the line there was some give-and-take fighting in Champagne, and also considerable artillery activity, Rheims being again bombarded, among other places. Quite stiff fighting again took place in the Le Prêtre forest between St. Mihiel and Pont-à-Mousson, in the region between the Meuse and Moselle, both sides seeming to attach much importance to the possession of this pie territory. In the Vosges there continual but unimportant fighting.

The submarines were quite active during the week and sank several at various points both in the Channel and in the North Sea. There also several air raids, of which the principal one was on London, but of this latter significant event the details are still unknown.

ON JUNE 4 the State Department at Washington received from ambassador Gerard at Berlin the text of a note from the German Government upon the submarine attack on the Gulfight, admitting and apologizing for the attack and offering reparation. The note contains the following explanation of the incident:

The note gives a detailed explanation of how the commander of the German submarine was led to believe that the Gulfight, convoyed as she was by two smaller vessels, was in the service of the British Government, and her real identity was not discovered until at the moment the shot was fired. "There can be no doubt," says the note, "according to the attendant circumstances, that the attack is to be attributed to an unfortunate accident, and not to the fault of the commander. The German Government expresses its regrets to the Government of the United States concerning this incident, and declares itself ready to furnish full recompense for the damage thereby sustained by American citizens." The note also asks for further information regarding the American ship Cushing.

PRESIDENT'S WARNING TO MEXICO

THE conditions in Mexico, especially the suffering caused the non-combatants, has at last struck fire in Washington. On June 2 President Wilson caused a warning note to be telegraphed to the leaders of the several factions, in which he reviewed the two years' revolution and its failure to accomplish any decisive thing, and referred to the devastated condition of the country and consequent suffering of the population, and to the lack of governmental protection. "In these circumstances the people and Government of the United States cannot stand indifferently by and do nothing to serve their neighbor," declared the President; and in defining our attitude as one of friendly helpfulness he solemnly called upon the leaders of Mexican factions to act together promptly "for the relief and redemption of their prostrate country," warning them that "if they cannot accommodate their differences and unite for these great purposes, within a very short time, this government will be constrained to decide what means should be employed by the United States in order to help Mexico save herself and serve her people."

The press reports that this warning was received by the leaders as a stimulus to their individual activities to prove their respective right to recognition by the United States. As all news of military activities in Mexico has for a long time been contradictory and unreliable, much credence cannot be given to present news of this great outburst of military zeal. What steps our government will take to follow up this communication have not yet been made public. It is thought probable that the co-operation of Argentina, Brazil and Chile may be expected in a concerted effort to bring order out of chaos, and at least to point out the way for the election of a stable government. Armed intervention is, of course, much talked of, but is by no means determined upon as yet.

According to the reports issued by the American Red Cross Society, famine conditions prevail throughout a large part of Mexico. At Monterey, several thousand are fed daily. All classes are represented. At Durango food is at famine prices and very scarce. At Tampico the food supply is all but exhausted; flour and corn exceedingly scanty, and many are starving. At Vera Cruz and its suburbs acute famine conditions prevail, and at Jalapa, the capital of the state, conditions are appalling; food and money are both nearly exhausted; food distributions at the town have been attended by thousands of women, many carrying babies. Acapulco is almost foodless and many are starving; the arrival of a boat-load of corn caused a riot and several children are trampled to death. In Mexico City there is a general shortage in cereals. Mules, horses and oxen have been killed or exported. There is no food and animals are dying of starvation. Smallpox and typhoid are epidemic. Six hundred thousand persons are threatened with starvation. Colds have been raiding the Chamber of Deputies, crying "we are hungry." At one public distribution, over 250 persons fainted from hunger and weakness. The capital is torn by warfare among the political factions. A attack was made lately upon the president's palace and bullets were fired through the windows.

The Hundred Ways Which Don't End Corns

Perhaps you say—"I've tried and tried, but found nothing that ends a corn."

You might keep trying for years, Madam. There are a hundred ways which don't. Most of them are very much alike.

But remember this:

There is one way which has removed 70 million corns. It is now removing half the corns that grow.

It's a plaster which contains a bit of wondrous wax. It ends the corn pain in a jiffy. It ends the corn itself in two days. It gently oosens the corn until it comes out without any pain or soreness.

When you merely pare corns—

When you use some folderol—

Bear this in mind. There are folks all around you—users of Blue-jay—who never suffer corns. You are wronging yourself when you fail to do what they do.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S TOPICS FOR JUNE 27

Greeks and Italians

Epworth League: Acts 16: 9-15; 28: 16, 30, 31

JUST now Italy and the Italians are very much in the public thought. After debating the matter for many weeks, the nation has swung into the war with jubilation and confidence. Alas, how many heartaches, how much desolation have already been experienced since the armies went forth to the first battles!

But our lesson deals with Italians and Greeks in their relation to another campaign. We want to win them all for Christ. The whole wording of our lesson is "Greeks and Italians Once a Prize—Why Not Now?" This means that just as Paul thought that the Greeks and Italians were people so well worth winning as to justify severe sacrifice, so we should think that they are worth winning now even at the same kind of sacrifice.

The Methodist Church has a splendid work in Italy. The Theological Seminary and Girls' School at Rome have had already a long career of success, the former recently obtaining a new and very desirable site for its buildings. The work in Greece is not so well developed nor so far advanced.

But we have a very clear duty to the Greeks and Italians in America. They shine our shoes and sell us fruit and their children swarm about our streets. We should be eager and active and sympathetic in trying to win them all for Christ and his church.

The Instrument and Inspiration of Missions: the Bible

B. Y. P. U.: Ps. 19: 113

DR. W. W. WHITE, founder and president of the Bible Teachers' Training School at New York, was led to that work by his early experience as a foreign missionary. He found many missionaries on the foreign field lamenting their ignorance of the Bible. They did not know enough about it to get its inspiration nor to use it as an efficient instrument. He was so impressed with this lack that he came back to establish his great school, which has trained and sent out to the foreign field scores of Bible-taught, Bible-inspired, Spirit-filled missionaries, who know how to use the Bible in winning souls and in teaching. Many missionaries spend some of their precious furlough months in studying at this school to learn more of the Bible.

Whatever line of Christian work we undertake, we must familiarize ourselves with the Bible so that we may get its inspiration and know how to use it skillfully in winning and teaching others.

Song and Its Meaning

Christian Endeavor. Ps. 33: 1-5

SPIRITUAL song emphasizes the fact that religion is fundamentally a matter of the feelings. People sing because they have emotions to which they wish to give expression. It is hard to argue against the songs of the church. They stand for real and fundamental blessings, blessings that have made life glad and death triumphant for multitudes.

We may not all be hymn writers; we can all be hymn lovers. We can learn something of the history of the best hymns and their writers, and can memorize their stanzas for our own souls' strength and blessing; we can have the joy of the songster in our own souls and we can lead others into the gladness of salvation which will make their souls, too, join in the songs of Zion. We should seek to abide in that place of soul blessedness in which we can say with the emancipated captives of Babylon: "Then was our mouth filled with laughter and our tongue with singing. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

MURDER FOR AMUSEMENT

BY MARIETTA HOLLEY

A LITTLE BIRD sat on a swaying bough, covered with the rosy snow of apple blossoms, and sang of her love and her happy home. The morning sky, crimson and golden yellow in the east, was melting upward into the cloudless blue of a perfect June day. Her glad song seemed to translate to duller ears all the glory and beauty of the awakening day.

She had labored industriously that morning; she and her mate had worked in the early dawn in the garden of a friendly farmer, ridding the place of harmful pests; worms and bugs that threatened the crop of fruit and vegetables.

She sat now swinging lightly on the blossom-laden bough, singing in her joy. Her nest was nearly finished, her mate was away even then on a business trip, gathering a few downy feathers to line the nest more softly and luxuriously for his fair young June bride. And she, full of love and joy, was smoothing her bridal robe of glossy feathers, and pouring out her soul in a song of life and youth, in the spring-time of love.

The morning sky, so full of rosy light, sent a glad message to the glad little singer. It told of other fair mornings to come, when home and love should reach their full fruition, when dear, downy little ones should try their wings in the same warm light, while she and her mate looked proudly on. The perfumed blossoms around her breathed a sweet message to her of present joy, and dearer happiness to come. An invalid, whose home was just over the way, and who was downhearted and hopeless, heard the gay voice and forgot her pain for a time, and spoke more cheerfully and pleasantly to the patient young girl who cared for her, and she, too, was cheered by those kind words, and her content overflowed upon her friends.

A MAN, discouraged and despairing, and ready to lay down his life, calling it a wretched blunder, heard the clear, melodious song. The weapon dropped from his trembling hands. The bird-song brought back the prayer that he had breathed at his mother's knee while a robin's voice from the flowery garden outside had made melody through the nursery.

The happy carol of the bird thrilled his heart with memories of her last words to him: "Dear, whatever happens in the future, never give way to despair; in the darkest hour remember that God's love and your mother's love will always surround you like a shield." He felt inspired by a new courage; he would try once more to conquer. He would trust his mother's God to help him get the victory over himself and the world.

A quarrelsome wife heard the cheerful roundelay, and vowed in her heart that she would be more patient with John the next time he vexed her. John listened to the glad refrain, and registered an inward resolve not to provoke Mary so wilfully again. A truant pupil, planning for a stolen holiday, heard the bird-song and it seemed to ring loudly through his wayward brain: "Go back! back! back! Go back!" And he turned his loitering steps toward the schoolhouse and the path of duty.

A young man stood in the doorway of a house that had rags in its windows instead of glass. Back in the squalid interior was a dirty floor, a disordered table with little on it, a slatternly woman, fit mother for a brood of shabby children. No cleanliness and order, no books or pictures, no beauty of any kind; nothing but ignorance, stupidity, neglect, poverty. Time hung heavy on his hands; it was not yet his usual hour for visiting the saloon where he had graduated in sin, so he saunters to the open door, looks dully about him on the beauty of the landscape, the glory of the morning sky.

The heart of the rose sends a message to him. He hears the bird's glad morning song of worship and joy. That sends a meaning to his den brain. He re-enters the gray room, takes down a battered rifle from the wall. The wild rose-bush by the doorstep, perhaps through some sukinship of nature, catches at the sleeve of his ragged coat. The morning lays its luminous hand across his eyes as if to hide the bird. He pulls his coarse cap down and strides on.

He lifts the rifle; there is a loud report, the bird-song in its glad ecstasy is stopped. The tiny songster falls to the ground. The boor does not even pick the wounded thing up, for it is only for pleasure that he took her. She lies there in the grass still alive. Her glazing eyes look dimly upward into the tree overhead where her home is, sweet home, safe home.

SHE sees her mate fly back with a feather in his bill to make his nest still softer for his love. She tries to lift her wings to fly upward, and wonders at the weight that bears her down, wonders at the sharp agony that racks her little helpless form. She had done no harm; why should she be conceived wrong and ruin come?

The light goes out of the soft eyes. The little form grows stiff and cold. Her mate looks down at her with bright, anxious eyes. He sings loudly, how can it be that she sleeps in such a strange way; he must awake her with his song. He sings still louder, but to her side; he sits close by her and makes a pitiful chirp. He hops round the cold form; twice he brings a choice morsel and lays it temptingly near; all in vain. He flutters about the little cold body aimlessly and wretchedly all the day, and lingers near all the long lonesome night. In the morning, dazed and restless, he flies away into the woods.

Just across the green meadow and the strip of woodland a great institution of learning rears its massive walls. Here men come from many lands, from refined homes to learn wisdom and knowledge. A teacher in the college, a man of erudition and refinement, goes forth for a morning stroll. He has burned the midnight oil in his search for knowledge, and feels that he has earned recreation.

Just now he was pondering one strange mystery of life, and wondering if mortals would ever solve it. Whence comes that delicate, elusive spark that we call life, and after a brief tarrying here, where goes it? He could sway men by his eloquence, but he could not follow outwardly the flight of even a baby's soul, or bring back life again to the tiniest form. He troubled him. He was writing a treatise on the "Mysteries of Life."

The learned professor was an ardent sportsman, and as he went out for a morning walk he took his silvery-mounted fowling piece with him. He was up in a tree he sees the form of a bird sitting motionless. It is not singing; no; why should it sing, since there is no one it loves to hear the song? The hunter's instinct is aroused in the professor; he steps forward stealthily (murderers always step in this way) and lifts his rifle in his slender hand.

"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and not one of them is without your Father."

A shot rings out, the bird falls to the ground mortally wounded. The sportsman saunters on, musing on the thought that had so fully occupied his mind of late, the secret of life and death.

Angels and archangels must be filled with amazement at the sight of such pastime. And every feeling heart beneath the sun must wonder why such wrongs can go unavenged. Why is it that not only the ignorant and brutal, but the intelligent, the educated, can sanction by precept and example this slaughter of the innocents, for amusement—amusement.

Questions and Answers

M. E. M., Centerville, N. M. I have always lived under a cloud of doubt, and, try as I may, it seems that I cannot get away from it. Is this from a temperamental or physical cause cannot prayer dispel it?

Suppose you had lost your sleep for two or three nights. This would put your brain into a thoroughly abnormal condition. You would probably have all sorts of doubts and fear and misgivings, and what you would need to rid yourself of these would be not prayer but sleep. God made your body according to certain laws, and to keep it in correct working order you must conform to these laws. If you break the laws, even innocently, your first religious duty is to repair the physical damage. If our brains are overstrained or the delicate nervous system is overstrained or deranged in any way our brains will manufacture queer and abnormal and distressing thoughts and feelings. First of all insist upon getting well. You have faith enough in Christ to tell him simply and frankly that you cannot figure these things out in your present state, and ask him to make it possible for you to rest. Then as your mind and nerves grow stronger associate with the most spiritually-minded people you can find; attend their religious services. Accept whatever of their teaching you can without mental effort and leave the rest till you get enough stronger to consider it. Do the same with your Bible reading. Accept what is plain and easy and simple, and leave the difficult passages till you are better. Above all, remember that of all kind and gentle and sympathetic friends Jesus is the best. He wants to make you well; he wants to drive away the clouds. Just let him be the friend he wants to be, and his light will drive the darkness away. See II Cor. 4: 6.

E. H. D., New Bloomfield, Pa. The fact that you are conscious of your fault and repent it sincerely, and that your heart is reaching out for God and his forgiveness, should lead you to take the necessary steps. He is ever ready to forgive those who come to him repentant and contrite, and who ask forgiveness for his dear Son's sake. We would advise you to make a confidant of your pastor, or of some one whom you believe to be a sincere Christian, and who will be glad to help you. You should not fail to confess your sin to the one you have wronged, and to do all that lies within your power to make reparation. We have the assurance that He will abundantly pardon all who come to him in the spirit of submission; that he is more ready to forgive than we are to ask; that he saves to the uttermost and that "whosoever will may come." Nor should you fail to publicly confess him before men, for there is a special promise of blessing to those who do this. (See Luke 12: 8.) Be courageous; take God at his word and remember that our Saviour has assured us that "whatsoever ye shall ask in my name" will be granted.

R. B. F., El Centro, Calif. 1. Under some circumstances do you not think one can be just as true a Christian outside the church as in? 2. Do you think one can lead a Christian life and be successful in business where there is keen competition? I do not. 3. Do you not think most bad or un-Christian people are so because of lack of training and environment, rather than because they do not care to be good? 4. Please give me the amount or the proportion of money spent for foreign missions and what it returns to this country in increased commerce. I am to give a talk on Christianity as a business investment for money.

1. This question has been frequently discussed in the Christian Herald. We have always taken the ground that all Christians should join the church. See also on page 404 of the Christian Herald book "555 Bible Questions Answered." 2. There is an ever-widening and ever-deepening conviction that some of the fundamental methods and principles of the business world are irreconcilable with the teachings of Christ. The motive of most work in the world of business is profit, or gain. The motive of Christ is service. For instance, the world says: "Let us make shoes so that we may get a profit by selling them." Christ would say: "Let us make shoes because people need them and will suffer without them." Further, as business is at present organized, an unjust proportion of the gains of manufacture go to the owners of the manufacturing plants, many of whom may have no other connection with the business than the holding of stocks or bonds, rather than to the people who actually do the work of the industry. While Christians should try earnestly to reorganize the business world to bring it into conformity with Christ's laws of helpful service, they may individually adopt his spirit for their own and do their work with the motive of service rather than the motive of selfish gain. 3. We must not forget, in all the modern discussion of psychology, sociology, etc., that the great truth of Scripture is still a truth, namely that the heart of man is wrong and needs to be made right. There is a strange perversity in human nature which makes people dislike God and his ways. And it is this fundamental characteristic of the soul, which alienates it from God, that the Gospel is designed to reach and conquer. 4. It seems to us that it would be a dreadful thing to discuss this problem as you have phrased it. The thought of the gains to commerce of missionary activities should not be considered. It is one of the great hindrances to the work of missions that heathen people have gotten precisely that view. They think we have one day left of 1916 (the 29th of February) and one each of 1917, 1918, 1919 and 1921, and two days of 1920. These days, added together, would make one week, which would be placed at the end of 1921, making an extra week, which could be called 'Week after 1921.' Every Leap Day and the extra day of every year should be carried on until there are seven days, then a week formed of them and placed between December 28 and January 1."

Mrs. C. T., Belleville, Ill., writes: "In your issue of May 12, 1915, you tell of some of the readers who have been members of your Family Circle since 1880. While this is a good record, I think that mine surpasses it. My father, William C. Boone, who before his death resided in Jefferson City, Mo., had taken the Christian Herald and Signs of the Times for a good many years, and at the time of my marriage and for some years afterwards, he sent the Christian Herald to me—a subscription to it—as a gift, and later we subscribed for it direct, and have been taking it constantly and continuously ever since my marriage in October, 1873." This reader has been with us since the first issue of the paper.

Mrs. S. E. S., Kalamazoo, Mich. The expression "The whole family," in Eph. 3: 15, would be better translated "every family." The apostle is implying that God, in his relation of science is the moral voice within us, which warns us of right so far as we understand it, and where we are still in doubt, to ask divine direction. 2. If one commit a sin, or an act which he believes may be a sin, and yet has doubt concerning it, it is well for him to take counsel with a pastor or some experienced Christian on the matter. Interchange of opinion in such cases proves a great help. 3. Fellowship with God is the essence of the Christian life. He is Light, and as in the natural world all material life and growth depend on light, so all spiritual life and growth must depend on God, "in whom is no darkness at all." "Walking in the light," therefore, is descriptive of intimate fellowship and close dependence of the believer, who keeps in touch with God and with Christ, who is the "true light." (See I John 1: 5-9.) If we are in the light, we will be divinely helped and guided in our inward and outward actions, and in all things to which we apply ourselves. Indeed, this is the test of fellowship. "He that saith he abideth in the light, ought himself also so to walk, even as we have walked." Such companionship brings not only spiritual development but enlarges our Christian fellowship one with another and gives a new joy and fullness to life. It is not an imitation merely, but a union and oneness in all things with Him with whom we walk.

Mrs. J. C. D., Caldwell, Kan. Nowhere in the Bible is it stated how long Noah was engaged in building the Ark; but the Lord had granted a respite of 120 years after the warning to the human race (see I Peter 3: 20; II Peter 2: 5); it was during this period that Noah was a "preacher of righteousness," not only laboring in the construction of the Ark itself, but also exhorting his people to repentance.

Miscellaneous

W. P. G., Santa Paula, Calif. Thank you for your kind letter and all good wishes.

Reader, Iowa. The minister in question was doubtless speaking in a figurative sense, and his language should be interpreted accordingly.

Mrs. Emma Beilstein, Columbia Avenue, Vandergrift, Pa., would be grateful to any reader of this journal who would send her a copy of the poem beginning, "He was not willing that any should perish."

Mrs. H. D. W., Belmont, Mass. The passage you quote is not found in the Bible. It is given in the Agrapha, which is a non-canonical book, containing a number of fragmentary passages claimed to have been spoken by Christ on various occasions. The passage is as follows: "Wherever there are [unbelievers] there is one [believer alone] I am with him. Raise the stone and thou shalt find me; cleave the wood and there am I." This particular passage, with a number of others of the same mystical character is believed to have been taken from some early Gnostic Gospel, and, like much of the same sort, is regarded as pantheistic and therefore rejected as of doubtful origin.

Mrs. W. F. E., Ramona, Calif., writes: B. C., Louisiana, asks if it is possible, in the days of struggle and hard times, not to be anxious for one's life, food and raiment. I would like to say that I know it is possible. God's promises are all Yea and Amen in Christ Jesus, and he has promised to supply all our needs and 'no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.' But the promises are fulfilled according to our faith. I have been through trials, but our heavenly Father has never suffered us to be in need of the necessities of life. I rejoice to be able to testify that I know God's promises to be true."

P. E. B., Stirling, Ohio. Under the old dispensation, war was regarded as having a divine sanction when it was waged in a righteous cause. Under the Gospel, however, we are taught to love our enemies and to be on terms of friendship with all men. Yet, even in the teachings of Jesus, we are told that wars will continue to the end of the age (see Matt. 24: Mark 13: 7). The Apocalypse is full of it. The enlightened portion of the race regards it as evil, yet as one which is inevitable as the outcome of human conditions. Under these circumstances, it is the duty of the Christian to fight war with all his power and influence; but being compelled to recognize its actual existence, must distinguish between wars that have justification from a human standpoint and those that have none. All war is bad, but some are far worse than others. The ideal condition for which we should work and strive is described in Isa. 2: 4.

MAKE-BELIEVE

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Take a pair of chickens snowy,
Harness 'em with bits of string;
Drive 'em out across the meadow,
Where the first blue violets spring.
Make believe that you're a princess,
Talking in a foreign tongue—
Riding through a golden palace;
(Yes, it's easy—if you're young!)

All the world is bright to greet you;
When your snowy chargers prance
Out across the dusty roadway,
All the daisies seem to dance.
Every blade o' grass is bowing,
Every cowslip bell is rung
Just to give you joy and pleasure.
(Yes, it's easy—if you're young!)

When the springtime of your fancy
Melts away to winter grim;
When the leaves of youth and childhood
Flutter from the highest limb—
Take a pair of memory chickens,
Harness 'em with strands of gold,
Make believe—an' make it easy
If you're young or if you're old!

are sending them our Gospel that we may get their money, and we must do all we can to prove to them that this is not true.

L. J. P., Priestly, W. Va., writes: "In the Christian Herald for April 28, I notice an article on reforming the Julian calendar, by M. C. Lunsford, Jr., in which he states that the year should be divided into thirteen months of twenty-eight days each, leaving one day in a common year and two in leap year. These days, he says, should be placed between December 28 and January 1, and should be called 'Dies Non' and 'Leap Day,' said days not being recognized by the calendar, and Sunday always coming on the same day of the month. I, at first, thought the arrangement all right, but after studying the proposition, I saw that in a common year there would have to be seven days between Sunday, December 22, and Sunday, January 1, unless we observed two Sundays together; and in a leap year there would be eight days between the same dates or we would have to observe two Sundays only one day apart. If the calendar should be changed as Mr. Lunsford advocates, the seventh day would come on 'Dies Non,' and the next Sabbath would come on Saturday, January 7. Therefore, we would break the Sabbath, because we would work seven days and keep the eighth day. I would suggest that the arrangements be made as follows: Let there be only 28 days in February, 1916, so that the first day of January, 1917, would come on Sunday. Then divide 1917 in 13 months each having 28 days, having the new month between June and July. We would then

Father to all his adopted children, is the great prototype of the paternal relation wherever found. In Acts 2: 36, the translation, "all the house of Israel," might be rendered "every house in Israel." The translators might have been justified in using the words "all the family," or "the whole family," which would be in harmony with the Scripture view "that angels and men, the saints militant and those with God, are one whole family, joined under the one Father in Christ, as Mediator between heaven and earth." Angels are termed our "brethren," and the church on earth comprehends, besides men, the higher spiritual world, thus making the whole kingdom of God one divine community.

R. Y. Z., Hendricks, Minn. 1. Conscience, the moral sense in man, which enables him to distinguish between right and wrong, and which approves or condemns accordingly, is not an infallible guide. Paul, before his conversion, believed when he was persecuting the Christians that he was doing God service; he was zealous but mistaken, for his conscience was unenlightened. (Acts 26: 9.) Many instances may be mentioned in which an unenlightened conscience may cause us to err, just as our intelligence, when we are not fully informed on a certain topic, may cause us to reach a wrong conclusion, or to form a false judgment, we meanwhile believing we are doing right. If we have an impression that an act would be wrong, we should let it alone. Paul, in I Cor. 8: 7, speaks of a weak conscience which sees wrong where there is no wrong; but since con-

MORMONISM FACING A CRISIS

THE WHOLE CHURCH SHAKEN BY THE EXPOSURE OF THE "BOOK OF ABRAHAM"

BY PROFESSOR EDGAR JAMES BANKS

THE leaders of the Mormon Church are now fighting for the existence of their religion. They have begun to realize that the flimsy religious structure is beginning to totter, and the whole soon fall upon their heads. It seems that the beginning of the end of Mormonism is at hand.

I understand the present Mormon troubles, which threaten the very existence of the University of Utah, and even of the Mormon Church, it is necessary to review the decision of two years ago. There are here "sacred books" peculiar to the Mormons. They are all lying before me. I write. One, called the "Book of Mormon," claims to be a translation of inscriptions upon gold plates, which were said to have been revealed by an angel to Joseph Smith on September 22, 27, in a western New York village. The "Book of the Doctrine and Covenants" is a collection of lectures and imaginary divine commands, said to have been delivered to various Mormon leaders. The third book, "The Pearl of Great Price," in which is "The Book of Abraham," the cause of the present Mormon difficulties.

"The Book of Abraham," according to the words which preface it, claims to be a translation by Joseph Smith of some ancient records that have come into our hands from the catacombs of Egypt; the writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand upon papyrus.

It is said that Smith was inspired by an Egyptian mummy to make the translation, for at that time scholars were unable to read the Egyptian hieroglyphs. Accompanying "The Book of Abraham" are several illustrations of the Egyptian documents which Smith pretended to have translated, and his claims were written by Abraham. They are genuine ancient Egyptian documents, as any one familiar with the Egyptian characters may see at a glance. Smith seems to have obtained the documents from a sea captain. The hieroglyphic section is very short, but Smith's translation of it covers thirty pages of small matter. At the time his translation was made no man could prove that it was not correct, for the hieroglyphs could not be read; but now they are easily read by scholars on the page of an English book.

So, two years ago, when Bishop Spalding of Utah refused the Mormon leaders that it would be well if Egyptian scholars might be permitted to see the inscriptions, the supposed translation of which is the "Book of Abraham." The pride of the Mormons, conceived beyond a doubt that his inspired translation was correct, willingly supplied Bishop Spalding with copies of them, and these copies were submitted to several Egyptian scholars for translation. It seemed to the Mormons that the scholars must verify Smith's translation, and thus the whole would be convinced of the truth of the book, and all mankind would turn to Mormonism.

But the Mormon elders made a fatal mistake. A glance at the inscriptions convinced the scholars that Smith's translation was purely imaginary. The inscriptions are not upon papyrus, but upon small clay objects, which the ancient Egyptians placed as cushions beneath the heads of the mummies. They made no mention of Abraham in Egypt; they were merely short prayers to the Egyptian sun-god. These little clay cushions are among the most common of Egyptian antiquities; they may be seen in nearly every museum, or purchased in out; but it was smoldering away, burning into the very heart of Mormonism, and now it has burst into a conflagration.

A large percentage of the students in the University of Utah are children of Mormon parents. They are as intelligent and studious as are the students in any other institution. Many of them come from wealthy and refined homes. Some of them have learned to think. They read that the scholars had translated the Egyptian inscriptions of which the "Book of Abraham" was supposed to be a translation, and that those inscriptions were only the lines of a hymn to the sun-god. They thought about it, and then they asked their Gentile professors, in whom their confidence was unbounded, if it were really true. Twenty years ago a Gentile in Salt Lake City would hardly have dared to speak openly his opinion on such a subject. But now, when the student is told that his sacred books are not inspired, he examines the proofs and is convinced. He is then a Mormon only in name. That is true, not of one, but of thousands of the brightest of the young Mormon men today.

At the last commencement of the University of Utah a Mormon student, Milton H. Sevey, was chosen to represent the graduating class upon the commencement platform. The leaders of the church and the Mormon regents of the University were there in force. Young Sevey took for the subject of his address "Needed Reform." He attacked the conservatism of the state and the Mormon attitude toward things in general. The regents gasped. They realized that the old order of things had passed away, and that at last freedom of thought had entered the Mormon world. The church of Joseph Smith and of Brigham Young was threatened, and steps must be taken to save it.

Last October Bishop Spalding was accidentally run down by an automobile while crossing the street in Salt Lake City and instantly killed. His death was a great loss to religious progress in Utah; but the work he had already done could not be undone.

The regents of the University of Utah are now making desperate efforts to check the growth of progress. One of the honorary regents is the governor of the state, a Mormon. W. W. Ritter, the chairman of the Board of Regents, is a Mormon of the old school. Of the fourteen regents whose names appear in the catalogue of the University of Utah, seven of them, Ritter, Lund, Young, Williams, Middleton, Mattson and Porter, are Mormons, and four, Gemmell, Armstrong, Whitmore and Bamberger, Gentiles. Two of them, Van Cott and Kingsbury, may be classified as ex-Mormons, but with strong Mormon sympathies, and the religion of the one remaining member, Rolapp, I have been unable to learn. The Board of Regents, therefore, is so predominately Mormon that the influence of its four Gentile members is entirely overshadowed. The chairmen of nearly all of the committees of the Board of Regents are Mormons. Young is the chairman of the executive and legislative committees, Ritter of the finance. Lund of the School of Arts and Sciences, Williams of the School of Education, and Middleton of the School of Medicine. Armstrong is the only

Cairo by any traveler for a trifling sum. So, instead of verifying Smith's translation, the scholars presented to the world scientific and absolute proof that Joseph Smith was not inspired to translate the inscriptions, that his alleged translation was purely imaginary, and that the "Book of Abraham" was not a translation of the inscriptions at all.

In January, 1913, just as this exposure of the "Book of Abraham" took place, an article on that subject, by the present writer, appeared in the Christian Herald. It, with other similar articles, caused consternation in the Mormon world. The article was answered by the Deseret News, the leading Mormon daily paper of Salt Lake City, and a full-page editorial, containing little except personalities, was launched against the present writer. There the matter rested, and the controversy seemed to have been forgotten. But it was not forgotten by the Mormons. The fire which had been kindled flared up for a moment, and then appeared to die

Gentile who is a chairman of any of the committees of the Board of Regents. Thus it is seen that the influence of the Board is overwhelmingly Mormon, and that the university is entirely under Mormon control.

Alarmed at the progressive spirit which was creeping into the university, the first step taken by the Board of Regents to combat it was to expel four of the Gentile professors, and to demote two others who seemed to be most responsible for this new freedom of thought. Those who have been expelled are Dr. A. A. Knowlton, the associate professor of physics; Professor George C. Wise of the department of modern languages, and the secretary of the faculty; Phil C. Bing, instructor in English, and Charles W. Snow, also of the English department. They are men whose names would be a credit to the list of the faculty of any university, and their colleagues were amazed at their expulsion. The faculty of a university is the best judge of the value of its members, and has the interest of the institution at heart far more than a board of regents, composed chiefly of politicians and capitalists, and the faculty requested the Board of Regents to explain why the professors had been expelled. The board flatly refused to give an explanation. A committee, consisting chiefly of the alumni of the university, was then appointed by the faculty to investigate the matter. The board refused to recognize the committee or to permit an investigation, asserting that they had not lost confidence in their own judgment and integrity, and that the board must establish its supremacy at whatever cost.

Then fourteen of the professors of the faculty resigned. Among them were some of the oldest and most valuable men. The sympathy of the students was entirely with the faculty. They rebelled, and they, too, demanded an explanation as to why their instructors had been dismissed. At first their demands were ignored; but they were so persistent that the Board of Regents was compelled to issue a public statement to quiet the students. In it a cause for the dismissal of the professors is given, but it is not the real cause. It is as weak a statement as anyone would care to see, and the students openly ridiculed it. The statement lies before me as I write. President Kingsbury, speaking for the regents, makes the following excuses for dismissing the professors:

"I am convinced that Dr. Knowlton has worked against the administration of the university. Dr.

Knowlton has also spoken very disrespectfully of the Board of Regents."

"I am convinced that Professor Wise has spoken in a depreciatory way about the university before his classes, and that he has also spoken in a very uncomplimentary way about the administration."

THE reason given for the expulsion of the other two professors was that changes in the English department were contemplated, and that their services would no longer be required; but Professor Widsoe, a Mormon, and a graduate of the Agricultural College of Utah, has been appointed to the head of the English department!

It seems now that the Board of Regents is attempting to replace the fourteen professors who have resigned with Mormons of the old type, and thus to check the growth of freedom of thought. The expelled and resigned professors are still fighting, and if it becomes necessary they are determined to take the matter into the highest courts of the United States.

The regents, however, maintain that neither politics nor religion has ever influenced them in any way in making appointments to the faculty. The claim is absurd, and in making it the regents deceive none but themselves. The one open fact, which anyone may clearly see, is that the University of Utah has outgrown Mormonism, and they are making a great final effort, regardless of principle or cost, to retain it for their church.

Lately I have been delivering a series of lectures under the auspices of one of the departments of the University of Utah. None of the conservative Mormons attended the lectures, but the more liberal men were present. At the close of one of the lectures a bright Mormon student accompanied me to the club where I was stopping. He asked Joseph Smith's translation of the Egyptian hieroglyphs, for he remembered the discussion of them a year ago. He is now a Mormon only in name. A gentleman, as cultured a man as I have ever known, and whose father and mother were among the lower of Brigham Young, showed me at the Temple grounds. He was ashamed of his father and blushed whenever reference was made to him. When I asked him about the sources of the Mormon books, he answered, "I do not know," and turned away his head. And he represents the younger generation of Mormons. The truth is that Mormonism is dying. The objectionable practices such as polygamy have been discarded, and the religion alive it has been modified to meet the present demands.

THOSE most familiar with the present Mormon Church describe it as a great financial institution, as soulless as any other corporation. It is business which, under the name of religion, collects a tithe or tenth of the income of all its members, and that revenue is enormous. The progressive Mormons have long demanded that a statement of the annual tithes be made public, and recently, for the first time, the statement appeared. The tithes for the last year, according to the statement, amounted to more than $1,500,000, and probably the real figures were much greater. In addition to the tithes were enormous revenues from various investments and interests, for the Mormon Church is one of the largest business concerns in the world, controlling railroads, manufacturing stores, hotels and vast tracts of land in many states and even in foreign countries. The properties, however, are not held in the name of the church, but in the name of prominent members of the church. The men who control the vast lands of the church are loath to relinquish them. Moreover, they send missionaries to all parts of the world.

THE GATES OF PARADISE * By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

AS a little child I remember seeing a picture called "Summer." It was a picture of a beautiful woman dressed in a filmy white robe—a woman who drowsily sat beneath a spreading green tree, with a host of flowers at her feet and in her arms. It was a lovely picture, this picture called "Summer."

Somehow, since I have been working in the city, when the end of June comes and the breezes grow hot and the sun beats down mercilessly on the passersby, I have stopped thinking of summer as a beautiful woman sitting beneath a spreading green tree. If I were an artist, I think I would draw a picture of a tiny child sitting on a curbstone, with pale cheeks and tired eyes and helplessly groping hands. I would try to make folk see the glare of the sun on his drooping little head, and feel the gasping sighs that torture his chest as he tries to get a breath of cool air. I would show a crowd of people hurrying by, with eyes looking straight ahead, and I would call that picture "Summer." I have often viewed just such a scene.

This week, Mont-Lawn, the Christian Herald Children's Home, is about to open its doors. Folk call it "The Children's Paradise," and after a glimpse of the burning city streets, the name certainly seems appropriate. Imagine a stretch of sky, turquoise blue, reaching out to touch a mountain, emerald green, the far distance tinted vaguely with amethyst. Imagine a river far below, winding like a silver ribbon past high granite cliffs and lovely tree-lined shores. Imagine, in the midst of it all, a fairy village of pretty houses, nestling sweetly among flowers and shrubs and cool, green lawn. If you can imagine all this, you will have a mind picture of "The Children's Paradise." Paradise means heaven!

I first saw Mont-Lawn when it was empty, a mere shell of a place (for any group of houses, empty of people, is a mere shell). It was a rainy day, and a sharp wind swept through the valley, tossing the branches of the highest trees and beating the lowest ones against the earth. It was a dismal day, and yet, though the Home was empty, it seemed wonderfully beautiful to me and wonderfully inspiring. I could imagine the broad lawn covered with children; I could hear merry voices in the empty halls; I could see a sleeping army in the little white beds. It isn't every empty place that you can people so easily with imaginary forms.

THE second time I saw Mont-Lawn was a very hot day in the middle of summer. I had come up directly from the city, and as I approached the Home I felt, from afar off, an atmosphere of peace and content. When finally I rounded a curve in the road, and the whole smiling green and gold and blue picture stretched out before my eyes, I felt the way a dreamer might feel who opens his eyes after a beautiful vision and finds the reality close at hand. The lawns were speckled with little dresses (not the blue and white dresses of an orphan asylum, that are all made alike), dresses colored like flowers in pink and blue and yellow. I heard little boys shouting happily as they splashed in a running brook (you have all heard little folks shout as they played through the sunlight of a summer day), and I saw pale cheeks that were beginning to show a glow of health blooming rosely in them. I had seen Mont-Lawn, the vision, and I had seen Mont-Lawn, the reality. I had dreamed and I had seen the dream come true.

I was talking to the superintendent of our Children's Home yesterday. "Have you had many letters from the children, asking if they might go to the country?" I asked.

The superintendent smiled at me—smiled at my ignorance.

"We always have letters," she answered; "and of course, this morning the year we have an unbelievable number of them. Oh, yes, the children want to go to the country."

"Just the other day," she went on, "a woman wrote me a letter. She was the mother of two little boys who had spent ten days at the Home last year. In her letter she said: 'The boys are anxious to go there that I hope you will be able to take them. The day after they came back last year, they cried and cried for the country. They have been talking about it all winter and hope that they will not be disappointed.' I wrote back to her and told her to send the boys up to my office."

"They came just as soon as they received my letter, and sat shyly beside on a bench by the door. I let them alone for a few moments, and then after they had recovered a bit from their bashfulness I went over and began to talk to them. 'You mother tells me,' I said, 'that you want to go to the country.'"

"They looked at me, and their eyes grew bright with excitement. Finally the largest one spoke. 'Please, a'm he whispered, 'kin we go? A if we do go, kin we go soon?'"

That's the question the children ask every summer, children who have once spent a time here—ever so short a time—within the Children's Paradise. "Kin we go, and kin we go soon?"

I was talking to a city missionary not long ago, and she told me that in the city there are children who have never seen grass, never even seen a tree, and that was not tiring.

EN ROUTE TO MONT-LAWN: A FAMILIAR SCENE IN FRONT OF THE BIBLE HOUSE TWICE A WEEK ALL SUMMER

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

ALTHOUGH up to the present writing the Austro-Italian campaign is still in what may be termed the preliminary stages, it will perhaps be of interest to devote a little space to a short summary of the most important episodes in the careers of the Italian political and military leaders.

Antonio Salandra, the premier, is an Apulian of firm character and penetrating intelligence. Born at Tria, near Foggia, in 1853, he studied law and became professor of administrative science in the University of Rome. His competence in administrative and financial matters speedily attracted public attention, and in 1891 he was appointed under-secretary of state for finance in the Rudini cabinet. In 1893 he became under-secretary for the treasury, of which Sidney Sonnino was then minister, and aided him in the desperate fight against national bankruptcy which Sonnino waged successfully from 1895 to 1896.

His friendship and confidence between the two men, which has been so marked a feature of the last few critical moments, dates from this period. Until Salandra took office as prime minister in January, 1914, in succession to Giovanni Giolitti, his political attitude had been mainly determined by the advice of Sonnino, and even then he accepted office only after Sonnino had declined it. When the death of the Marquis di San Giuliano left the ministry of foreign affairs vacant in December, Salandra insisted that Sonnino should lead their close co-operation as thus resumed.

Sidney Sonnino, the son of an Italian-Jewish father and a Scottish mother, is six years older than Salandra. Born at Florence on January 11, 1847, he studied law at Pisa and then entered the diplomatic service for some years, but felt to devote himself to economic studies and to a political career. His work on the condition of the peasants in Sicily first established his reputation, and his speeches in the chamber on finance and national economy confirmed.

As minister of the treasury in the Crispien cabinet, 1893 he laid the foundations of the financial and economic prosperity of Italy. His unyielding character long impeded his attainment of the high political rank in a country where pliancy is regarded as the foremost political virtue. In 1906 and again in 1910 he became prime minister, his administrations were speedily overthrown by a combination of political interests which felt themselves menaced by his methods. It has been said of him that he would never give his leisure save in a national emergency. The emergency found him in the office where his great gifts could be utilized.

General Count Luigi Cadorna, chief of the General Staff of the Army and Commander-in-chief of the Italian Armies in the Field, is in his sixty-fifth year. He is the son of General Count Raffaele Cadorna, and his own son is a subaltern in the 10th regiment which this fine soldier commanded in 1866 in the war against Austria. General Cadorna, after receiving his early education at a detachment, passed the staff college, and was attached to his father's staff during the Rome expedition. He reached the rank of captain in 1875, and was ultimately appointed chief of staff of the Verona Army Corps. After commanding the 10th Bersaglieri he was promoted major-general in 1898. In his present rank as lieutenant-general he reached his present age.

After commanding a division at Ancona he was promoted corps commander at Genoa, with the rank of commander-designate of an army in the field. He succeeded General Pollio as chief of the general staff last year. His reputation as a professional soldier has been considerably enhanced by his skill in military questions, and he is credited with intimate knowledge of the ground on the Austro-Italian frontier.

The Duke of the Abruzzi, first cousin of the King, was appointed to the chief command of the Italian Navy in August last. Born in Madrid January 29, 1873, he was educated at the naval school at Leghorn, and has had a successful career as an officer of the fleet, having risen in the service by his own merits and industry. During the Tripolitan War he commanded a division of ships operating principally in the Adriatic.

Rear-Admiral Enrico Millo succeeded Admiral Leonardi Cattolica as minister of marine in July, 1913. He was the officer in command of the torpedo flotilla which made a raid in the Dardanelles on the night of July 18, 1912, at which time he was serving as chief of staff to the Duke of the Abruzzi in the Vettor Pisani, flagship of the Adriatic Division, from which, apparently, the force was detached. Captain Millo was promoted to rear-admiral for this exploit, and received the Military Order of Savoy.

THE WAR HAS PRODUCED THE FORT ON WHEELS, THE ARMORED MILITARY TRAIN

Vice-Admiral Luigi Faravelli is president of the Superior Council of the Navy. He was the officer who succeeded to the post of commander-in-chief of the Italian fleet on the death of Admiral Aubry on March 4, 1912. Previously he had commanded the second squadron. On April 7, 1912, Vice-Admiral Faravelli's own health broke down, and he had to be relieved.

These men will all be much heard of in the later developments of the campaign.

As to the campaign itself, but little can be said more than that in its general character it is already commencing to assume the same feature of trench warfare that distinguishes the Western campaign, and it appears certain that for some time, at least, the Austrians will content themselves with remaining on the defensive behind the elaborate series of permanent and temporary fortifications with which their frontier towards Italy bristles, and which admirably harmonize with the mountainous character of the country.

As a result of these conditions any progress made by the Italians will be slow, and every inch of ground gained will be painfully won. At the present time it may be said that the disposition of the Italian forces follows the line of the frontier generally, though at various points it crosses the frontier and advances for a few miles into Austrian territory.

No engagements of more importance than skirmishes have as yet taken place, excepting the capture of Monfalcone, which is of high importance to Italian arms. Monfalcone furnished Trieste with light and power, and is the railroad junction connecting Trieste, Gradisca and Goeritz. With this railway in the hands of the Italians, the Austrians will find movements along the Isonzo line seriously hampered. Italy has proclaimed a blockade of the Austrian and Albanian coast, both of which were already blockaded by the French.

There have been some naval actions between destroyers and torpedo boats, of very minor importance, and aircraft raids by both combatants on the territory of the other, the Italians directing their efforts against Pola, the Austrian naval port, and the Austrians against Venice. Little result, however, seems to have followed these efforts. Obscurity still hangs over the operations in the Dardanelles campaign, both by land and by sea, and this obscurity is made more impossible to pierce by the absolutely contradictory character of the bulletins, from which we would be led to believe that both the Turks and the Allies were simultaneously advancing on the same battle ground, which is obviously an impossibility.

The only thing that can be asserted, based on the published lists, is that the casualties in this land campaign on Gallipoli peninsula are, in proportion to the numbers engaged, the heaviest so far in the war. The Allies are losing on the average a thousand men a day, and we can legitimately infer that the losses of the Turks are at least equal, and as the opposing forces do not in their aggregate total more than 200,000 men, a percentage a day of the total is being lost which is really enormous.

That British submarine which has heretofore been mentioned as having penetrated into the Sea of Marmora and causing much trouble to the Turks, continued its exploits during the week, and besides sinking several smaller vessels sank a large Turkish transport, one of the two German passenger steamers which took refuge in Turkish waters at the outbreak of the war; which of the two, however, is not definitely known. The exploits of this submarine constitute one of the most brilliant and audacious naval feats that have been performed by the British in this war; her young commander must have more than a touch of the spirit of Drake.

Another brilliant feat was performed by another young officer during the week. For the first time on record, a Zeppelin was destroyed in the air by an aviator in an aeroplane. Reginald A. J. Warneford, a young Canadian sub-lieutenant in the royal navy, who mastered aeroplaning only this summer, performed the feat and returned safely to the British lines, while the Zeppelin lies in ruins sprawled on the roof and ground of an orphanage near Ghent. Falling there a blazing mass, after being struck by the young aviator's bombs, its crew of twenty-eight men were killed, as were also several occupants of the orphanage buildings.

The illness of the king of Greece has taken a turn for the worse, and the outcome again seems doubtful. The elections for the new Boule, the Greek parliament, take place on June 12, next Saturday, and internationally may play an important part, as very possibly on their result will turn the whole question of Greek intervention, and the possibility of a satisfactory arrangement being arrived at between Greece and Bulgaria.

Changes of some importance are stated to be impending in the French cabinet, and according to the latest rumors, Augagneur, minister of marine, and Malvy, of the interior, are to retire, while Leon Bourgeois, formerly prime minister, is to receive a portfolio.

Augagneur's retirement was foreshadowed, as the lack of results in the Dardanelles campaign have given rise to much the same feeling in France as in England, and some one must be sacrificed as a propitiatory offering to the people in the same way Churchill was in Great Britain.

During the week Great Britain and Germany announced their losses. In the case of Germany

NO OIL IN THEIR LAMPS

A GOSPEL SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT: "They took no oil with them." Matt. 25: 3

THERE are few things which are more disagreeable than a burning lamp which is short of oil. The flame is unsteady, flickering, fuming, spitting, smoking, giving far more discomfort than light. And there are few things in the moral world more disagreeable than people who keep their lamp burning with inadequate supplies of oil. They are unreliable, fitful, cheerless—altogether making far more smoke than fire. Hard duties cannot be sustained by a transient impulse, by the strength of a good resolution. He who is going to discharge Christian duties consistently will need unfailing springs of oil, he will need to feed his soul with eternal truth. We cannot have exercise without bread; we cannot have the lamp burning without oil; we cannot have duty without truth. But we are all prone to think we can. There is nothing more common than for men to take up duties which they have not resources to discharge, to light lamps which they cannot keep burning. Here in the Bible is a whole host of duties, things which we have to do and things which we have not to do.

Lamps That Quickly Go Out

And men come and lay hold of these Christian duties, and they say: "We will make these our lamps. We will keep them burning in our daily life." And they light them, and they burn for a little while, but soon die down. How is it? They have taken the Biblical lamp without Biblical oil. They are trying to be godly without God; they are trying to be Christians without Christ, and they utterly and miserably fail.

Let us look at this. It is of sufficiently common experience to claim our serious thought. I am sure you must have again and again heard men, who have been trying to live a good and dutiful life, express themselves in this wise: "I get on very well for a time, and then . . ." Then their lamp goes out because they have no oil. They are trying to do Christian duty without Christian resources.

One of the great primary duties to which we are called is that of faithfulness, uprightness, scrupulous integrity, unbroken loyalty to conscience. Men vow themselves to discharge it. Young fellows, especially, plunging with fresh, frank impulse into business life, resolve to observe the duty with absolute strictness. They light this lamp of faithfulness, and they begin their business career. What do they find? Their eyes are opened to the cunning ways in which wealth is made. They see the success of deception. They mark how dishonesty multiplies its stores. They see all the many short-cuts to desired ends. They see how easily one man cuts out another by a little sharp and crooked practice. They see that a serpent can twist and wriggle himself into places and positions into which a man with rigid moral backbone can never get. They see that their fiercest competitor is not the honest trader, but the trickster. They begin to suspect that trickery cannot be fought with weapons of rectitude, that only by more trickery can trickery be vanquished.

Then after the suspicion follows the design: "That man is offering his soul for thirty pieces of silver; I can cut him out by offering my own for twenty. Shall I do it? Is faithfulness essential? Does integrity pay?" His lamp is going out; it needs oil! His resolution is dying; it needs food! Duty is waning; it needs to be fed with spiritual truth! How is it to be done? Great Christian duties have to be sustained by great Christian roots.

Botanists will tell you that, speaking roughly, the roots of a tree are as far spreading as its branches. There is as much growth under ground as there is above ground. There is as much unseen as there is seen. A great tree requires a great rootage, and so does a great duty. Every duty which the Lord prescribes demands an immense rootage. It requires the infinite! You can go through the Sermon on the Mount, and mark every duty, and opposite every duty you may write the words: "If grown, must be rooted in the Eternal!" But what do men do? They come to the Lord's life, and they take out what they call the morality, the moral duties, and leaving all the rest, they say: "These we will grow; with these we will adorn our life." You may as well try to grow an oak tree in a thimble! Divorce the duty from the infinite truth on which it feeds, and it will always be a dwarf.

For purposes of experiment I tried a little while ago to grow some wheat in a saucer. The seed germinated, sprouted; and the blades shot up to the height of three inches, and then dropped and turned yellow, and "because it had no deepness of earth it withered away." That is what a great many of us try to do with Christian duties; we try to grow them in shallow saucers, when they can only be grown in the infinite. Great Christian duties draw their food supplies from eternal truth, and apart from those supplies they will be lean and starved, and will ultimately die. The duty of faithfulness to men finds its support in the eternal truth of the faithfulness of God. A young fellow must feed on that!

Lamps That Need Reviving

It must be tremendously difficult—I think it is impossible in these days—for any man to be scrupulously faithful to his conscience who does not feed himself on the great truth that God will be faithful to him. When the lamp of my faithfulness is flickering, and I am wondering if the path of honor is the way of safety, I will feed the lamp with the oil of this truth: "My God is faithful." When wickedness appears to have a momentary triumph, and integrity appears to be vanquished, and the lamp of my resolution needs to be revived, I will feed it with the oil of this eternal truth: "My God is faithful."

Another duty to which we are called in the Christian life is the duty of unselfish service. We are called to light the lamp of service. Well, a great many respond to the call. They take up the duty. They light their lamps. But how many there are who just burn up the oil of a little impulse, and then go out! Some take up service in the school, burn brightly for a little while, and then go out! Others interest themselves actively in one or another of the many institutions established to redeem the world, burn for a little while, and then go out! We all know these people. They are intentioned; they are good-hearted, but they take up a duty you know just how long it will burn, a week, or a month, or a year—a year there will be a flicker of excuses, prior to the going out altogether. How is it? They have taken their lamps, but they have taken no oil with them. They are trying to do spiritual exercises on a starved soul. They are trying to do Christian duties without the bread of Christian truth. They do not draw upon any great eternal resource for power to sustain them in their service, and the strength is soon spent. What do they need? Food, the Bread of Life.

Look back across the ages, and call to the post John, and ask him how it was that amid the pangs and pains of exile he kept the lamp of duty burning in loving service for his fellows, and this sweet answer comes ringing back across the years: "I love . . . because he first loved me." To the apostle Paul and ask him how it was that amid the perils of false brethren, he could keep the lamp of service burning, and Paul send back the response: "He loved me, and gave himself for me." That was the apostolic resource, a truth must be our resource today.

True Lamps of Service

The lamp of service is kept burning in hearts that feed on the Saviour's love. They who keep the Christian duties without it are as virgins that have not their lamps but take no oil to feed them. "He first loved me," says John. "He loved me and gave himself for me," says Paul. If you wish to be consistent in the doing of Christian service, you must realize the Saviour's love. That keeps the lamp blazing with a bright and steady light. Men and women, this thought of the Saviour's love for you is a tremendous power for restoring flickering lamps; it fills them full of oil. Men who endure to the end, whose lamps burn on throughout the years, are men who feed daily on the eternal love of Christ.

I remember some little while ago noticing a parched and barren pasture a thin line of beautiful green grass stretching across the whole breadth of the field. That thin line of green grass, when the burning rays of the hottest summer sun shone upon it, marked the course of a tiny stream, which quietly bathed its roots, as it stole away on its secret way. And sometimes in the parched field of human life where one and another droop away from Christian service, I have known men and women, whose lives kept fresh and bright and beautiful, and in a manner of fierce attack, amid the harsh, dry glare of ingratitude and disappointment, and I have said to myself, "The river of life is secretly bathing the roots. They are feeding upon the Saviour's love. So feed, and you will endure. Abide in Christ, and the lamp of service will burn forevermore."

So feed, and you will endure. Abide in Christ, and the lamp of service will burn forevermore.

seek converts among the most ignorant, and thus the tithes from these sources swell the funds at their disposal. It is only the enlightenment of the rising generation that they fear. For this reason also the regents of the University of Utah are removing the best men from the faculty, or compelling them to resign. Only thus do they think that they can save their great financial institution from loss.

I might mention numerous instances of the efforts of the regents of the University of Utah to stifle education. Some time ago, the state of Utah appropriated a sum of money to promote the study of American archeology. A museum was established at the university, and at the head of it was placed one of the foremost scholars in the field of American archeology, a man of rare culture and attainments, one of the gentlest and greatest men I have ever met. At first the regents were enthusiastic in their support of the museum, for they believed that the research work among the caves and mounds and cliff dwellings of the early Indians would yield proof that the "Book of Mormon" was a real history of the American Indians, and that the Indians are one of the lost tribes of Israel, as the "Book of Mormon" represents them to be. But when it was shown that the "Book of Abraham" was merely an imaginary translation of Egyptian hieroglyphs, they realized that investigation in the field of American archeology would surely prove that the "Book of Mormon" had an equally questionable origin. Then they lost interest in the museum, and now they even regret that there is a museum.

Here is another instance: The University of Utah is in great need of dormitories for girl students. An appropriation of $50,000 was requested from the state for that purpose. The request was rejected on the ground of economy; but at once that same amount of money was appropriated for building a colosseum at the agricultural fair grounds, where cattle might be exhibited for a single week.

Too long have the regents of the University of Utah been blind to modern progress. Now they are powerless to check the spread of enlightenment. For a time their missionaries may bring converts from among the ignorant; but that too will cease.

For a time the cultured Mormons may reinstate the name "Mormon"; they do not know what else to do for themselves; but Mormonism is dying; the beginning of the end is here.

In the "Book of Mormon," page 57, chapter 23, an imaginary prophecy directed against the Christian Church. It may be quoted here, as the prophecy, though false, yet is true in a sense; for it is a boomerang returning to smite the church from which it came. It reads:

"For the time speedily shall come, when the churches which are built up to get gain, and those who are built up to get power over the eyes of the world, and those who seek to live of the flesh and the things of the world, and to do all manner of iniquity; yea, in fine, all the world belong to the kingdom of the devil, are they who need fear and tremble and quake; they are they who must be brought low in the dust; they are those who must be consumed as stubble; and this according to the words of the prophet."

Counterfeit Virtue

SUNDAY, June 27. II Corinthians 11: 14. "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light." That is our peril. When vice approaches us wearing the garb of virtue, when the wolf comes in sheep's clothing, when Satan mimics the angels of light. If temptation always came to us in its native ugliness, and we saw black den in its company, none of us would ever follow its aim. If temptation brought chains to bind us we would steadily resist its approach; but it brings garlands to crown us, and we become the victims of its charms. It comes offering life, and cheer, and good times, and enlargement! It bribes us with money and popularity; it entices us with visions of prosperity and triumph. And we are dazzled by the rightness, not realizing that it is Satan who is decoyed out as an angel of light.

And therefore have we need of fine eyes in order to see through the skins of things to their very hearts. We want the discernment which can see the devil's head in the proffered crown, and the poison lurking in the gleaming wine. Yes, it is imperative that we know the Tempter at his first approach. We must not offer him opportunity by our delay, or at any time give him the benefit of the doubt. We must know him as soon as he appears and begins to display his dazzling wares. We must be able to discriminate among things that differ. "Lord, that I may receive my sight!"

Now, it is just this power of moral discernment which is the gift of the Holy Spirit. He is the purifier of our powers; and he will so discipline and refine our moral sense as to enable us to pierce every deceptive guise, and to expose the evil when it is sorrowed the garments of the good. He is the Spirit of enlightenment, and in his gracious fellowship we shall not be led astray. J. H. J.

The Divine Arm of Rescue

MONDAY, June 28. Isaiah 28: 9-20. "The living, the living, he shall praise thee." Have you ever committed a sin which you thought to be unpardonable, and suddenly found it pardoned? Have you roved for months under the shadow of impending calamity, and suddenly awaked to find the clouds dissipated and the blue heaven above your head? Have you been brought down to the verge of the grave, and suddenly realized that the Lord had breathed into you the inspiration of new life? Then you understand the transition which the good Hezekiah experienced when suddenly he was brought up from the pit of a premature death. He says: "Thou hast loved my soul from the pit." (R.V.) What an exquisite way of putting it! A mother, in her agony, saw her little child backing step by step to the edge of a precipice. She dared not cry out lest she should frighten it, but opened her arms with the most winning smile, and loved her nursing babe to the pit. But God has done more than that. His love has not only attracted but enveloped us; has borne down into the pit where we lay, and borne us up on eagle wings.

Now, as the living, we should praise him. Hezekiah vowed that he would sing his songs to stringed instruments all the days of his life. Around us and legions break in battle-shock; the shining contingent with the dark hosts of hell; the cries of the down-trodden and dying wail upon the ear; but amid all the din and tumult let the unvoiced solos or choruses of redeemed and victorious souls never fail to arise to God. We need not wait for the setting up of the eternal kingdom because our redemption has already arrived. We have been loved back from the pit. Hallelujah! F. B. M.

Root Out the Besetting Sin

TUESDAY, June 29. Hebrews 12: 1. "Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us." The Christian is likened to a runner who competes for a prize and must free himself from every impeding weight if he is to have any prospect of success. It is a note that finds response in the experience of most individuals, and the most godly.

Further, in the midst of his high-spirited reforming labors, was heard one day to cry out in agony, "My sin! my sin!" No one can read the confessions of Augustine without feeling the keenness with which this holy man realized the power of his besetting sin, and the narrow escape he had from destruction because of it. Paul seemed in terror at the thought, even as a preacher and an apostle, he might become a castaway.

How many a man has been on the verge of what seemed to be a great success in his career—every door beginning to swing wide before him—when one frailty, his particular and private sin unconquered, blocked his path, and he as a consequence just failed of attaining. This besetting sin, this one little "rift within the lute," is the tragedy against which Paul warns us. Sometimes this sin is known to the world; more often it is hid in the depths of the heart and only God and the man know the real reason for the ultimate failure.

We are told of a great bridge that was pronounced unsafe and finally made useless because a small birch seed had been blown into the crevice above the keystone of the arch and was left to grow until it became a tree. It sent its roots into the mortar and foundations, wrenching apart the structure of this great piece of masonry. As a seed or twig it could have been pulled out with the hand of a child, but left to grow, it ruined the bridge. "Sow an act and you reap a habit; sow a habit and you reap a character; sow a character and you reap a destiny."

Today, let me examine the foundations of my life. Today let me begin a determined effort to tear out root or branch any secret sin that may have planted itself in my heart or will, and gird myself anew, unhampered, unembarrassed, to run my race.

God Protects Those Who Do His Work

WEDNESDAY, June 30. John 9: 1-12. "I must work the works of him that sent me." In a frenzy of indignation the Jews had caught up the stones lying about for the repair of the temple, to inflict on our Lord the penalty of the blasphemer; but he passed unscathed through the midst of them. On his way down the marble staircase, his attention was arrested by this blind beggar. Though there was every need to put as far a distance as possible between himself and the flying missiles, he stooped, made clay, and leisurely healed him. His enemies might chafe and swarm around him; but they could not hurt, nor penetrate, with word or stone, the encasing envelope of his Father's care. Secure of that protection, he was able to go and come, fearless and unharmed, serene and quiet, restful and peaceful, blessing and blessed. Let us seek that quiet heart which is so engrossed with God and his work that it considers neither difficulty nor peril. There the divine Spirit broods undisturbed, however wild the tumult of the world.

It is not possible for busy Christian workers to acquire this attitude, unless they have learned to let God work his works through them. This is what our Lord meant when he referred to his Father's works. The Father wrought in him, and he worked out what was wrought in. This is the secret of the quiet heart—to be brooks of Siloam, through which the melting snows pour their volume; clay kneaded by the Master-Potter to be vessels of honor; the slender wire along which heaven may transmit its messages to earth. It was thus that the great apostle lived, who said, "Christ hath wrought through me in word and deed to make the Gentiles obedient." We must work (R.V.), i. e., the disciple is necessary for his part, as the Lord for his.

Seeking to Learn God's Way

THURSDAY, July 1. Psalm 27: 11. "Teach me thy way, O God, and lead me in a plain path." Some time we have traveled through a deep wood and come to a place where the path has almost lost itself in a tangle of underbrush. Then we have longed for a friendly guide to put us right, to show us a plain path leading to the desired goal.

It is thus with life. We may start all right; the path is plain before us, and we follow it easily with a song on our lips, because the way seems so plainly marked we can follow it without difficulty. Then mystifying obstacles come, perhaps in the guise of friends who tell us our path is not the right one, and that we should follow them. Or we see easier, pleasanter paths, on which travelers seem to be having a better time than we are experiencing on our more straight and rigid way. There are little crooked paths that seem to lead to quick success, and we wonder if we dare abandon the long, straight road for the short-cut.

It is then that we need the prayer of the Psalmist: "Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path." Then it is that we need to appreciate that God never turns a deaf ear to the sincere cry of his children. Jehovah's answer to the Psalmist was: "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee."

How does God teach us and counsel us? He guides us by a spiritual voice that we alone can hear, the still small voice of conscience; he also guides us through his Word. We are to search the Scriptures to find his instructions, the lessons he has plainly written for those wandering in troubled ways. God calls through every page of his Book to his people, begging them to come to him and learn of him; his way is the right way and will lead them to happiness. Today let me begin a regular study of God's laws!

Acquaint now thyself with God and be at peace:
Thereby good shall come unto thee.

We Are Children of the Resurrection

FRIDAY, July 2. Colossians 2: 11-23. "Triumphing over them in it," i. e., the Cross. The Son of God entered the lists with Death to try the question as to which should be the reigning power in the universe—Life or Death, Light or Darkness, Corruption or Immortal Strength. They grappled for mastery, each with the other. At first Death appeared to be victorious. He appeared to triumph over the one Man, as over all other men. The Prince of Life was slain. The hour and power of Death vaunted their supremacy. Chaos seemed likely to invade and spoil the palace of life. But it was only for a moment. It was not possible that the Christ should see corruption, or be held by the great jailer. Life broke from the sheath and hush of death into the gay rapture of the Easter morn. As our glorious Lord emerged from the empty tomb, it was in triumph and as a conqueror. Behind him were the neatly wrapped ceremonies of death, indicative of his unhurried leisure. Before him lay a garden, where spring flowers exhaled their rarest fragrance. Life had triumphed over Death, Light over Darkness, Truth over Lies, God over Sin.

Death and Hades still exist, but they are shadowy ghosts. The one is Christ's sable servant, who can only enact his bidding; the other is the vestibule of his palace. Let us live on the Easter side of death, and appropriate the benefits of our Lord's victory. We are the children of the resurrection. "You will never see me die," said a veteran believer to his children, "I shall only fall asleep." And so it befell. By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death. Let us claim a like experience!

Loyalty to God and Country

SATURDAY, July 3. Matthew 22: 21. "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's." Loyalty to our country stands next to our allegiance to Almighty God. One can be true to principle, to patriotism, to conscience and to God in the same noble action.

When King Philip of Spain tried to bribe Prince William of Orange, the prince sent back this message: "Not for life nor wife nor children nor land would I mix in my cup one drop of the poison of Treason!" The king of Spain then hired an assassin to kill him. But his name and character live on forever. Another example of devotion to country is found in a soldier of the French army in the war of 1750. He had wandered into the woods for a stroll, when he was ambushed by the enemy. Instantly a hundred bayonets pricked his breast and a voice whispered, "Make the least noise and you are a dead man." Without a second's hesitation he cried, "The enemy is here!" He fell lifeless to the ground, but 25,000 of the French army were saved. Devotion to duty had become so strong a habit that he never thought of parleying or pleading for his life.

Giving one's self to truth and righteousness, whether it be in the direction of national preservation, social benefit, moral reform, or the salvation of mankind, makes heroic characters that will never die.

A LONG-AGO MEDITATION

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies; thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

The Path to War

THE immense powers of the President and his grave responsibilities are brought out clearly in the latest note to Germany. The gist of that whole note is contained in the last sentence. Speaking through Acting Secretary Lansing, President Wilson said:

"The Government of the United States therefore deems it reasonable to expect that the Imperial German Government will adopt the measures necessary to put these principles into practice, in respect of the safeguarding of American lives and American ships, and asks for assurances that this will be done."

The principles referred to, as set forth in the same note, are that the lives of non-combatants cannot lawfully or rightfully be put in jeopardy by the capture or destruction of non-resisting merchantmen, and to recognize the obligation to take sufficient precautions to ascertain whether a suspected merchantman is in fact of belligerent nationality or is in fact carrying contraband of war under a neutral flag.

In another section of the note the assertion is made that the Lusitania was torpedoed and sunk without so much as a challenge or a warning. The note is so specific in demanding the assurances from Germany that the question at once arises, What will be the action of the American Government in the event that the required assurances are not given; or that such assurances as may be given are not considered satisfactory?

This international situation again calls attention to the fact that the President is what might be called the manager of the foreign affairs of the United States. If he be impulsive or reckless or if his judgment be ill-considered he may bring about a situation which, while not one of actual war, may inevitably lead to war. It does not lessen the serious responsibility of the President that he has no power of himself to declare war, if such a condition is brought about that war takes place and Congress is left the mere function of making the formal declaration and providing the means for carrying it on. The question in the President's mind always should be whether he correctly interprets the sentiment of the American people in grave international questions such as the one that has arisen with Germany. If the sentiment is divided the responsibility for conservatism will weigh heavily upon him.

In the case of the note to Germany it is to be observed that this is very far from being what is known in international relations as an ultimatum. Yet the definite demand for specific assurances means that if these assurances are not given the President must take action of some sort or else reverse the policy on which he has entered and continue diplomatic negotiations along the line advocated by Mr. Bryan.

Should the President take the responsibility of interpreting Germany's answer, whatever that may be, as not giving satisfactory assurances, logically the next step would be to break off diplomatic relations by withdrawing the American ambassador to Germany. On her part Germany, as a measure of self-respect, would withdraw the German ambassador to the United States. The two countries, while still at peace, would therefore be under the necessity of conducting diplomatic relations through third parties. This would be rather difficult at the present time, since there are so few neutral countries. It might be that Spain or Portugal would be asked to perform this duty, since the Scandinavian countries and Holland are so closely involved in the war situations that their neutrality may not be counted on for a definite period.

The withdrawal of the American ambassador from Germany would entail great inconvenience on the Allies, since the interests of their nationals in Germany have been entrusted to the United States, and this country, through its diplomatic officers, has also looked after their prisoners. Similarly the American ambassador in London has looked after the welfare of German subjects there and also the German prisoners. Should there be no diplomatic relations with the United States, Germany naturally would not care to trust her people in England to the care of the American ambassador.

This is one aspect of the present situation. It is to be borne in mind that in ordinary circumstances the withdrawal of a minister or ambassador or the suspension of diplomatic relations is by no means a sign of war. But the present situation is an extremely delicate one and the possibilities of a given course of action cannot be foretold.

It has happened sometimes that countries have gotten along for quite a while without regular diplomatic intercourse, but generally this situation has arisen between a very strong country and a much weaker one, which could not afford to go to war. England, for several years after the murder of the king and queen of Serbia by the army officers, refused to recognize what it called the regicide government. It sent no minister to Serbia.

The United States a few years ago, when there was an acute diplomatic controversy with Chile, was on the point of withdrawing its minister. This, however, would not have meant any probability of war with Chile.

But it must be kept in mind that in the present world-conflict precedents based on peace conditions are not safe guides as to what may result from the breaking off of diplomatic intercourse.

Some international lawyers hold that the President should go further than merely to withdraw our ambassador to Germany. They hold that in the name of the government he could seize any German ships now interned in the harbors of the United States; could also seize the wireless plant at Sayville, which is the only means of communication with Germany, and could also adopt other rigorous measures.

Such measures, however, would come close to actual warfare and would probably be construed by Germany as such; they are hardly worthy of consideration as so-called peaceful means of bringing Germany to give the assurances demanded in the President's note. They illustrate, however, the vast powers which the President possesses and the necessity of correctly interpreting the will of the American people.

The Heart of a Child

NATURE appeals to children with a power such as we grown-ups seem to have forgotten. They are a part of it, and woodlands, daisied fields and sunny meadows are their natural setting. Their hearts, not yet seared and saddened by the world and its cares, respond to all the charms of verdure and blossom and bird-song and summer breezes. God has put his finest handiwork in youth and nature, and they belong to each other. These reflections come to us as we are reminded that our beautiful Children's Paradise at Mont-Lawn-on-the-Hudson opens its gates this week for the reception of the first contingent of its little guests. During the season over twenty-five hundred children of the poor will enjoy a delightful outing there. These tiny guests are chosen from homes of poverty and privation. They have no other hope of getting a holiday. But a ten-days' stay at Mont-Lawn makes amends for all the hardships of the rest of the year. To its young guests the Christian Herald Children's Home is indeed like "a section of heaven let down to earth"—a place of boundless pleasure and innocent, satisfying enjoyment.

We would ask those who are now planning their summer holiday and looking ahead to the pleasures that await their own little folks, to give a thought to the children of Mont-Lawn. Many kind-hearted friends annually provide the means for giving an outing to these sons and daughters of poverty. You who read this can take as your protégé some little one to whom you will give a real holiday, probably the first one he or she has ever known. We wish everybody could realize the joy that comes of learning that we can be the means of bringing back the roses and tan to faded cheeks, strength and vigor to puny limbs and joy and gladness to young hearts that already may have felt too heavily the burden of sadness and poverty.

On Hallowed Ground

EZRA, the celebrated Jewish scribe, who four and a half centuries before the birth of Christ led the second expedition of Hebrews back from their exile in Babylon to Palestine, is said, according to tradition, to have returned long afterward to Babylon, where he died at the patriarchal age of 120 years. Jewish history records that he died on the same year in which Alexander came to Jerusalem—a year that witnessed the death of the last of the prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. With their passing away, the line of the prophets became extinct. In the Talmud it is stated that Ezra died at Zamzuma, a town on the Tigris, and a very ancient dome-roofed mausoleum, near the junction of that river with the Euphrates, still remains and is pointed out to travelers as the last resting-place of the great author of the Jewish Canon, to whom is ascribed the present literature of the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, I and II Esdras, Daniel, the twelve prophets and also it is said, the 119th Psalm.

This hallowed spot, venerated almost equally by Jews, Mohammedans and Christians, has now shared the fate of many other sacred places, the old Bible lands, in being brought within the zone of the war. This whole region, which has been the kish territory for many centuries past, is now the scene of a struggle on a vaster scale than any that has ever been witnessed in that remote section of the ancient East. Ezra's story of the return of the exiles, and the part he took in the historic expedition, will now have a new interest for Bible readers.

An Arctic Illusion

TO DISCOVER a continent, to see with one's own eyes its mountain ranges, to note the out in the distance beyond the intervening sea of ice a territory of vast dimensions, to put it on the map and to give it a name—these are things that give joy to the heart of the Arctic explorer. This is what Peary did when he went to the frozen north and made his famous discovery of Crocker Land in 1906. When Donald B. MacMillan, in command of the latest expedition, sailed for the Arctic a year ago, it was in the hope of being able to reach and explore the new-found territory and to plant the Stars and Stripes where no white man's foot had yet trod. For days and weeks they sought for the missing continent. The weather was perfect and they sailed into the Polar Sea, closely following the route of Peary, only to be convinced at last that their quest was in vain and that there was no Crocker Land! What had seemed to be an immense tract of territory, with hills, valleys and now capped peaks, was only an optical illusion of the Arctic—a mirage, beckoning the wanderers to disappointment. Not even a solitary island broke the dreariness of the northern wastes. For more than a century explorers have been searching for a great continent in the icy north. There seemed to be good scientific reasons for such an expectation. It became a legend among them, and, although none claimed to have seen it, each successive expedition was buoyed with the hope of being the fortunate discoverers. But even the shattering of the dream, which had been given the appearance of reality by the overconfidence of Peary, will not lessen the lure of the Arctic. Who knows whether in that vast sea some adventurous spirit may not yet make discoveries that will more than make amends for the latest disappointment? It is quite within the range of possibilities that the mirage seen both by Peary and MacMillan may after all prove to be the real something definite that lies far beyond the "frozen north" yet reached. It would be interesting to learn what the scientists have to say on the subject.

A "Silent Protest"

IT WAS a remarkable protest, full of unity and impressiveness, which thirty women addressed from American colleges—wearing the suffrage sash with its glittering legend—presented in the United States District Court in New York City a few days ago. They stood up in defiance while a throng of aliens took the oath to become American citizens. Many different nationalities were represented, and the answers, given in English, with occasional difficulties of comprehension, were no doubt very different from those that would have been given to the court had the questions been addressed to the party of educated women who watched the proceedings. Of course the silent protest was not directed against the giving of the suffrage to the foreigners, although many of the latter were evidently of inferior education. These American women knew that, ever since the foundation of this government, we have treated all applicants from other lands who desire to become naturalized, on a basis of equality, provided they met the requirements of our law. The women's protest was leveled against the exclusion of their own sex from citizenship. They made it somewhat of a solemn function in the desire that it should bring vividly before the eyes of those who witnessed it the unequal attitude of the state toward its sons and daughters. It was a new way of giving home the women's argument, and infinitely more than the clamor of parades and speech-making.

Seventeen-Year Locusts

THAT well-known pest, the "seventeen-year locust," is again due in our land, and a warning from the Department of Agriculture has been sent out against him. The technical name of the advancing horde of hopping, flying, buzzing things is "Brood 6 of the Cicada." The government recommends some practical methods of confronting the march of these destroyers of vegetation. In them it says: "Some recent experience indicates that trees thoroughly sprayed with Bordeaux mixture, or a lime wash, are apt to be avoided by the cicada, especially if there are other trees in the neighborhood on which they can deposit their eggs. The most reliable means of protecting nurseries and young orchards is by collecting the insects in bags or umbrellas from the trees in the early morning or late evening, when they are somewhat torpid. Such collection should be begun at the first appearance of the pest, and should be continued each day. The worst affected branches should be removed. The less injured limbs may be coated on the wounded part with grafting wax, or moderate hard soap." Wherever there is some enemy to pounce upon and destroy it. It is such a lesson that a successful warfare is waged by brave and true troops against these enemies of art and air, of body, mind and soul. There is this reference to the destruction of vegetation by locusts among the Hebrews: "He took and the locusts came, and ate all the vegetation of the land, and did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground." (Ps. 105:4, 35.)

Chiting in Examinations

AT THE annual examinations of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis there was some cheating done, which attracted the notice and condemnation of the public at large. There was such unusual excellence in the papers of those who were examined, and especially upon the part of those who had the term had been alibit, that a suspicion of fraud was aroused. Investigation revealed the fact that examination questions had been secured in advance by stealth, and that a base action had been practiced. The department looked upon the wrongdoing as being quite serious, and Secretary of the Navy Daniels is giving the matter his consideration, with the likelihood of a rigid application of discipline for those guilty of the wrongdoing. It would have been infinitely better to have "lured" than to pass by fraud. The action was a injustice to the students, most of whom played a more splendid set of young men can be found mentally and morally as well as physically, than our boys at Annapolis and West Point, and it is shame to smirch the institution by the petty gain of duffards. There is no place in American life where dishonor counts for anything but a iniquity. Fortunately, it is the rarest exception among the young men who are the cherished sons and the gallant guardians of the commonwealth. Of those lacking integrity it is said: "And they will deceive every one his neighbor, and will speak the truth." (Jer. 9: 5.)

Denmark Grants Woman Suffrage

ON JUNE 5 the Danish Parliament passed unanimously a radical constitution, granting universal suffrage to women and abolishing all the privileges of the highest taxpayers. During the afternoon on which the king signed the constitution, a large procession of women of all classes assembled, saluting him. The queen also received a deputation representing the processionists. Later the queen went to Parliament to thank the government and House. The Scandinavian women have been pioneers in the cause of female education and suffrage. The action of the Danish Parliament marks the rapid progress of the world toward a high and pure democracy which has its foundation in the love and liberty of Christ: "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8: 36.)

Dollar-a-Day Millionaire

THERE was a man in one of the leading cities of the country who is said to have accumulated a fortune of a million dollars in thirty years on a salary of only a dollar a day. It is explained that he was a doorman at one of the prominent restaurants, and being exceedingly polite and tactful, he received large amounts in tips. Moreover, friendly men of wealth and influence advised him who designed the first Confederate flag, the "Stars and Bars," a committee was appointed by the United Confederate Veterans. It reported to the convention that the late Major Orrin Randolph Smith of Louisburg, N. C., was the author of the design, and the report was adopted. Some Southern women sent a letter to the convention requesting public prayer each day for the peace of the world. The request was accompanied by the following beautiful note: "It seems to us that prayers for peace, coming in the midst of the business of the session, would recall to men the blessing of peace our own country enjoys; that it would be a great help to all who hear it and would be an inspiration to those in other sections of the country who might read it." June 14 was Flag Day, and the words of Oliver Wendell Holmes were verified: "One flag, one land, one heart, one hand, one nation evermore." A united nation prayed for world peace, and for the fulfillment of this prophecy: "Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Micah 4: 3.)

The Maine Memorial

THE unveiling and dedication of the Maine Memorial Monument, erected by the government to the dead of the battleship destroyed seventeen years ago in Havana harbor, was the principal feature of Memorial Day ceremonies in the Arlington National Cemetery. President Wilson, Secretary Bryan, Secretary Daniels and Governor Frank B. Willis of Ohio were on the program. First, flowers were scattered over the graves of 2,111 unknown Union soldiers. Second, the graves of Spanish War veterans were decorated. Third, the exercises in memory of the Civil War dead, under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic. Fourth, the unveiling of the Maine Monument. The monument is the mainmast and fighting top of the battleship, which long lay embedded with other wreckage in the bottom of Havana harbor. Restored and rigged as it was on the deck of the Maine, it now rises from a marble and granite base, chiseled in the form of a gun turret, with the names of the Maine's 264 victims carved on the curved exterior. As a part of the ceremony, Frank Bagley Daniels and Jonathan Worth Daniels, sons of the secretary of the navy and nephews of Ensign Worth Bagley, the first American officer killed in the war with Spain, raised an ensign to the top of the mast and hoisted signal flags flaring to the breeze the words, "Maine, 1915." This fitting memorial to the heroes who perished on the Maine will be an education and inspiration to the living and especially the younger generation. In olden times they had memorial stones to voice and perpetuate public gratitude: "Then shall ye answer them, that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; and these stones shall be for a memorial . . . for ever." (Joshua 4: 7.)

Berlin Soldiers Forbidden Bars

THE military authorities have issued an order applicable to Berlin, forbidding both officers of all ranks and private soldiers from entering any of the large number of "luxurious restaurants and cafes" in Berlin, as well as all bars and wine rooms. The order contends that the purpose of furloughs granted to officers and men for physical recovery from the rigors of life at the front and the recuperation of nerves and body is seriously endangered by frequenting these restaurants and wine rooms. In the recent riots in Mexico, the saloons were all closed by military order, as a measure of safety. The cold question of efficiency in war has dealt the liquor traffic in Europe a staggering blow. However looked at, it is true that wine is dangerous: "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." (Prov. 23: 32.)

NEW YORK BARGE CANAL

THE first boat, the state tug Schenectady, bearing the state superintendent of public works, General Wotherspoon, and State Engineer Frank M. Williams, entered the first lock of the new Barge Canal of New York from the level of the Hudson River, opposite Troy, recently. The next day the eastern end of the Barge Canal was formally opened, and for the first time the five locks between the Hudson and Mohawk Rivers were filled with water and operated. The enormous undertaking has united and enlarged the Erie Canal, 387 miles long and costing originally $52,540,000; the Champlain Canal, 81 miles long, costing $4,044,000; and the Oswego Canal, 38 miles long, costing $5,240,000. The Erie Canal was started in 1792, and six miles were put in practical operation. In 1803, New York State bought out the company that owned it. Under Governor Clinton in 1825 the canal was opened from Buffalo to Albany, a distance of 352 miles, and the time was reduced from twenty to ten days, and the freight from $100 to $3 a ton. In 1903 the people voted for an expenditure of $101,000,000, and additional amounts have been required. The Barge Canal is three times the length of the Suez Canal and cost very much more money. The millions of bushels of wheat, corn and other farm and manufactory products that will be carried through the canal suggest the water transportation of grain and other freight thus mentioned: "They lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea." (Acts 27: 38.)

as to the most profitable investments for his money. Attention is called to this millionaire doorman by a suit he instituted against a trust company for the recovery of a house which his son, who had a power of attorney to act for him, had sold for what was thought to be but half of its value. It was also charged that he had appropriated the money to his own personal credit and had lost it in Wall Street. The father made the plea that the property was sold while he himself was ill and mentally incapacitated for business transactions, and he asks to be released from any responsibility assumed for him by his son, and that a deed for the house, which he says is worth $80,000, be restored to him. Many a fortune that has been laboriously gathered by careful saving and wise investment is quickly dissipated when it gets into less experienced hands. In Scripture the Master thus rebukes the careless manager of the wealth that belongs to another: "Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury." (Matt. 25: 27.)

WAR IS ~~HELL~~ BUSINESS

IN a recent public speech Hon. Frederic C. Howe, United States commissioner of immigration, said: "When men of eminence are urging war or preparations for war, it is necessary that we have all the facts before us, including those that are usually hidden." In a speech in the House of Representatives some time before, Representative Clyde H. Tavenner of Illinois declared, "If one of the leading powers can be induced to take on an additional superdreadnought, it is used as an argument as to why the other leading powers should do the same. It works as an endless chain, with the war burden ever and ever increasing on the backs of the taxpayers." And he also said: "There seems to be no limit to the extremes to which the war traders are willing to go for business."

In seeking the hidden causes of war the activities of the comparatively small group of wealthy men who control the manufacture of war materials come more and more into sight. Public speakers and writers on this theme appear to be converging toward an open accusation that war itself is deliberately fomented by this industry in order to create a greater market.

It would not be so difficult a matter as many might suppose to create a demand and thereafter a market for war materials. Mr. Howe has pointed out that wars are not started by the people, but by their rulers and the privileged classes, "and the class that rules the present warring countries," he states, "is the class that owns railroads, mining, oil and landed concessions all over the world. They own billions of bonds in foreign countries and weak dependencies."

The men who compose this class have a very real and extensive and dangerous influence upon the press and other sources of public education in every country. From the daily papers and from certain classes of magazines, "public opinion" is formed. We are dependent upon these sources for our news of the day. And the news of the day affects our minds and our hearts. One of a prominent group of dailies, issued in many cities in the United States, in a strong editorial on the present relations of this country and Germany, used this expression: "Not in newspapers, whose owners are knit by ties of finance and matrimony to aristocracies and huge interests across the sea, is heard the true voice of the American people." Thus, by admission within its own ranks, the press of America is open to the charge of being in some measure under the dominance of those men whose business is to trade in war.

Touching practically all business at some point; vitally interested in the political complexion of their country and the foreign relations of their government; able to make or unmake the fortunes of multitudes by a word; allied to the owners of influential newspapers and periodicals "by ties of finance"; exercising great influence upon educational institutions and upon the church itself; how simple a matter it is after all, for a great group of intellectual, strong-willed, unscrupulous men to make a whole people believe their nation stands in danger of war . . . needs most of all a huge reserve of war material . . . should show the world that it is unafraid . . . should, in any emergency, assume toward any other nation an attitude of uncompromising sternness . . . should plunge into war to maintain its rights and prestige and all that . . . should terrify its opponents with a prodigal use of shot and shell (the opposing nation, of course, being urged on to the same display of strength); . . . and, finally, should make peace with slowness, and, warned by the experience, pile up a greater military reserve strength than ever against the day of the next international emergency.

Mr. Howe has stated that an arms and ammunition factory of one European country now at war wrote to its agent in another country now at war with the first, "Get an article into one of the most widely read newspapers to the following effect: 'The minister of war has decided to accelerate considerably the provision of new pattern machine guns, and to order double the quantity at first intended.'" This, Mr. Howe says, was designed to stimulate war sentiment in the first country, there being no war at that time. And an American writer, discussing the present war in Europe, says:

"We must, as a people, bear the blame, if blame there be, for providing the warring nations of today with their most effective weapons."

disturbed resources to draw from, but are able to place contracts in the United States for shot, shell and powder on such a scale that, whatever the prodigality of its use, no tactical advantage in the field need be neglected or postponed because the supplies of ammunition are running low." The same article declares that "by October agents for the governments of Great Britain, France, Russia and Italy were beginning to arrive in the United States in large numbers and were collecting bids on everything that enters into the conduct of modern warfare." In the Boston Transcript of June 5 the rumor was printed that Earl Kitchener was about to appoint a governmental representative with shells, cannon, explosives; a thing and everything that will kill men. Particularly remarkable is the fact that to turn erstwhile manufacturers of peaceful things into European armaments. In one magazine of armaments it is stated that "The Westinghouse Electric Company, which has one order for 2,000,000 rifles, is expecting another for nearly as many. An amount, will probably enter permanently into the rifle and ammunition supply business." Making of lathes and other machines that are necessary in the manufacture of shells, etc., are practically turning their attention to the war market, and doing so far as to suggest to customers in peaceful lines the advantage to be derived from turning their shops into shrapnel-shed factories. And all sorts of plants equipped with machinery that are turned to making one or another part of Death's war scythe are being driven into the field. American concerns are putting top-notch prices on their output. Powder has gone up from 10 cents a pound to 45 cents and high; the profit on rifles is said to be 50 per cent; prices on all other munitions are in accord.

Since January England, France and Russia "have placed with industrial companies here orders for $500,000,000 worth of shrapnel, rifles, cannon, cartridges, and other munition and supplies," says one daily. And it is well known that the opportunities are almost at the point of spontaneous combustion, they are being worked so hard. "Not in eight years," says a monthly magazine of reviews, "has Wall Street witnessed the activity that developed toward the end of March and continued in millions of share days for nearly six weeks. During that time the stocks of manufacturing companies identified with foreign contracts appreciated values more rapidly than had any other group in the history of the New York Stock Exchange . . . Some of the stocks of ordnance companies advanced from $200 to $300 a share. One of them sold as high as $1,500 a share."

THE convincing argument that this business is found in the fact that the manufacture of shot and shell is engaged in solely for profit. The profit is not a factor in it. The collusion of individual manufacturers and government officials in order to do the government on its war supply contracts was shown up in detail by Representative Tavenner in Congress. It has been stated that in 1893 American armor was being sold to Russia at $240 a ton while the United States Government was charged $610 a ton. In 1913 the War Department paid $20 to the ammunition ring for shrapnel which the government was making in its own arsenal for $15. Even greater disparity in prices was shown in other articles, and it has been repeatedly stated in the press that the prices being charged the governments of Europe for American war supplies today are yielding enormous profits. So enormous are they, and so delicate is the purpose to take advantage of the needs of those governments, that the apology which has been made for the traffic, viz.: that it is carried on in the interests of our own land, is worth more than rubbish.

It would seem as though there could be nothing more horrible than supplying nations at war with the means to keep up the carnage, solely in order to make money by the transaction. Yet there is one thing more horrible: to foment war between nations in order to create a profitable market for instruments of death.

It is not to be forgotten in this connection that there is at present in the United States a very strong anti-war party; nor that their "frenzied bodings" for the United States include not only the "menace" in Germany but in Mexico and Japan as well.

"Oh, Little Town of Bethlehem!" Old and New Versions

BY Phillips Brooks

BY William Bayard Hale

O LITTLE town of Bethlehem!
How still we see thee lie;
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by;
Yet in thy dark streets shineth
The everlasting Light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.

For Christ is born of Mary,
And gathered all above,
While mortals sleep, the angels keep
Their watch of wondering love.
O morning stars, together
Proclaim the holy birth!
And praises sing to God the King,
And peace to men on earth.

How silently, how silently,
The wondrous gift is given!
So God imparts to human hearts
The blessings of his heaven.
No ear may hear his coming,
But in this world of sin,
Where meek souls will receive him still,
The dear Christ enters in.

O holy Child of Bethlehem!
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin, and enter in,
Be born in us today.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great glad tidings tell;
Oh come to us, abide with us,
Our Lord Emmanuel!

O LITTLE town of Bethlehem!
How ill we see thee lie;
'Rove thy red moil and sleepless toil
The shamed stars pass by;
For from thy dark streets spreadeth
An everlasting blight,
And heart-shed tears of dreadful years
Flow forth from thee tonight.

For death is born within thy walls,
And, gathered all above,
While "Christians" sleep, the angels keep Their watch of anguished love.
O morning stars, together,
Bewail the ghastly birth
That insult flings on him who sings
Of peace to men on earth!

How shamefully, how blamefully
The bloody gift is given;
The furnace glows to slay no foes
Who have against us striven;
We forge the horrid weapons
'Gainst men who've done no wrong
To us; they bleed just for our greed—
The free, the brave, the strong!

O holy Child of Bethlehem!
Descend again to earth;
Redeem the name, blot out the shame
Of Bethlehem's unworth;
Help us resolve, a nation,
Throughout this peaceful land,
War must its cursed and bitter worst
Without our aiding hand!

"Government by the people is no more a Yankee notion than is the superdreadnought. The proposition that all men are created free and equal is not more distinctively American than is the revolver or a machine-gun. The contention that 'the square deal' should prevail in diplomacy was made in America, as were the submarine and the aeroplane. This nation holds that the arguments advanced to sustain the claim of militarism to public approval are fallacious, but the smoothbore 42-centimeter howitzer by which modern fortifications have been rendered obsolete is a product of American inventiveness. On land, on sea, in the air and under the water the war of wars, decreed by kings and ministers hating American ideals, is being fought with American weapons."

WE WILL put aside for a later and more extended article the question of direct cause and effect between the manufacture of munitions and war, and glance here at this industry during the progress of the present war.

According to a recent article in the American Review of Reviews, "Gunpowder, backed by inexhaustible supplies of ammunition, will win the war over superior military strategy and a preponderance of men. This is why the Allies are confident of success, for they have not only their own un-headquarters in New York, to take charge of the purchase and transportation of war supplies from the United States and Canada. Only tremendous business would prompt such a step.

The Remington Arms Union Metallic Cartridge Company and allied corporations are said to have under construction at Bridgeport, Conn., sixteen new buildings in order to take care of the grand opportunity which the war has thrown their way. By a deal with the Baldwin Locomotive Works, according to the press, the Remington Arms and Ammunition Company is to rent a new building of the Baldwin works covering sixteen acres, for the manufacture of rifles for Russia, paying, it is stated, a dollar royalty on each rifle manufactured. As the initial war order was for 1,500,000 rifles (if the report is true), the "rent" will be quite worth while, not to speak of the Remington's profit of $10 or $12 a rifle. Of course, at such rates, no one connected with either the Baldwin concern or the Remington wants the war to be prolonged. Not at all. Is it too much to ask if the wives and daughters of the stockholders in those corporations are equally "interested" in the slaughter of husbands and fathers on Russian battlefields?

On all sides we read of boom orders for arms and ammunition, shrapnel

THE WAR SEEN THROUGH THE CAMERA

THE average person probably has little idea how busy the camera has been in the war. Many an ambitious news photographer has risked his life and risked severe military discipline, in order to get views of war activities at the front. And of scenes more easily obtained in the wake of armies, photographs by the thousand have poured into American newspaper offices. Below we give a few such striking incidents of the war.

In all the warring countries women have been taking an increasing share in the home duties of their countries. Besides serving in various civic capacities in the cities, young women of England, it is said, are learning general farming, and the picture below shows girls following the harrow. To the right of that picture is a photograph of a species of defense, a spiked field, said to have been adopted in a neutral country.

Jean Marie Coujolle, 26 years old, one of the first badly wounded French soldiers to be invalided and take up military duties at home. He is at the left of the be-medaled veteran.

One of the ironies of the captured soldier's fate is to be obliged to build his own prison walls, and these German prisoners are erecting a wire fence enclosure around Alexandra Palace, England, where they are interned.

More Than One Thousand Re

IF WE ARE TO JUDGE by the letters we receive from owners of Reo cars, telling us of their plans and asking for suggestions as to the proposed trip, fully that number will cross the continent to California between now and November.

THAT IS NOT COUNTING the thousands of others who will take the Reo Route to the Fair from Northern, Southern and Mid-Western points. In some cases these will travel greater distances than that directly across the continent.

AND IT WILL BE A WONDERFUL TOUR—wonderful. Perhaps the most wonderful any motorist has ever taken. And for once we use that much abused term in its proper sense.

IT WILL REPAY a thousand times those who are so wise as to decide and so fortunate to be able to take it.

IF YOU HAVE NEVER crossed this continent—if you have never met your more distant neighbors face to face—then it will be a trip of inestimable profit, invaluable information and indescribable pleasure.

AND THOSE BENIGHTED AMERICANS who are so familiar with other countries, so pitifully uninformed about their own, will be the recipients of surprises innumerable—and they will return better Americans.

THEY WILL BE PROUD of their own land, where previously they were half ashamed of what their European acquaintances had taught them to consider its crudity, its "newness."

YES, IT IS NEW—WONDERFULLY NEW! Thank providence it is so new—so fertile in its virginity it can support in luxury not only the hundred millions now within its borders, but those other millions who would come if they could.

WONDERFULLY NEW! And your European, familiar only with formal garden landscape effects, might also call the scenery crude—fresh as it is from the hand of the Creator, unspoiled by the artificiality of man.

MAGNIFICENT IN ITS RUGGEDNESS as the men and women who live there—and vast beyond conception.

WELL WORTH WHILE that tour—worth all you may spend and more, much more, than you will feel you can afford to spend.

WE SAID "FEEL" YOU CAN AFFORD! For, if all time is living—if he who sees most, hears most, kens most, lies most, who shall set a limit to the time that tour is worth to persons to see and minds to grasp the significance of what they see!

AT EVERY TURN of the road new wonders, surprises and delights greet the senses.

SCENERY THAT FOR VARIETY and magnificence, is not surpassed by that of any other country in the world.

HAVE YOU SEEN the natural wonders of Europe? Well, they are duplicated—every one. But on a more magnificent scale, and because still natural. And there are no romancing guides, none, for your senses will tell you more.

INLAND SEAS beside which the famed lakes of Italy are but ponds. Mountain ranges that many times multiply the magnificence of the few famous Alpine peaks. Rivers longer, broader and more beautiful as the Rhine.

YOU'LL SEE FORESTS PRIMEVAL the extent of which you cannot grasp; matchless in coloring and in variety of their forests beside which the press-agented "Bois" and the Schwarzwald but formal groves set on a checkerboard.

AND TO LEND A TOUCH of adventure, you may cross a desert as Sahara—but which already American ingenuity is reclaiming in tile fields.

YOU'LL SEE ALL THESE as, day after day, the panorama unfolds before your Reo. And the more you have seen of other countries the better will you be able to appreciate your own.

IN A PURELY MATERIAL WAY you will profit by the trip. You will return with a broader conception of the magnitude of the country, the purchasing power of its people; of its capacity to absorb more than you had ever hoped, any article of necessity, convenience, or of luxury you may have to sell.

Will Make the Transcontinental

YOU WILL SEE FARMS that are miles, not meters, in extent. And we opine you will appreciate this condition even though it lacks the "picturesqueness" of the worked-out land over which the starving population of older, "finished" countries are fighting—murdering each other less from fear than hunger.

AS YOU SPEED PAST you will receive a wave of friendly hands from the fields; at every stop the cheery greeting and the hospitality of the most liberal, because the best fed, folk in the whole wide world.

INSTEAD OF THE "PICTURESQUE" bent-backed, wooden-shod millions of Europe, you'll see the flower of femininity as it blooms only in the American sunlight, fresh air and free conditions. Home makers, thinkers and even voters—equals in every respect with the men they have helped to make great.

INSTEAD OF THE type from which Millet drew his "inspiration" for the "Od with the Hoe," you'll see men of alert minds making machinery for the drudgery—men who read when the day is done and who can be reached by the modern messenger—advertising.

IT WILL BE A PRIVILEGE to know these people at first hand—to get acquainted and talk with them and to mentally inventory their resources and possibilities.

ON THAT TRIP you will never again ask, "where do all the automobiles come from?" or "who buys all the Reos?"

YOU WILL SEE and you will know that these millions not only can afford an automobile, but that it is a necessity and an economy—because of the body and light to the mind of this happy, prosperous, enterprising people.

BY CHANCE YOU ARE one of the 80 per cent of those who own Reos who will make that legion of tourists—namely, successful farmers during the slack season between sowing and reaping of harvests—you'll add to your vision. You'll learn new ways of doing things; new methods, crops you can adapt to your own soil and climate.

YOU WILL SEE COWS worth ten thousand dollars apiece—herds that are more valuable than gold mines to their owners—for these increase in richness and number with the years while those ultimately peter out.

THEN YOU'LL REALIZE that the "Millionaire Farmer" is a reality—and you'll return to your own with greater zest and enthusiasm and confidence.

SO GO BY ALL MEANS—that is the advice we give to every owner who asks our advice. And we wish we Reo folk could go with each and every one of you, enjoying your enjoyment of the tour and of the car.

AND TO THOSE WHO ASK if Reo is a suitable car for the journey—of course, these are not yet owners or they would never ask—we say yes, a thousand times yes.

IT IS LOGICAL AND RIGHT that Reo owners more than any others should contemplate the Transcontinental Tour—and that you should select a Reo for yours if you intend making it.

FOR REO WAS THE FIRST CAR ever to make the transcontinental. Reo still holds that record—for that achievement of a Reo in 1905 has never yet been duplicated.

REOS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN wonderful in the Long Run. Made for just that kind of service. In fact, it might be said that Reos were developed by the service they performed—in making the Transcontinental at a time when others considered it impossible, we learned how better to make a car that could cope with those conditions.

SO YOU'LL MAKE NO MISTAKE either in taking the great tour or in selecting a Reo to take you there and back.

AND IT DOESN'T MATTER whether your preference or your purse dictate a Four or a Six. "Reo the Fifth" the incomparable Four at $1050; or the New Reo Six "the Six of sixty superiorities" $1385—either will serve you loyally.

ON YOUR ARRIVAL THERE you'll be rewarded again by a sight such as the eyes of man never before gazed upon—the most exquisite and completest display of the handiwork of man, the achievements of civilization and of science that has ever been consummated. Verily the epitome of human progress.

YES, GO! IT'S WELL WORTH WHILE—and if you'd enjoy the trip to the utmost—the Grand Tour and the side trips in California—go in your Reo.

EVANGELIZING CHINA'S CITIES

By a series of startling events in Far Eastern history, that took their beginning from the defeat of China in the Chino-Japanese War of 1894-95, the Chinese scholars and rulers have been jarred out of their confidence in the sufficiency of the heathen religions in which they had trusted. As one result the portals of 1,700 of China's great and ancient walled cities are open. So long closed in sullen pride and haughty resentment at "Western barbarian intrusion," they are at last flung wide open to the American missionary. Li Yuan Hung, vice-president of the republic, entertaining the J. R. Mott party, told them to urge the home church to occupy these strongholds of heathenism, these centers of vast power, "and to do it now. Five years hence may be too late!"

Shantung Province, of some forty million people, has 108 walled cities, with many additional market towns, large and important, and multitudes of villages. Of these 108 centers, some 85 fall, by comity arrangements with other missions, to the American Presbyterian Mission to evangelize.

Among the Chinese Christian leaders an "Independent Church" movement had been started, to do this very thing—to reach the Gospel-neglected ruling classes of China. Instead of isolation or reduplication of work, it was proposed by some of these high-grade native workers and leaders that there should be full co-operation between them and the foreign missions. Accordingly, therefore, arrangements have been perfected between them and the American Presbyterian Mission to begin by opening at least fifteen cities in Shantung territory. Some fifty years ago the Rev. Calvin W. Mateer, D.D., revered and honored as a missionary statesman, gathered several beggar boys into a school, which has developed into the great Christian University of Shantung Province, a union institution embracing schools of arts, medicine and theology. Missionary statesmen have repeatedly declared this union mission university to be the most potent single educational factor in the non-Christian world towards making that world "a new creation in Christ." Graduates of this university are scattered all over China as leaders in its re-making, men in the greatest demand and holding every sort of position of influence and responsibility. Such men are willing to leave positions as heads of departments in government, and as professors in schools of higher learning, etc., with all the prestige and honor that such positions in China carry, in order to take up this work, and at greatly reduced salaries.

Preaching and teaching is to be supplemented by lectures, schools, woman's work, medical work, and Y. M. C. A., and various kinds of Bible classes, thus touching many different points of approach to mind and heart. And, surrounded as each walled city is by multitudinous villages and in close proximity, it will be feasible—both appreciated and profitable—to invite their indwellers on special days to services. This evangelistic effort promises to arrest the attention and save from spiritual bankruptcy the educated classes, and stem the rising tide of an atheistic, materialistic philosophy of life. This impending bankruptcy constitutes the greatest menace to the future of China. With the grip of the old religions gone, with atheism the popular form of educated thought, and agnostic literature widely read, together with a more or less conscious desire of the educated to find something to satisfy the craving of the soul, it is easy to see that a veritable crisis has come in the religious history of China. Hence the wisdom and urgency of the above program.

If any one doubts it, let him ponder the significance of the latest religious census of Tokyo University, the crown of Japan's educational system, from which that government has rigorously barred religion: Total enrolment, 8,000; Christian, 60; uncertain, 440; atheistic, 1,500; agnostic, 6,000.

Lui Kwang Choo, a typical theologically trained man, is already engaged in this city evangelistic work. Like many of our leaders, he was a beggar boy, picked up by one of our missionaries. He became head professor of mathematics in the university, and official translator for Macmillans of higher books of mathematics into Chinese.

During the great revival services held in the college by the Rev. Ting Li Mei, when scores of students gave themselves to the ministry, Mr. Lui became convinced that he could serve the Master more efficiently as a preacher than a teacher. Accordingly, he left his professor's chair to study for the ministry three years in our Union Theological Seminary. As soon as he had completed his course, he entered at once upon his work in an ancient walled city, Ankiu. Already under his direction the place is a beehive, with a normal school of sixty girls, a boys' academy of sixty, a school for the wives of important young gentry men of the city, a woman's department in which an excellent Bible woman is at work, a large night school, a Y. M. C. A., a large primary school for boys and one for girls. All these schools are self-supporting, and the Bible is a required part of the daily curricula, and chapel is held every morning and evening. CHARLES ERNEST SCOTT.

A WORK THAT MUST NOT CEASE

A MEMORIAL DAY CELEBRATION THAT REMEMBERED THE WAR SUFFERERS

PLENTYWOOD, MONT., is a new town, "five years from the sod." You scarcely see a tree in the picture, and you get a sense of a wide sweep of country all around. You can also get an idea of the progressiveness of that section of the United States, for the automobiles parked in the foreground would be fifty in number if you could see all that came together on Memorial Day when Plentywood played host to the residents for thirty miles around.

The program consisted of many musical selections, besides addresses, and, most praiseworthy of all, perhaps, a "collection for the European war sufferers." This indeed is progressive-

WHOLE POPULATION CHRISTIANIZED

AFTER sixteen years spent in the small South Pacific island of Nauru, Pastor Philip A. Delaporte is in the United States, bringing with him a record of a wonderful achievement. An entire people civilized and Christianized; a language reduced to writing for the first time, and the Bible, both Old and New Testaments, translated into the Nauruan tongue—these are some of the results of his years of labor.

Pastor and Mrs. Delaporte went to Nauru in April, 1899, and since then have labored unceasingly with the natives. Nauru, a tiny isle of the Marshall group, only eighteen miles in circumference, and twenty-seven miles elders of the tribe, seeking one word. In seeking a word for 'mercy,' for instance, I asked them what they would do if, after a battle, they found an enemy lying wounded in the blazing sunshine. The answer was a careless shrug. 'Oh, we'd let him lie there,' they replied. Similarly, there was no word for 'cross,' but after several days I noticed that a hoist for the fishing nets was constructed like a cross, and so secured the word I wanted."

The translation of the New Testament was completed in 1908, and in 1910 Ruth, the Psalms and 117 hymns had been translated. Both the New Testament and the hymn book were published on Nauru Island, printed in the native tongue on a hand-press, which was sent down as a gift by the Hawaiian Mission Society of Honolulu. Mr. Delaporte's work was done as a working missionary for the Central Union Church of Honolulu, and most of his assistance came from that Hawaiian city. Besides the New Testament and the hymns, Mr. Delaporte translated and printed on the island a complete copy of "Robinson Crusoe."

Mr. and Mrs. Delaporte are accompanied on their trip to the United States by Miss Olga Meitzner, who has been assistant in the mission work, and by Tim Detudano, a full-blooded native, who has helped with the translations, and has been a teacher in the Nauru schools.

One thousand copies of the Bible in Nauruan will be printed in New York City, and 500 copies of the hymn book. Mrs. Delaporte's work has been to teach the Nauruans to read music and to sing, and to train native teachers for the native schools.

Tim Detudano is sent to the United States at the expense of the native Christians, and because of their fervent desire to have one of their own people present while the word of God is being printed for them. The natives raised the necessary $500 for his transportation and other expenses, most of them having to sell their pigs and chickens to make up the amount.

rich phosphate deposits of the island. The population since 1899 has changed, many Chinese laborers have been imported. The natives have decreased, and now muster only 1,300, instead of being savages they read and write their native tongue, they are musically educated, and all are sincere Christians.

It was fourteen years ago that I decided to translate the Bible for the Nauruans," said Mr. Delaporte. "Accidentally I set aside a portion of each day for the work, which proved extremely difficult. The language had never before been written, and differed greatly from that in use in other islands of the Marshall group. The whole vocabulary contained less than 500 words. I found practically no words for abstract qualities, such as 'mercy,' 'justice' and 'right.' Often I would spend days talking with the ness, to remember on Memorial Day in this country those who, thousands of miles away, are being deprived of homes and kinsmen by war. From the gifts made at this gathering $30 was sent to the Christian Herald Relief Fund for use among Polish sufferers, and has been so applied.

The fund on June 9 amounted to $159,494.13. We are glad that so many of our readers are able, amidst the many calls that are made upon their charity, to remember this Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War. It is a grave and great duty that has been laid upon Christian hearts, and it is well that we remember the admonition to "continue in well-doing and faint not."

Let us suggest that many a family will experience much satisfaction in adopting a systematic method for accumulating a regular monthly gift for this fund. It is a simple idea to have a small jar or box or other receptacle properly labeled, and agree as to how it shall be filled. A self-denial tax on every luxury might be put into such a box; a thank-offering on each occasion of special pleasure enjoyed might be made; or by other easily arranged devices the box will be fairly filled in a month's time, when the contents can be forwarded as remittance No. 1 and remittance No. 2, etc., and be so credited in the Christian Herald. Such monthly gifts might be apportioned now to one country and now to another, so that eventually a family will have contributed to the relief of unhappy lives in every country affected by the war. We offer this suggestion as a help to our readers. This is a need that is entitled to the greatest generosity and that cannot despise the smallest sacrifice. So whatsoever you can do, do it heartily as unto the Lord.

Please address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Among the Workers

AT THE CLOSE OF THE year's work in the Bible Teachers' Training School, New York, of which Dr. Wilbert W. White is president, thirty graduates received diplomas, twelve religious bodies being represented by this group.

—CHARLES H. HARRINGTON, secretary of the Fanny Crosby Memorial Building Fund, 509 Security Building, Bridgeport, Conn., announces the issuance of a Fanny Crosby Memorial Booklet, a copy of which will be mailed to every contributor to the fund. The cover is decorated with the famous hymn-writer's favorite flowers—violets.

A READER OF THIS JOURNAL in Bristow, Va., writes: "Mr. Albert E. Lippard, of Washington, D. C., has a unique way of spreading the Gospel. His work lies among the mountains of Virginia and West Virginia. He starts out on walking tours, covering long distances through lonely mountains and places where no churches or ministers are found. He carries the Word into thousands of log cabins."

—THE LATEST INSTITUTION of the Soul Winners' Mission Work, Stuart Robinson College, is situated at Blackie, Letcher County, Ky., in the farthest Cumberland. There was neither school nor church there two years ago. Over $2,500 of the cost of the college building were given by friends in the North, and over $1,000 of the cost of the "Mary Rose Dormitory," by a noble woman in Connecticut. Though not yet two years old the college has seven professors, and one hundred and sixty-seven Highland pupils, most of whom walk miles to school. There are now nearly one hundred children in attendance.

—REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D., of London, has accepted the invitation to be one of the speakers at the General Conference for Christian Workers at Northfield, July 30 to August 15. Owing to a severe attack of typhoid fever, Dr. Morgan was compelled to abandon his proposed visit to India and the Far East in October, but on the first of March was able to resume his pastoral duties in Westminster Chapel. Among the speakers already secured for the coming summer are: Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, Right Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, Dr. John R. Mott, Rev. G. A. Johnston Ross, Mr. Nolan Rice Best, Mr. George Sherwood Eddy and Rev. Milton S. Littlefield, of New York City; Rev. Sidney A. Weston, D.D., of Boston; Rev. Charles Inglis, of London; Miss Margaret Slattery of Fitchburg, Mass.; Rev. J. Stuart Holden, London; Rev. John C. Scott, of China.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

TO THOSE American mothers who are not burdened with superfluous wealth, there is something interesting in the announcement, recently made in the Surrogate's Court in New York, that an annual allowance of $20,000 may, in certain conditions, be insufficient for the support of a child. In the report filed in that court by Mrs. Astor, the widow of John Jacob Astor, who lost his life on the Titanic, she shows that there has been an annual expenditure of over that amount for the maintenance of the home in New York which is occupied by herself and her little son three years of age. The little John Jacob is the beneficiary under his father's will of the income of a trust fund of $3,000,000, the income being somewhat more than $140,000 a year. This is being held for him until he is of age, and meanwhile $20,000 is allowed yearly to his mother for his support. In her accounting, the mother shows that the expenses have far exceeded the allowance. The boy's share includes the payment of one-third of the maintenance of the New York home, and the mother claims that a more liberal provision is necessary. These facts strikingly emphasize the different standards of living in a great city, where there are thousands of mothers who would regard an allowance of a few hundred dollars a year for their little ones as absolute affluence.

KEEPING THE PUBLIC INFORMED. Germany's reply on the Lusitania note was received in Washington May 31. The following headline announcements of the President's response are from the New York Times: (May 31) "Prompt Rejoinder Likely: Will Probably be Sent to Berlin Within 24, or at the Most 48 Hours"; (June 1) "President's Answer May Go Tomorrow"; (June 2) "Note Now in Preparation"; (June 3) "Washington Inclined to Give Berlin Time to Understand American Sentiment"; (June 4) "President's Note is Ready; To be Sent Without Delay"; (June 5) "Note Probably Will Go to Berlin Today"; (June 6) "Note Needs Final Touches"; (June 7) "President's Note Going in 24 Hours"; (June 8) "Note Not Delayed, President Explains; it Will Probably be Cabled Today"; (June 9) "President Reads Note to Cabinet; Verbal Changes Suggested"; (June 10) "Wilson's Note Has Gone to Germany."

WILL KEEP HIS SOUL CLEAN. An International News Service despatch from East St. Louis, Mo., June 2, says: "George F. Heller, proprietor of a forge works here, has declined an unlimited order from France for shrapnel casings. The order would have amounted to $90,000 a week. Heller is opposed to war." Writing on this subject to the Christian Herald E. A. Brininstool of Los Angeles, Calif., expresses an opinion that will be shared by many others. "It seems to me," says his letter, "that this man has solved the problem of peace and the ending of the war; so far as he is concerned, at least. If all the makers of arms, ammunitions and all the other war-horrorers would take this same decided stand in the United States, it wouldn't be long before the coo of the peace dove would be heard in the land. War is hell, but it isn't Heller—not in this instance."

TURNING THE TABLES ON A GREAT PEST. While the locust (just now of news interest) is essentially a plant-devourer and famine-bringer, there are many well-authenticated cases in history showing that populations, reduced to the last extremity, have utilized the destructive insect as food. Diodorus Siculus relates that an Ethiopian tribe were known as Acridophagi ("eaters of locusts"), while Aristotle writes of a certain part of Greece where the people regarded them as delicacies. Layard, the explorer, found on the engraved monuments pictures of dried and preserved locusts on rods, presumably indicating their use as food. It is not believed that any race today eats them. They are regarded everywhere in the East as an abhorrent calamity, and the presence of vast swarms in Palestine this spring is held to be a forerunner of complete crop failure, both of fruits and cereals.

BOYCOTT THE FLY! A nation-wide war has been declared against the house-fly. Unlike the swat-the-fly movement, which is making warfare on flies by means of killing them, the new campaign is to annihilate the danger of flies by "boycotting" them. The "Boycott-the-Fly" League has been launched with Ferdinand Herb, M.D., of Chicago, as its chairman. The other charter members include Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, Carter H. Harrison, Rev. John Timothy Stone, D.D., and Dr. John Dill Robertson, commissioner of health of Chicago. The principal danger of the fly is the infection of our food supply, especially in large cities, where the germs of disease abound. Intelligent women are already demanding that dealers keep flyless stores. The league wants everybody to become a fly boycotter. To become a member one must simply pledge himself not to ever again eat food on which flies have been seen, or which is unnecessarily exposed to flies.

AN UNUSUAL INTERNATIONAL COMPLICATION. Legislation known as the Seaman's Act, passed by the last Congress, provides among other things that a foreign sailor in an American port can claim half his wages at pleasure; requires a majority of foreign crews to be able to understand the commissioned officer's language; determines the proportion of veteran sailors who must man lifeboats, and exempts foreign sailors from arrest for desertion, all of which conflict more or less with the contracts under which the crews of various nationalities are shipped. These provisions have met with strong objection from several European countries whose commercial treaties with the United States are said to be impaired by this new law. In consequence the United States Government has notified twenty-one of the principal nations that we will terminate the provisions in the treaties which conflict with the Seaman's Act; the disturbing law will not take effect as respects those countries until the expiration of at least one year. If these countries will not consent to the proposal of the United States, the treaties themselves will have to be canceled, and that will involve the readjustment of a vast number of existing regulations covering transfers of property, consular duties, customs and port rules and kindred international relations of a commercial character.

BURNING OF TROOP TRAIN IN ENGLAND AFTER COLLISION

SOLDIERS KILLED NEAR HOME. Three trains came into collision and afterward caught fire on the Caledonian Railway at Gretna Green, Scotland, May 22, one being a troop train, one a local, and one an express from London to Glasgow. Nearly 200 soldiers perished and twice as many were injured. The troop train and local first collided, and then the express crashed into them. Before the fire brigades reached the scene, many travelers were burned alive. This was one of the most disastrous railroad wrecks that Great Britain has suffered.

WOULD MAKE IT PLEASANTER TO GO TO LAW. Ex-President William H. Taft has advocated before the Judiciary Committee of the New York State Constitutional Convention that radical reforms be made in court procedure. He recommends the substitution for the Grand Jury of a provision for trial on information secured for the court by a prosecuting officer; heavy reduction in the number of kinds of civil cases requiring trial by jury; empowering the judiciary to formulate rules of procedure for courts; consolidation into one single system of all the courts in order to increase efficiency and obviate the notorious delays of the law; and simpler methods of impeaching judges in order to lessen derelictions on the bench.

AMERICAN IMPORTERS IN STARVATION ZONE. In June 11 most of the important New York importing firms met to take steps to impress Washington with the imminence of the ruin that threatens many of these houses because of the stocks of merchandise for the fall trade shipped from Germany and Austria are held up in European ports by the high restrictions on commerce in those countries. The importers estimate that $30,000,000 worth of merchandise is detained abroad in that manner. A committee of prominent merchants has been appointed to wait upon President Wilson and the State Department with a statement of the situation and a demand that the United States take prompt action in their behalf. The importers say that the United States Government is losing millions of dollars in duties on these shipments.

EXTENDING THE RURAL DELIVERY. The Post Office Department has added 710 routes to the Rural Free Delivery system, and extended the former routes so that, in all, 87,850 families not formerly served will have the benefit of free delivery.

WILL PUSH THE JITNEY S. The national Automobile Chamber of Commerce decided at its annual meeting in New York that the jitney mode of transportation is demanded by the public and should be encouraged and supported by makers. Regulation of the jitney service by municipal authorities is approved.

MERELY A COINCIDENCE. In Memorial Day, when the flagship Rear-Admiral Caperton, the Wilmington, anchored off Vera Cruz, and the customary salute, a reply salute was fired by a Carranza battery on shore. This was not quite the anniversary of Rear-Admiral Henry T. Mayo's demand at General Huerta salute the Stars and Stripes, that famous demand, backed up by the President, having been made about fourteen months ago; but since the salute, Admiral Mayo has been appointed by the President as vice-admiral, the first of the three vice-admirals authorized by the last Congress; the other two have not yet been decided upon. Vice-Admiral Mayo is in command of the first division of the Atlantic fleet at present, and will also be second in command of the entire Atlantic fleet.

MEXICAN LEADERS FAIL TO ELIMINATE THEMSELVES. There is as yet no evidence that President Wilson's warning to the warring factions in Mexico has inclined them to a state of common amity. Battles are still being fought of which the reports are not reliable, but evidently this bandit warfare is killing off a great many belligerent individuals. The country is said to be rapidly approaching a state of great suffering through shortage of food supplies; bread riots come in many places; refugees from Mexico City and other interior points are appearing at Vera Cruz and other coast towns. The country is credited with having caused the arrest and trial of 20 Americans at Juarez with the charge of counterfeiting, and has had them removed to Chihuahua for execution. The United States Government notified the Villista authorities that our government insisted on examining the evidence before execution of the sentence, and demanded delay. The press of June 12 intimated that the execution might take place.

GO IN AND POSSESS THE LAND! Secretary Lane of the Department of the Interior has recently opened to entry under the Enlarged Homestead Act more than 60,000 acres in Mexico; more than 1,500,000 acres in South Dakota; more than 185,000 acres in Montana, and more than 40,000 acres in Wyoming. Upon the recommendation of Secretary Lane, the President has restored to entry more than 29,500 acres in western Wyoming, which have heretofore been included in phosphate reserves.

MASSACHUSETTS LIKES ITS MILK CLEAN. The Department of Agriculture is repeating its last year's offer of cash prizes to dairymen for merit in producing clean milk through all the stages, about 500 prizes being offered, the last being $50. The contest is by districts and closes August 1. Massachusetts would be a good state to go to for a drink of milk during this period.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

FOR JULY 4, 1915

National Ideals

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Isa. 62: 1-7

OUR topic committees have connected Patriotism and Home Missions for this Fourth of July meeting. The complete subject is: "National Ideals, and How Home Missions Will Promote Them."

The "National Americanization Day Committee" has been making plans to have Independence Day this year devoted to our new American citizens. Exercises for the day are to be planned with the idea of making them feel "at home." And it is recognized that not only must the new male citizens be made to feel the thrill of American opportunity and liberty, but the immigrant women must be helped. It is planned ultimately to make use of public school buildings and have regular classes in citizenship for men and in other useful knowledge for women.

The church must help. We want to make these friends not only Americans, but Christians.

The regret comes strong again with every recurring Independence Day that our country is still so far from the realization of true liberty and real justice. Side by side, for instance, with the good news that these fresh efforts are to be made for the welfare of our newcomers from other lands is the news that women will probably soon be put to work in our steel and iron mills. That is only one item in the long, sad list of economic wrongs that curse us. So many overworked, so many underpaid, so many underfed—so many deprived of that one thing to which every human being has a royal right—the chance to work!

We need to be like the watchman to whom God sent his message through Isaiah: "I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night."

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

THESE sad words come in a letter from Talladega, Ala.: "Young parents are about to lose a little baby from severe illness. They are heart-broken at the very thought. Please pray earnestly for the child's recovery."

This week's mail brings much good news of answered prayer. The same friend who sends the request just mentioned writes: "Twice before I have asked your prayers and have received answers both times." A "Believer in Prayer" writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer for a relative who was to be tried in June on a serious charge. An earlier hearing was obtained and he was completely exonerated from the charge." E. P. N. writes: "The man for whom I requested prayer has entirely stopped drinking. His eyes seemed to be opened to the great evil of it in a very wonderful way, when it seemed for a while like an almost hopeless case." Miss N. O. writes: "My friend who was losing his mind is home again, much improved."

W. D. writes: "After months of prayer and faith and waiting upon God for the fulfilment of his promises to those who believe he is a faithful Promiser, the way has been blessedly opened for a minister to engage in work for his Master." A Reader from Valley Falls, N. Y., writes: "I want to acknowledge two direct answers to special prayer and also tell how the reading of the Answered Prayer Column has strengthened my faith." A Friend from Lititz, Pa., writes: "Last January I asked you to pray for our revival services held in our church, and God answered the prayer. We received over one hundred souls into the church." Another friend from Leominster, Mass., writes to acknowledge the conversion of over three hundred souls as a result of the revival in that town, and also for three children who

Last, but what should have been first, we must remember our duty to the rest of the world. Not to fight, but to serve—to show other nations the way to forgiveness, and peace, and helpfulness, and love, and freedom, and happiness. This is what American must mean. And you and I can help.

There is one more thing, after all. Do not forget that these young people's meetings are prayer meetings. There should be a good deal of praying on this Fourth of July that God will keep us steady and true and will give us, for the tasks that lie ahead, great measures of his wisdom, power and love.

Jonah's Message

Epworth League. Jonah 3: 1-10; 4: 1, 2, 4, 11

THE complete wording of our title is "Remembering Jonah's Whale and Forgetting His Message." Jonah's whale has been a favorite topic of discussion for centuries. But the abiding and vital things about the story of Jonah are first, the lesson of the peril of trying to run away from God and our work, and second, the message itself which Jonah delivered. It took a brave man to enter that big city and go about the streets crying "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed." It requires courage to go about any community or nation today, declaring that the trend of affairs is wrong, and urging men to go the other way.

We must beware of being led astray by popular opinion. In Jonah's case it was one man against a whole city, but Jonah was right and the city was wrong. Fortunately for Nineveh, the wrong multitude yielded to the one right man, and the city was saved. Who can tell what any one of us might do if we would speak out one brave word of warning?

are "growing in grace and knowledge of the Lord."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

A. E. H., Upper Sandusky, Ohio; G. W., Montana; J. M. W., Reader, Ontario; A. J., Newark, N. Y.; M. B. O., Coahoma, Texas (for the restoration to health of father and cousins; J. J. and F. R. R.; Mrs. F. R., Cossackie, N. Y.; A. G., New Edinburg, Ark.; A Friend, China Spring, Texas; A Reader, Winston-Salem, N. C.

Prayers are asked for revivals at Mille Roches, Canada; Obion, Tenn.; Upper Sandusky, Ohio; Lititz, Pa. (blessing upon tent meetings; that many may be saved); Pulaski, Iowa; Cassey, Iowa. A Reader asks prayer that a country Sunday school may become a blessing to the community; Mrs. L., that Sunday school on Cherry Creek, Mont., may be successful, and that a church may be started in addition to the Sunday school. Mrs. F. H. E. urges prayer that the dreadful sale of drink and drugs may be abolished and vicious resorts closed. Rev. R. G. H. asks prayer that God may open the way for him in his new venture, the evangelistic field, that many souls may be saved; Mrs. E. M. S., Ohio, that her husband may obtain a pastorate; Mrs. R. A. R., that a minister desiring a field of labor may receive a call in the near future. Another reader reminds us of our duty to pray for a nation-wide revival, and still another of that biggest and most urgent prayer—that the whole world may be saved.

Twenty readers ask prayer for the mental restoration or strengthening of relatives, friends or themselves.

Ten friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for relatives, friends or themselves.

Fourteen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the drink habit. Four that friends be delivered from the drug habit.

Forty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Ninety friends ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends, including one that five brothers may be saved, also their wives and children; another that a backslidden minister may be brought into the light.

Fourteen friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Where Do You Spend Washday?

At the tubs all day? No matter how big your wash is, you can do it in half the time, with less than half the trouble, if you use Fels-Naptha Soap.

For instance—this isn't just a tubful of dirty clothes, soaking. It's a tubful of clothes soaped with Fels-Naptha, and put to soak for 30 minutes.

That's the reason why this woman isn't hard-rubbing the life out of them on a washboard. It's the reason why her work is easily done in half the time it used to take. Not yet noon and most of the washing done.

Because she used Fels-Naptha Soap is the reason there's no steaming washboiler on a red-hot stove. Clothes washed with Fels-Naptha don't need boiling or scalding.

She uses Fels-Naptha for all kinds of soap-and-water work. It takes out stains, and is as good for dainty laces as for heavy blankets.

It makes dish-washing a pleasure—china and glass-ware glisten. It does all your housework easier, better and quicker.

Fels-Naptha Soap keeps you rested and well; keeps your house bright and shining and your clothes sweet, clean and white.

LUTHER IN ENGLISH

A NOTABLE EVENT IN THE WORLD OF RELIGIOUS LITERATURE

THE A. J. Holman Company of Philadelphia has launched an enterprise that commands general notice: it has begun publishing an edition of the writings of Luther in English. Attempts have been made a score of times, beginning as far back as thirty years after Luther's death in 1546, to make the principal writings of Luther accessible to English readers. Even today the world possesses quite a respectable collection of expository, polemical, and epistolary writings of the German reformer, done more or less happily into English. The latest and most ambitious effort of this kind was begun about fifteen years ago by Dr. Lenker of Minneapolis, whose aim is to publish the entire works of Luther in English. A dozen volumes have appeared so far.

The present undertaking of the Holman Company aims to publish a series of ten volumes octavo, each to contain about four hundred pages. Such writings of Luther as have had a formative influence on the thought of his age and as are of abiding value are to be reproduced in this series. But this Holman series of Writings of Luther will possess features that render it distinct from, and in a manner superior to, any previous undertaking of this kind.

To begin with, each treatise of Luther presented in this series is introduced by a scholarly article of the translator or editor, in which the historical facts regarding the causes that prompted Luther to write the treatise, and also regarding its publication and the effects it produced, are given, the subject-matter of the treatise is discussed and outlined, and difficult points in Luther's theology are explained. The translations for this series are being made from the best accredited originals, those that have been used for the renowned Weimar, or Kaiser, Edition of Luther's Works. The introductory articles and the more than five hundred foot-notes evince close study of Luther's literary remains, and extensive acquaintance with the literature that has sprung up about Luther and his most important writings. If we add to these distinctive marks the very serviceable index and the fact that Scripture references and topical divisions are printed in the margin, we have here a wisely thought out and well executed plan far surpassing anything that has been attempted heretofore in the way of giving what is immortal of Luther to the English-speaking world.

What Dr. Jacobs says in the introduction to this initial volume of the series and to the entire series, the volume itself shows to have been achieved. "In order to judge Luther, we must know all sides of the man, and read the heaviest as well as the lightest of his works, the more scientific and theological as well as the more practical and popular, his informal letters as well as his formal treatises. We must take account of the time of each writing and the circumstances under which it was composed, of the adversaries against whom he was contending, and of the progress which he made in his opinions as time went on. The great fund of primary sources which the historical methods of the last generation have made available should also be laid under contribution to shed light upon his statements and his attitude toward the various questions involved in his life-struggles."

From a perusal of the contents of this volume, we feel justified in saying that men who have been eager to read all they could about Luther will by this volume be strongly attracted to read Luther himself, and be enabled to read him intelligently and profitably.

THE men who have been engaged in the preparation of this volume are all men of prominence in the American Lutheran Church and well equipped by general and special training for their tasks. They are Dr. T. E. Schmauk, Dr. H. E. Jacobs, Dr. C. M. Jacobs, Dr. M. Reu, Dr. J. L. Neve, Rev. A. T. W. Steinhäuser, Rev. W. A. Lambert, Rev. J. J. Schindel, and Rev. A. Steimle.

From the contents of the first volume of this series we infer that a chronological order will be followed in the selections from Luther to be offered in the series. First is his "Disputation on the Power and Efficacy of Indulgences," the famous Ninety-five Theses of October 31, 1517, which were his challenge to Tetzel's infamous traffic, and, as Luther said later in a treatise against Duke George of Saxony, "started this hubbub." The letters which Luther wrote to Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz, to his friend John Staupitz, the superior of the order of Augustinian Friars, and to Pope Leo X in transmitting the theses to them, accompany this "Disputation," and together with them form one unit.

The next unit is the "Treatise on the Holy Sacrament of Baptism" of 1519; the third, "A Discussion of Confession"—the Confitendi Ratio of 1520; the fourth, "The Fourteen [Propositions] of Consolation for Such as Labor and are Heavy Laden"—the Tessaradecas Consolatoria of 1520; the fifth, the "Treatise on Good Works," with the dedicatory letter to Duke John of Saxony, of 1520; the sixth, the "Treatise on the New Testament, that is the Holy Mass," of 1520. As the full title shows, this is not a treatise on the writings of the New Testament in our Bible, but on the second sacramental ordinance of our Lord, which he called "the new testament in his blood." The last unit in this volume is a polemical writing, "The Papacy at Rome." This treatise was wrung from Luther by the silly reasonings of the Franciscan friar Augustine von Alvelde of Leipzig in 1520. Alvelde had not only indulged in gross vituperations of Luther, but was also misleading the common people by his book on the supremacy of the outer organization of the church. The book was so poor that Alvelde's own order was ashamed of it and sought to suppress it.

THE variety of selections made for this volume is such that the reader becomes impressed at once with the fertility of Luther's mind and his versatility in treating religious subjects. In all his writings, however, he has but one aim: to make the Bible dearer to men. When his books were to be published in 1539 he wrote: "I would gladly have seen all my books forgotten and destroyed, if only for the reason that I am afraid of the example (viz., the example set by preserving and collecting them). For I see what benefit it has brought to the churches, that men have begun to collect many books and great libraries, outside and alongside of the Holy Scriptures; and have begun especially to scramble together, without any distinction, all sorts of 'Fathers,' 'Councils,' and 'Doctors.' Not only has good time been wasted, and the study of the Scriptures neglected; but the pure understanding of the divine Word is lost, until at last the Bible has come to lie forgotten in the dust under the bench. Although it is both useful and necessary that the writings of some of the Fathers and the decrees of some of the Councils should be preserved as witnesses and records, nevertheless, I think, est modus in rebus (there is moderation in all things); and it is no pity that the books of many of the Fathers and the Councils have, by God's grace, been lost. If they had all remained, one could scarce go in and out for books, and we should still have nothing better than we find in the Holy Scriptures. Then, too, it was our intention and our hope, when we began to put the Bible into German, that there would be less writing, and more studying and reading of the Scriptures. For all other writings should point to the Scriptures, as John pointed to Christ, when he said, 'I must increase, but I must decrease.' In this way every one may drink of himself from the fresh spring, as the Fathers have had to do when they wished to produce anything worthwhile. Neither Fathers nor Councils, nor we ourselves, will do so well, even when our very best is done, as the Holy Scriptures have done; that is to say, we shall never do so well as God himself. Even though for our salvation we need to have the Holy Spirit and faith and divine language and divine works, nevertheless we must let the prophets and apostles sit at the desk, while we sit at their feet and listen to what they say. It is not for us to tell what they must hear. Since, however, I cannot prevent it, and without my wish, they are now bent on collecting and printing my books—small honor to me—I shall have to let them put their energy and labor to the venture. I comfort myself with the thought that my books will yet lie forgotten in the dust, especially when, by God's grace, I have written something good. 'I shall not be better than my fathers.' (1 Kings 19: 4.) The other kind will be more likely to endure. For when the Bible can be left lying under the bench, and when it is true of the Fathers and Councils that the better they were, the more completely they have been forgotten; there is good hope that, when the curiosity of his age has been satisfied, my books will not long remain; the more so, since it has begun to rain and snow books and 'Doctors,' of which many are already forgotten and gone to dust, so that one no longer remembers their names. They themselves had hoped, to be sure, that they would always be in the market, and as schoolmaster to the churches.

"Well, then, let it go, in God's name! I only ask in all kindness that the man who wishes at this time to have any books will by no means let them be a hindrance to his own study of the Scriptures, but read them as I read the orders and the ordinances of the Pope and the books of the sophists. I look now and then to see what they have done, or learn from them the history and thought of their time; but I do not study them, or feel myself bound to conform to them. I do not treat the Fathers and the Councils very differently. In this I follow the example of St. Augustine, who is one of the best, and almost the only one of them to subject himself to the Holy Scriptures alone, uninfluenced by the books of the Fathers and the Saints. This brought him into a hard fray with St. Jerome, who cast up to him the writings of his predecessors; but he did not care for that. If this example of St. Augustine had been followed, the Pope would not have become a schismatic, the countless vermin, he swarming, parasitic mass of books would not have come into the church, and the Bible would have kept its place in the pulpit."

This deprecating statement of the reformer—by the way, a sample of the translator's work in this Holman series of Luther's writings—shows the spirit that was in this man, and the master passion which dominated all his thinking and writing. As in his own day, people will still in our time conceive the notion that a man who thus speaks of the Bible and his own work can help others to understand the Bible and make it a power in men's lives. It is because he keeps in such close touch with the Bible that Luther's writings are so strong, clear, and fascinating.

More Gates Swing Open To Hudson Admirers

More Reasons for 1916 Hudson

To all the HUDSON attractions we now add these:

Yacht-Line Body
Ever-Lustre Finish
A Roomier Tonneau
More Luxury
A $1350 Price

That price means another $200 reduction, the second in twenty months. They have resulted from multiplied output, due to the car's popularity. Now at $1350 we are swinging open in the widest way the gates to HUDSON class.

Some Other Things You've Wanted

We do not, and we cannot, offer you a better chassis. Nobody wants or expects it. Edward E. Coffin did his best in designing this. Our engineering corps has done its best in refining it. This final Six embodies a chassis that seems to us desirable.

In twenty months, 15,000 men have bought this new-type HUDSON. They've applied every possible test. And not one, we believe, has ever seen, or wants to see, a better car than this.

But there are things you do want, which all cars lacked, and we've brought them out this year.

Yacht-Line Body

This is the fruition of all aims since fore-doors were inserted. Then came straight lines, then streamlines, but all those lines were broken. In this Yacht-Line Body we reach perfection in graceful, sweeping lines. Even the door lines are unbroken. The body and door tops form a level line, and that line is leather-bound.

We have widened the rear seat so three big folks don't crowd it.

We have built a roomier tonneau. And the room is doubled when only five are riding. The two extra seats completely disappear.

We upholster with enameled leather this year, the costly finish of the high-priced car. Thus we bring you all the comfort, all the luxury it is possible to give.

For safety's sake and for extra wear, all wheels have non-skid tires.

Finish That Stays New

And now we bring out a much-wanted innovation—our Ever-Lustre finish, exclusive to HUDSON cars. It has required an immense factory addition, equipped with ovens to hold hundreds of bodies.

Now each under-coat of finish goes on under pressure, is forced into every pore. Then each is baked on to give it wondrous hardness. The result is a finish which keeps its newness and lustre. It resists weather and washing, rubbing and mud. It combats as never before the main cause of depreciation.

A Trebled Output

But our best announcement is a trebled output. There will be overdemand for a while now, as with every new-model HUDSON. But the long waits of last year will not be repeated. And men who want HUDSONS will not be forced to take some second choice.

We are building of this new model 100 cars daily—a record fine-car output. You can get one—perhaps at once—if you see your dealer now. These new cars are now everywhere on show.

7-Passenger Phaeton or 3-Passenger Roadster, $1350 f. o. b. Detroit
Also a new Cabriolet, $1650 f. o. b. Detroit

Each HUDSON car brings with it the matchless HUDSON service. Ask our dealer to explain it. You will see how much it means.

ABSALOM'S FAILURE

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 4.

II SAM. 18: 1-15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right." Eph. 6: 1.

This is magnificently said. The apostle bases his plea for obedience to parents, not on the ground of expediency, courtesy, gratitude, or fitness, but on that eternal law which is the foundation of God's throne. More than this, there is an answer from the depth of all hearts, especially of children's hearts, to such an appeal. A child knows intuitively that it is right to do right. And when the command is heard, the soul knows instinctively that it is a voice which may justly claim obedience, and that it cannot be refused without a sense of wrongness and condemnation. When the mistrel Blondin sought the intercepted and imprisoned king of England, he sang under the windows of each castle-keep an air which Richard and he had composed together. At last, after many ineffective efforts, he heard note by note a response, and knew that the king was there. This led to his ultimate ransoming. Similarly when the eternal law of rightness is announced before the heart of childhood, as yet unblurred and sensitive, there is a deep-down thrill of holy consent and obedience. It is always right to do right, and you know it, and the sooner you perform what your conscience admits, the happier you will be.

The Story of Absalom

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE is a peculiar and perennial mournfulness about this story of Absalom. The story proper begins with the words: "In all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty." It ends with the words which have echoed down through the centuries as the universal cry of the father heart over the son who has come to the end of a wasted life: "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" One can hear in the very words the choking sobs of the old king, as he climbs the stairs to the room over the gate.

Lessons on the story crowd thick and fast to tongue and pen.

Most striking is the lesson that the promises sin makes are lies. Absalom had had a vivid picture of what the end of his course would be. It was to be a palace, a throne, a crown for his beautiful head, courtiers, armies, wealth, honor, and pleasures manifold. That was the picture of the promise. But this was the picture of the fact: A dead man hanging by his abundant hair to the low, tangled branches of an oak, with three arrows through his heart—this and that broken-hearted father stumbling up the stairs, blinded by tears and strangling with sobs.

Sin always lies. It simply does not pan out as promised. A Christian Herald editorial a week or two ago reminded us again that there is always that fatal "at last" to sin. At last it biteth and stingeth. Sin never defaults in payment of its wages—"the wages of sin is death." Sin goes straight to a sure end as the needle points to the pole. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." It is very foolish to be misled by the false pictures painted by temptation which hide what is always a grim equivalent to the dangling body and the three darts.

Trace Absalom's downfall step by step. He began with what may have been, at least in that long-ago time, an almost worthy motive, that of punishing a great wrong, a wrong which King David should have punished, but did not. In punishing the wrong Absalom killed his brother, and was forced to flee into exile. After two years in exile he returned to Judah, but for two years more did not see his father.

But the narrative has already indicated dangers. The handsome young prince is impetuous, wrathfully impatient. When Joab delayed coming to arrange an interview between Absalom and his father the young man set fire to his barley fields. Then came the interview and the reconciliation with David.

Next appears vanity—a love of luxury and display—"chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him."

Next ambition—the desire to be king. He was probably the heir to the throne. Amnon was dead, and from the fact that Chileab's name is not repeated after it is first mentioned in II Sam. 3: 3, it is supposed that he also had died. But Absalom grew tired of waiting for his father to die. He began to covet the kingdom. And covetousness began in his heart its always deadly work. If it is not expelled covetousness will lead almost inevitably to theft, so "Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel."

He did this by pretending to sympathize with them, by saying what he would do if he were king, by treating all with a mock courtesy and deference.

Insincerity in his social relations led to the far deeper sin of insincerity in religious profession, and we see the false young prince pretending that he must go to Hebron to fulfil a religious vow.

Then came open rebellion—the war against his aged father—and the fatal battle.

Beauty, insincerity, covetousness, the false use of personal charm—above all and through all, selfishness—selfishness that always seeks self-gratification, selfishness that in the end will not stop at any cruelty or crime—that is the story of Absalom.

How avoid that path and that fate? Begin with caring not about outward beauty but inward beauty. Paul lays down a safe itinerary that will end, not with such tragedies as a dead traitor-son, a broken-hearted father, a divided kingdom, a field heaped with slain, but with true peace and gladness: "Finally, brethren," he urges, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things." And "Follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life."

Crying for the Moon or Mud

By Amos R. Wells

PHILLIPS BROOKS once gave the wise advice, "Mean to be something with all your might." "Something good, or something worth while," the great preacher meant. Absalom meant to be something with all his might, but it was a base something, to achieve which would have been worse than failure. "God wants us to be ambitious," said the saintly A. J. Gordon; "he wants us to have good works that somebody can see." Dr. Parkhurst puts it this way: "Laboring toward distant aims sets the mind in a higher key, and puts us at our best." God was not displeased with Absalom for aiming, but for aiming so low. Ambition is one of the noblest things on earth, if it is in harmony with our Father's ambition for us.

"Wear-Ever" utensils are "warm weather" utensils. They require little heat, yet absorb it so readily and retain it so long, that they cook quicker than other wares—thus reducing the heat of the kitchen.

The most delicate foods may be cooked in "Wear-Ever" utensils over a low fire without stirring and without danger of burning. It is not necessary to stand over a hot stove and stir your food.

Look for the "Wear-Ever" trade mark on the bottom of every utensil. The enormous pressure of rolling mills and stamping machines makes the metal in "Wear-Ever" utensils dense, hard, smooth.

"Wear-Ever" utensils have no joints or seams to leak and give trouble—no coating to crack or scale—no place for particles of food to lodge—are pure and safe—are easy to keep clean.

English Methodist, once read in a newspaper the sneer that Christians with their notions about immortality and God were like children crying for the moon. "I was so glad to hear it!" exclaimed Dr. Watkinson. "One of the best things on the planet is a child crying for the moon! It would be a sorry time for us if the children ceased to cry for the moon. Why, a child crying for a moon is the mainspring of civilization. When Sir Isaac Newton was a child he cried for the moon, and when he became a man he got it, and the sun and the stars thrown in." Absalom's fault was not in crying for the moon, but in reaching out and grasping—mud.

It is deeply interesting—and deeply disgusting—to see how closely Absalom's political methods are followed by the average modern politician, so he has the world learned in twenty-five hundred years! Still the man who has ambitions for place and power throws out crafty hints of weakness, or worse, in those now occupying office, and is liberal in promises of ideal conditions if only he is given authority. There is a record of one man, John M. Morehead, who was actually elected into Congress. It was seven years ago, and the Republicans of North Carolina got him to stand for election, urging that they only wanted to use his name—he was a busy manufacturer—and that he stood no chance of being elected. He made no speeches and attended no meetings; but, to his unspeakable dismay, he was elected. He bitterly denounced what he called the "base treachery" of his friends, and went to Washington with a sore heart. Thus it was with George Washington when he was named for commander of the Revolutionary army—he retired from the room in vast surprise and confusion. Thus it is said to have been with Pope Pius X, the predecessor of the present Pope, who pleaded tearfully with his brother cardinals not to place upon him the supreme honors of the Catholic Church. Always it is the men most worthy of advancement seek it least and are even most reluctant to accept it. They are the opposite of Absalom.

Absalom was not lost in the bristling woods of Gilead; he was lost years before, when he first abandoned himself to unholy ambition. Says Dr. A. F. Stauffer, "He who coincides with God's plan succeeds; he who does not is crushed." And he is crushed as soon as he gives himself fully to a way that diverges from God's way. The oak on which Absalom was hanged was his own selfishness. The darts that pierced his heart were not Job's; they were his own cruelty and rapacity. Doubtless he died without realizing what a monster he had become, as Dr. Jekyll became Mr. Hyde inevitably, but by insensible degrees. And his downfall and ruin will be ours if we do not constantly bathe our lives in love.

Ehoses from the Holy Land

"The king stood by the gateside." In all Oriental cities the main gate took the place of modern municipal buildings. This is one of the earliest reviews of troops that we read of. "Wood of Ephraim." I have lived many years in Syria and often smiled at the use of the word "forest" for the stunted oaks and undergrowth that sagged over the mountains of Syria, until in a journey over Mount Gilead I saw a bit of primeval forest where a hand of man had lifted an ax for centuries. But within ten years the Hijaz Pilgrimage Railway has opened that country to the charcoal burner who supply the city and country of Damascus, so that these bits of primeval forest are rapidly disappearing, and no man cares to protect or renew them.

"Wood devoured." There are still many slopes of Gilead where neither man nor horse can make his way, except by the use of a hatchet or a strong instrument like a pruning hook. One may make long detours around these thickets, but cannot go through them.

Often, in hunting, when a partridge or woodcock took refuge in a thick clump, there was no way of getting it up again except by setting fire to the clump. When a discomfited host ran for shelter into such dense undergrowth, it is easy to see how the "wood devoured" more than the sword, and it is also easy to understand how Absalom's long tresses, of which he was so proud, combined with his armor, became the means of hanging him in such a forest.

Absalom rode a "mule." Some of the easiest, strongest, swiftest riding animals in the country still are mules; and a fine white mule brings a price equal to the finest horse. When the Egyptian army invaded Syria in 1839 its leader, Ibrahim Pasha, rode a remarkable mule, which covered almost unbelievable distances in a single day. Mules are phenomenal in their toughness, and were no doubt as stubborn and as unmanageable in Absalom's day as in ours, so that there was no holding the animal back after Absalom became entangled in the oak undergrowth.

"Ten shekels of silver and a girdle." The silver shekel was worth about sixty-eight cents. The girdle was a band or scarf, worn about the waist or over the shoulder for ornament, like the modern sash in connection with military badges of distinction, such as, for example, the Victoria Cross.

Absalom's body was cast into a great pit and a great heap of stones raised over him. The custom still remains of burying a murdered man almost where he falls. The heap of stones may mean the detestation of those who killed the victim or a monument to keep alive the purpose of avenging his death. I have seen dozens of such heaps east of the Jordan, in Gilead and elsewhere. Absalom, according to Josephus, during his lifetime built a monument for himself on the slope of the Mount of Olives near the brook Kedron. Such a monument still exists and is one of the sights of Jerusalem. Modern Jews have buried its sides deep in the stones which they throw against it in execration.

Points for Teachers

By Oscar L. Joseph

Verse 1. We must know the extent of our resources before we enter upon any undertaking.

Verse 2. (a) Just as David divided his army into three companies under expert leaders, so it is only by a division of labor that any work can be accomplished. (b) David's willingness to accompany his army was for the sake of encouragement. Personal interest is far more effective than anything that is done by proxy.

Verse 3. It is often easier to do the work yourself than to get others to do it, but a trained leader shows others the way and so multiplies himself many times and increases his influence.

Verse 4. The king bade his men godspeed as they went forth to fight. Cheer is a great stimulus to those who are facing difficulties.

Verse 5. The greater obedience is shown by those who are true to their convictions, even if it involves disregard of the laws of the state. Those who have suffered for conscience' sake in Russia and China in recent years are therefore heroes.

Verse 6. The wood of Ephraim had many pitfalls which were overgrown by jungle creepers. Appearances are deceptive.

Verse 7. Those who go to war must pay the terrible penalty of loss of life and fortune.

Verse 8. The wood devoured more than the sword because of the deceptive precipices. Colonel Gorgas and the United States Medical Corps destroyed the death-bringing mosquito in the Panama Canal Zone and freed this region from yellow fever. Improve the sanitary conditions of people and much will be done for social redemption.

Verse 9. Absalom relied on his handsome appearance more than on honorable manners, and so he came to grief. Beauty of figure without strength of character is vanity and a snare.

Verse 11. A spirit of vengeance produces endless misery, but a spirit of patient forbearance results in blessedness.

Verse 12. Be true to your conception of duty at any cost. Loyalty to conscience is worth much more than many dollars.

Verse 14. Joab quickly got rid of Absalom, who was the public enemy. How do we treat our enemies, like intemperance, immorality, gambling, dishonesty and other private and public sins?

A GOOD THING

When It Comes Along Don't Let It Get Away From You.

"I really feel that it is hardly possible to say too much in favor of Grape-Nuts as a health food," writes a Chicago woman.

"For 9 or 10 years I had suffered from indigestion and chronic constipation, caused by the continued use of coffee and rich, heavy food. My ailments made my life so wretched that I was eager to try anything that held out a promise of help. And that is how I happened to buy a package of Grape-Nuts food last spring.

"That ended my experiments. For in Grape-Nuts I found exactly what I wanted and needed. From the day I began to use it I noticed an improvement and in a very few weeks I found my health was being restored.

"My digestive apparatus now works perfectly and chronic constipation has been entirely relieved. I have gained in weight materially, and life is a very pleasant thing to me so long as I use Grape-Nuts once or twice a day. I have found by experiment that if I leave it off for a few days my health suffers.

"A physician in our town has great success in treating stomach troubles, and the secret of it is that he puts his patient on Grape-Nuts food—it always brings back the power of digestion."

"SHALL I DRINK?"

BY JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER

This book will convince you that strong drink in all its forms should be abolished.

It is by all odds the strongest arraignment of the drink habit we have yet seen.

It will help tremendously in the bringing about of national prohibition.

It contains diagrams showing the effect of alcohol upon the brain; alcohol and its effect upon tuberculous patients; alcohol and social welfare (see illustration below); where drink does its worst among insurance men; why employers prefer non-alcoholized workmen; the effect upon children of intemperate families as compared with those of temperate families; how strong drink affects the memory; how long may a man expect to live if he drinks and how long if he does not drink; the effect of strong drink on pneumonia and other diseases; the mortality of children of drinking mothers compared with the mortality of those of sober mothers.

THE OPINION OF AN EXPERT

"Thirty years ago physicians were rather promoters of the use of alcohol both as a stimulant and as a remedial agent. Now, everywhere on both sides of the Atlantic, medical men are foremost opposers of the use of spirituous liquors as a beverage and even in the treatment of disease."—Professor Frederic Peterson, M.D., Columbia University.

All through this remarkable book are illustrations which graphically portray the curse of drink. The charts and diagrams showing its effect upon all classes give it the quality of a moving picture which portrays the horrors of intemperance very strongly indeed.

WHAT OTHERS THINK OF THIS BOOK

"Dr. Crooker believes that John Barleycorn received his death blow when science in the last part of the nineteenth century declared that 'Alcohol is not a life-giver but a life-destroyer.' In support of this declaration he asks the question, 'Shall I drink?' and lets men and women prominent in various fields answer it."—The Survey.

"This is a hand-book of up-to-date facts, and as an historical and philosophical discussion in popular language of the drinking of alcoholic beverages this is the best book published."—The Boston Transcript.

"The book is the best on the results of recent scientific investigation. It were well if parents were to see to it that a copy of the book were in the hands of all of their children, girls as well as boys."—Journal and Messenger.

"If one desires one of the very best, most compact, most authentic presentations of the facts concerning the liquor traffic that has been published in recent years he will find it in the volume entitled 'Shall I Drink?' Not in a long time have we read of a work on this very important subject which could compare with this one in its array of the results of scientific investigation of the problem and in its interpretations of the present commercial, social and legal status of the business; and that, let it be added, without hysteria, bigotry or loss of poise."—Zion's Herald.

the total was 1,338,800, but this does not include the Bavarian, Saxon or Wurtemberg losses, which, if added, would probably bring the total up to a little over 2,000,000.

In the House of Commons Premier Asquith announced the British losses to May 21 to be as follows:

	Killed	Wounded	Missing
Officers	3,377	6,498	1,130
Other ranks	47,615	147,482	52,617
Totals	50,992	153,980	53,747

The losses in the naval division are not included in this list; nor are the losses of the British forces operating in Africa and the near East.

France has given out no comprehensive lists of casualties since the war began; it is evident that the government considers it desirable to withhold information of this nature. Neither have Russian nor Austro-Hungarian casualties been announced in any complete manner.

The campaign in the west has been marked during the last week by a very considerable gain of ground by the French, on a line beginning at Arras and ending at Richebourg l'Avone, which gain has been in continuation of the gains of the last two weeks in the same region and has been most marked in the immediate vicinity of Arras, a little to the north and northeast. The village of Neuville-St. Vaast, which has been so long fought over, has completely passed into French hands, much of the ground having been won at the point of the bayonet. Souches, a little farther to the north, which has been bitterly fought over most of the week, has also fallen into the possession of the French, as have Ablain and Aix-Noulette still farther to the north, though heavy fighting continues on the eastward slopes of the hill of Lorette between the two places.

The objective of this French movement is the town of Lens, a stepping-stone, strategically, to La Bassée, and the whole result of the week's fighting is a French gain of from one and a half to two and a half miles on a north and south front about sixteen miles long. Northwest of this in the Ypres region there has been much less fighting the past week than for some time lately; both the British, who hold this part of the line for the Allies, and the Germans have been unusually quiet. Such fighting as has taken place has been in and around Hoge, a little to the east of Ypres, and at Hill No. 60. To the west, towards the sea, the week has been very quiet.

Near Soissons, farther to the east, there has been considerable fighting at Moulin à Toutvent. Here, too, the French have been successful, scoring a considerable gain in ground and taking a considerable number of prisoners, besides some artillery. On the rest of this part of the line, and to the eastward until the Meuse-Moselle region is reached, there have been only artillery duels of more or less violence.

Between the Meuse and the Moselle, however, there was really hard but indecisive fighting in the much fought-over Le Prêtre forest. North of Verdun the Germans made an attempt to bombard that fortress with heavy siege guns, but the range was too long. In the Vosges and in Alsace all was reasonably quiet. On the whole the results of the week's fighting decidedly favored the Allies.

The fall of Przemyśl late last week terminated the first phase of the Russian retreat in Galicia. The fortress was rushed after the Teutonic heavy artillery had made a breach in the circles of defending forts, and the Russians not being able to successfully withstand the rush, the fortress and town returned to the possession of their original owners after being in Russian hands for a period of ten weeks.

As the way to the east was open the Russians lost comparatively few in prisoners with the fortress, so ten thousand or so being all. The army of General von Mackensen divided into two parts, one of which, started east toward Lemberg, is moving directly east along the railroad and has Sadowia. The Russians are retreating before it, and probably will do so until Grodek is reached, which town they will probably endeavor to make a stand, this being the only point to the west of Lemberg topographically adapted for defense.

The other division of Von Mackensen's command has moved northwardly and has reached Lubaczow at the junction of the Lubaczowka and Zawadowka rivers, forty-three miles northeast of Przemyśl and well on the way to the Rawaruska line, which is the important line of defense in northern Galicia, and which evidently the army aims to occupy.

Northwest of Jaroslau, in the northern part of the triangle formed by the San and Vistula rivers, the Russians are endeavoring, without much success, to make a stand, at their position is threatened from all sides.

In southeastern Galicia the advancing Austrians have, south of the Dniester River, reached and crossed the Luken River and hold a line of battle beginning in the north at Byslou, to the east of Kalusz, and extending south through Nadworna to Lanczyn, on the Pruth, from which latter point an advance of the right wing for but a few miles will enable the wing to effect a junction with the Austrian army now in position from Kolomea to Czernowitz, and thus encircle the Russians operating to the north of the Pruth River.

To the north of this army another army has advanced to and taken the town of Stanislaw, and holds all the country to the northwest of this latter place, to within a comparatively few miles of Lemberg, which city seems destined to fall very shortly into Austrian hands again.

In Poland, southern and central, there was little fighting in the last week. Near the Niemen River, however, in North Poland, there was considerable fighting, and the Germans advanced on the south to within a couple of miles of the city of Koenigsberg, taking the fortifications on the military road at its entrance into the city, thus closing a gap in their encircling line.

grime and smoke of workshops. She hid some of the children had never dated their feet in clear, cold running water on a hot summer day, or felt a sea breeze against their warm little heads. "Why," she told me, "I saw a little girl one day—a bright little thing—who began to question me with all manner of questions. Somehow, during our conversation, I happened to mention the word 'country.' 'What is country?' she asked. 'Have you never been to any fresh-air home?' I said, incredulously. 'Have you never been away from the city?' The child led me a transparent hand and brushed her damp hair back from her forehead. 'No,' she answered me, 'I ain't si—why should I?'

There are a great many children within a stone's throw of us who are not sick. They are merely dying of the country that they may never see to see. Just a few days of happiness may mean a great change in their lives, it may mean a change in lives to come, for centuries. It's a large responsibility, this debt that we owe the Mont-Lawn is waiting; its doors are open! And the children are waiting in the city, waiting. It lies within the great, happy Christian Herald Family, to determine whether they will ever reach this promised land. What will be your part?

SHALL OUR CHURCHES BE TAXED?

A BILL TO TAX NOT ONLY HOUSES OF WORSHIP, BUT CEMETERIES, PRIVATE COLLEGES AND SCHOOLS AND CHARITABLE AND MISSIONARY INSTITUTIONS

FROM time immemorial, as the ancient phrase runs, churches, cemeteries, religious and educational institutions, and all property devoted to philanthropic objects, have been free from taxation in the United States. To even suggest taxing the Lord's house or its adjuncts in any degree would have excited something like a thrill of pious indignation in the breasts of our worthy ancestors. But the modern spirit, somehow, looks differently on these questions. It must be admitted that it has not the old-fashioned respect for class privilege which regarded all such institutions as more or less sacred. On the contrary, the modern idea is that all alike should bear a proportionate share of the public burdens, and that there is no good reason why very many of the enormously wealthy churches and endowed institutions should be free, at a time when the average citizen is groaning under the oppressive weight of state taxes.

The advocates of this new idea are probably not confined to any locality. They urge, in substance, that since taxation without representation is wrong, why then should there be representation without taxation? The first steps of movement looking to the taxation of charitable, benevolent and religious institutions were taken lately in the New York Legislature, by the introduction of a bill for that purpose. How far-reaching this may ultimately prove can only be conjectured. Should the bill which is more fully explained below become a law in New York, it will be precedent for similar action in any other state of the Union.

THE New York State Assembly on February 25, a bill was introduced by Mr. John Leo Sullivan, entitled "An act to amend the tax law in relation to the amount of exemption from taxation of property of certain corporations and associations." It prides for the taxing of all property real and personal, in excess of $10,000, belonging to all religious and educational institutions, private philanthropies and wealthy churches, cemetery corporations and a majority of the private colleges and schools throughout the state. The scope of the measure may be gathered from the following extract from the language of the bill itself:

"The real and personal property of a corporation or association organized exclusively for the moral or mental improvement of men or women, or for religious, Bible, tract, charitable, benevolent, missionary, hospital, infirmary, educational, scientific, literary, library, patriotic, historical or cemetery purposes, or for the enforcement of laws relating to children or animals for two or more such purposes, and used exclusively for carrying out thereupon one or more such purposes (and the personal property of any such corporation) shall be exempt from taxation to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars. But no such corporation or association shall be entitled to any such exemption, if any officer, member or employee thereof shall receive or may be lawfully entitled to receive any pecuniary profit from the operations thereof, except reasonable compensation for services in effecting one or more of such purposes, or as proper beneficiaries of its strictly charitable purposes; or if the organization thereof for any such avowed purposes be a guise or pretense for directly or indirectly making any other pecuniary profit for such corporation or association, or for any of its members or employees, or if it be not in good faith organized or conducted exclusively for one or more of such purposes.

"The real property of any such corporation or association entitled to such exemption held by it exclusively for one or more such purposes, and for which no rents, profits or income are derived shall be so exempt, though not in actual use here, for or by reason of the absence of suitable buildings or improvements thereon, if the construction of such buildings or improvements is in progress, or is in good faith contemplated by such corporation or association; or if such real property is held by such corporation or association upon condition that the title thereto shall revert in case any building not intended and suitable for one or more of such purposes shall be erected upon said premises or some part thereof.

The real property of any such corporation not so used exclusively for carrying out thereupon one or more such purposes, but leased or otherwise used for other purposes, shall not be exempt, but if a portion only of any lot or any building of any such corporation or association is used exclusively for carrying out thereupon one or more such purposes of any such corporation or association, then such lot or building shall be so exempt only to the extent of the value of the portion so used, and the remaining or other portion, to the extent of the value of such remaining or other portion, shall be subject to taxation; provided, however, that a lot or building owned and actually used for hospital purposes, by a free public hospital, depending for maintenance and support upon voluntary charity, shall not be taxed as to a portion thereof leased or otherwise used for the purposes of income, when such income is necessary for, and is actually applied to the maintenance and support of such hospital, and further provided that the real property of any fraternal corporation, association or body created to build and maintain a building or buildings for its meeting or meetings of the general assembly of its members, or subordinate bodies of such fraternity, and for the accommodation of other fraternal bodies or associations, the entire net income of which real property is exclusively applied or to be used to build, furnish and maintain an asylum or asylums, a home or homes, a school or schools, for the free education or relief of the members of such fraternity, or for the relief, support and care of worthy and indigent members of the fraternity, their wives, widows or orphans, shall be exempt from taxation, and provided also that the real estate owned by a free public library, situate in any village of the third or fourth class, shall not be taxed as to that portion thereof leased or otherwise used for purposes of income, when such income is necessary for and actually applied to the maintenance and support of such library. Property held by any officer of a religious denomination shall be entitled to the same exemptions, subject to the same conditions and exceptions, as property held by a religious corporation.

IN VIEW of the influence the Sullivan bill, if passed, would have on the metropolis, the Christian Herald requested the Hon. William A. Prendergast, Comptroller of New York City, to give his views as to the general effect of the measure in the event of its passage. The comptroller courteously responded in a letter dated March 4. He wrote that the bill "provided for the taxation of all property real and personal in excess of $100,000 owned by every kind of religious, educational and charitable institution and enterprise in the state." He also submitted a statement of the assessed valuations of the several classes of properties heretofore exempt, which, under such a law, would become subject to taxation. This statement and the subjoined data, the comptroller explained, "have been specially compiled by the Bureau of Municipal Investigation and Statistics of this department for your information. If our interpretation of the bill is correct, approximately 605 associations and corporations, having control of property valued at $300,095,575, would be affected by the passage of this bill. Under the proposed act these associations would be entitled to an exemption of approximately $60,500,000, being $100,000 exemption granted to each of the 605 associations affected, leaving $239,595,575 as the assessed valuation of property (according to the 1914 exempt list) which would become taxable.

"Based on the tax rate for the year 1915, it is estimated that the amount of taxes to be realized from such property is approximately $4,526,743.70, distributed by boroughs as follows:

Borough	Assessed Valuation of Property Subject to Taxation	1915 Rate	Estimated Tax
Manhattan	$177,551,860.00	1.87	$3,320,592.66
The Bronx	20,091,530.00	1.94	389,775.68
Brooklyn	31,808,700.00	1.92	610,727.04
Queens	7,282,445.00	1.95	142,007.68
Richmond	2,341,109.00	2.24	63,640.94
Totals	$239,595,575.00		$4,526,743.70

"THE several kinds of associations and corporations which would be affected by the proposed law have been classified thus:

Class No. Property Included

1. Churches, synagogues, monasteries, convents, mission and parish houses, including parochial schools, theological seminaries and cemeteries located on church lots.
2. Asylums and homes.
3. Hospitals, infirmaries and dispensaries.
4. Religious, social, moral and mental, fire and benevolent associations and aid societies, nurseries, settlements and lodging-houses and Salvation Army properties.
5. Colleges, schools, academies and training schools.
6. Cemeteries.
7. Libraries (other than city).

"A distribution of the estimated tax, according to the class of property affected, is subjoined:

Class No.	Approximate Number of Associations Affected	Assessed Valuation	Estimated Tax
1	349	$115,731,500.00	$2,170,897.48
2	71	20,779,825.00	403,548.51
3	61	28,859,255.00	544,401.61
4	53	11,186,550.00	216,497.14
5	38	36,281,100.00	683,508.56
6	27	24,978,545.00	480,362.44
7	6	1,778,800.00	33,437.96
	605	$239,595,575.00	$4,526,743.70

"With respect to your request for a statement as to reasons that called for this measure," the comptroller's letter continues, "your attention is directed to a statement recently published in the New York Times, based on an interview given to this newspaper by Mr. John L. Sullivan, the introducer of the bill, in which it is stated: 'Assemblyman Sullivan said that the bill had been introduced simply as a revenue measure.' (New York Times, March 3, 1915.)

"On page three of the bill, as introduced, the following clause is reenacted without change, and apparently gives full exemption to the following class of property, viz.:

... and further provided that the real property of any fraternal corporation, association or body created to maintain a building or buildings for its meeting or meetings of the general assembly of its members, or subordinate bodies of such fraternity, and for the accommodation of other fraternal bodies or associations, the entire net income of which real estate is exclusively applied or to be used to build, furnish and maintain an asylum or asylums, a home or homes, a school or schools, for the free education or relief of the members of such fraternity, or for the relief, support and care of worthy and indigent members of the fraternity, their wives, widows or orphans, shall be exempt from taxation."

In a statement which accompanies the comptroller's letter, showing the assessed valuation of real property in New York City which would be subject to taxation under the Sullivan bill, it is stated that there are in all the boroughs of Greater New York 349 churches, synagogues, monasteries, convents, mission and parish houses, parochial schools, theological seminaries and cemeteries, with a whole assessed valuation of $115,731,500, of which $34,900,000 would be exempt under the proposed law; 71 almshouses and homes in the same territory with a valuation of $20,779,825, of which $7,100,000 would be exempt; 61 hospitals, infirmaries and dispensaries assessed at $28,859,255, of which $6,100,000 would be exempt; 53 religious, social, moral, mental, fire and benevolent associations and aid societies, nurseries, settlements, lodging-houses and Salvation Army houses, assessed at a valuation of $11,186,550, of which $5,300,000 would be exempt; 38 colleges, schools, academies and training schools, assessed valuation $36,281,100, of which $3,800,000 would be exempt; 27 cemeteries, assessed valuation, $24,978,545, of which $2,700,000 would be exempt; 6 libraries (other than city), assessed valuation $1,778,800, of which $600,000 would be exempt. The whole assessed valuation of all the properties affected is $239,595,575, of which $60,500,000 is exempt. The measure would of course apply generally throughout the state to similar properties and institutions of the classes included in the bill.

A HEARING took place at Albany, N. Y., on June 1, in the Senate Chamber, before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention. This hearing had been requested for the purpose of opposing a constitutional amendment to the Sullivan bill, introduced at the late session of the legislature by Assemblyman Nixon, the Republican delegate from Buffalo, which proposes to abolish all the present tax exemptions enjoyed by corporations devoted to religious, charitable and educational work.

At the hearing, the churches, charities and educational institutions were represented in force. The Roman Catholic and Protestant churches had special spokesmen ready to protect the interests of their institutions, but the Jewish religious and charity organizations had no speaker present in their behalf. Three speakers were in favor of the Nixon amendment, while a much larger number spoke against it. It was stated after the hearing that the amendment would probably not be reported by the Committee on Taxation, but that instead a substitute would be drafted "which would prohibit any extension to new fields of freedom from taxation."

Some of the arguments presented during the hearing were interesting. Dr. F. J. Bolger, an Elmira Presbyterian pastor, said the churches had long ago passed the period of incubation when tax exemptions were necessary to their growth and existence. "We believe the time has come," he said, "when the churches, in common with all other industries and enterprises, should bear their share of the burden of taxation. The church is hindered by the fact that it permits itself to be pauperized. The question has been asked time and again what right the church has to assume to be the exponent of civic righteousness when it dodges its share of the taxes." Mr. John W. Slacer, chairman of the Protestant Men's Clubs of Buffalo, took similar ground, and asked what justification the state had for asking the citizen to contribute to the upkeep of churches by taxing him so that they might be altogether exempt from tax. Many of these institutions were paying a handsome profit and were abundantly able to pay tax. Mr. James F. Morton, who represented the American Secular Union, urged that at least church property should be taken out of the exempt class. "There should be complete separation between church and state," he said, "and I do not think the state can give the churches something for nothing without violating that principle."

On the other side of the question there were representatives from a large number of prominent metropolitan churches, charities and other institutions. Several of them pleaded that "God's house should not be taxed," and claimed that to tax hospital property would be to compel the city to build new hospitals to care for the poor sick, as private hospitals could not afford to take them in, and public hospitals are even now overcrowded. Various charitable organizations pleaded that taxation would compel them greatly to curtail their activities. It was argued that the public service rendered by the large number of institutions that are now exempt from taxation would be impossible under the proposed change, and, if abandoned, would add millions to the present public charge.

The near-sighted woman who talked to an Indian in front of a cigar store about his soul's salvation declared afterward that she would rather talk to a wooden man than be a wooden Christian and never talk to anybody.

Questions and Answers

Perplexed. Can any one be saved and be cross and "cranky" and say harsh and unkind things? I know the Bible says: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," but I do not think this exempts people from being kind. Sometimes when such persons are remonstrated with for their impatience they give the excuse that they were working hard and were tired.

You are perfectly right in holding that salvation by faith does not release a Christian from the duty of being kind. That is a dreadfully distorted view which some people appear to take. Our faith in Christ should be a faith that brings a cleansing from unkindness, selfishness and impatience, and that fills the heart full of love. Among the fruits of the Spirit Paul names "love, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness." The wonderful 13th chapter of I Cor. gives a vivid picture of what a Christian's life among others should be. As for overwork and weariness, it is perfectly true that they may so strain our mental and nervous system as to put it into an abnormal condition. In our rapid, high-tension American life this condition is very common and we should do all in our power to avoid it. God's command to rest is as definite as his command to work. Between our work times we must take what rest we can, and then trust God to keep us sweet and patient and kind during the hard hours of work.

J. J. M., Indianapolis, Ind. Lincoln's biographers agree that he was a deeply religious man in spirit and by nature, yet he was not an adherent of any denomination. He believed firmly in God, in immortality, in faith, and he repeatedly acknowledged his reliance on divine help. He knew the Bible thoroughly, and drew deep draughts of inspiration from it. In a book issued by the Dodge Publishing Company, New York, we find this quotation from Lincoln, which we do not recall in any of the biographies, but which is sufficiently explicit to give any one who reads it a distinct impression of Lincoln's religious attitude: "I have never united myself to any church, because I have found difficulty in giving my assent, without mental reservation, to the long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterize their articles of belief and confessions of faith. Whenever any church will inscribe over its altar, as its sole qualification for membership, the Saviour's condensed statement of the substance of both law and Gospel, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself,' that church will I join with all my heart and all my soul."

F. W., Washington, D. C. About a year ago our pastor told me he believed I was called to be a minister. I told him such a thought had never entered my mind, but promised him that if I felt the call I would obey it. Since that time the thought has kept coming that I am called and do not know it. My education is very incomplete, my resources limited, my personal religious experience not what I desire. My prayers do not seem to make things clearer.

The real answer to your question is to be sought down near the end of your letter—in the matter of your personal religious experience. Many Christians allow themselves to become perplexed about detail matters of service when their first concern should be to get into the closest possible personal fellowship with Christ. We are apt to forget that our first duty is to love him with all the heart. He calls us to be not servants but friends. See John 15: 15. Very likely if you will make it your first and chief aim to receive "the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ" you will find your heart so full of gladness that you will long above everything else for an opportunity of telling it to others. It may not be necessary to wait for any special call. Begin at once to tell your experience and give your message to those nearest you, and the circle will keep growing wider. Incomplete education and limited resources are no hindrance to those whose hearts are on fire with love for souls and a desire to tell of the grace of Christ. There are ever increasing opportunities for those who support themselves in secular pursuits to engage in the work of soul-winning and religious teaching. Expect God to guide you. He has a work for you to do; he will tell you what it is and give you grace and power for it.

Mrs. C. M., Wahkon, Mich. While there may be no harm in doing what you may have been doing for so long without a thought of evil—that is, no harm in the act itself—there is another way of looking at it. Has it ever occurred to you that while no harm may have resulted to yourself, you may have been setting an example that would work harm to others? We are told to "abstain from all appearance of evil" (I Thess. 5: 22). This means not that we should be self-righteous and set store by out-and you sincerely desire to repent and be forgiven, it is the work of the Spirit drawing you back to God. Confess your sins before him, and throw yourself on his mercy, asking forgiveness for his dear Son's sake, and it will be granted. We are assured that he will not turn away any who call on him in the sincere desire to lead a Christian life henceforth. He will not only pardon all the past, but will give you strength and grace to keep you from falling again. And remember, he saves to the uttermost.

L. M., Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "The Right Rev. Mr. Cochran, Methodist Bishop of Maryland, recently sent out a political letter which I think plainly shows how wrong your statement in this week's issue of the Christian Herald really is. You claim that there is no instance of Methodists using the ballot box." A printed copy of the letter of Bishop Cochran, which L. M. sends us, shows that it is a circular letter to the clergy of Baltimore in which he requests the name and address of the president and secretary of the Brotherhood and Men's Club of the churches, with a view to corresponding with them regarding the formation of a City-wide Good Government League. The bishop's letter says: "The time has come for the good citizenship of our churches to be as

N. C. E., Elmira, Ore. There is no quotation of the sort in the Bible. Your kindly letter is greatly appreciated.

J. J., Portsmouth, Ohio. The inventor of shrapnel is supposed to have been General Shrapnel, a British officer. The name and circumstances of the invention are not stated.

Samuel B. Miller, Kewanee, Iowa, would be glad to send some reader of this paper a copy of the paper on Periton's Ride in the Conemaugh at the time of the great Johnstown flood. The first line reads: "For many a year, ye have heard of the ride of 11 Revere."

W. B., Wilczinski, Miss. saying "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones," is an old English proverb, and means that those who are open to censure or criticism should be careful how they speak of others, lest they find fault with them. The origin of it is unknown. It is not a Bible proverb.

J. B., Gotham, Wis. The Christian Herald War Relief Fund is distributed to the widows and orphans of the war without any distinction whatsoever as to religion. This rule is followed at all of our relief stations in France, Belgium, Holland, England, Germany, Austria, Poland, Galicia, Persia and Palestine.

A. A. J., "Believe in me" and "Believe me" are synonymous.

H. M. D., Litchfield, Mass. 1. The doctrine you speak of is Unitarianism. 2. Pastors should make no attempt to study the prophecies, for the times and circumstances under which they were written, are apt to take a superficial view of their importance. 3. We believe you would do well to choose a church where the Gospel of Jesus Christ is preached.

C. A. B., Decatur, Ill. It has been very often said that, while no one church or denomination has a monopoly of the truth, all have more or less of the truth. We have never believed the attitude which denounces others simply because they do not agree with us in matters of detail. When they hold the great essentials of the Christian faith, they are Christian, in spite of differences in creeds or ceremonies. There are doubtless many who find themselves as you do with respect to certain Scriptural interpretations; but even this difference is not vital. Further, many find that they receive more spiritual benefit in one church than in any other, and if that church holds the essentials, then it is the best church for such a people. We sometimes hear doubts expressed as to the orthodoxy of the teachings of certain pastors; but this, after all, is a matter which soon settles itself. If any man's work is for God, it will be acknowledged by him and stand; if otherwise, nothing under heaven can make it permanent. It may flourish for a little time, but will ultimately pass away and be forgotten.

The Deserted Mill

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

It stands alone and silent
Beside the singing stream;
And at the time of twilight
The sunset's fading beam
Rests on it like the shadow
Of some forgotten dream.

Its wheels have long been quiet;
It braves the rain and snow;
And yet its heart is aching
With emptiness and woe;
And I am sure it misses
The grain that used to flow.

Beneath its sloping shelter,
In June the lovers stand,
And tell a sweet old story
That lives in every land.
(They think that it is sleeping
And does not understand!)

It stands alone and wistful
Beside the sighing stream;
And at the time of twilight
The sunset's dying beam
Rests on it like the promise

ward appearances, but that we should be careful not to let our thoughtless acts or words, and even our amusements, become a stumbling-block to others. It was in this spirit that Paul said (I Cor. 8: 9) that we should take heed lest we make our liberty a stumbling-block to those that are weak.

W. M. N., Annapolis, Ill. The passage in Rev. 13: 18 relative to the number of the Beast has been a fruitful source of discussion. "Here is wisdom" implies that spiritual wisdom is required to solve the mystery and not the wisdom of man. "The number of a man" is interpreted to mean counting as men generally count. See chapter 21: 17, where a similar phrase is employed. There have been many speculations concerning the number given, some of them very ingenious, but none convincing. It is still an unsolved mystery. 2. The early Christian Church was not Catholic, although it is so claimed by the historians of that faith.

Z. Z., Oklahoma. Hebrews 10: 26 has reference to presumptuous sin committed wilfully by one who has been "enlightened," i.e., who has received the Gospel and professed acceptance and has a full consciousness of its obligations. In the verses that follow, it is shown to be a very grievous sin in God's sight. The Christian who has thus fallen away must come back to the cross, for there is no other atonement for him. But we are not to infer that the backslider should despair of forgiveness. (II Cor. 2: 7.) In the passage in Hebrews 10, Paul utters a solemn warning against the dangers of backsliding, but does not mean to imply that the door of mercy is shut against one who, having fallen away, now sincerely repents and returns. Peter denied his Lord, yet he was forgiven. If your own heart convicts you of sin, alert in the service of good government as are the self-interested politicians in the service of vicious interests." L. M. does not seem to have observed that there is a wide distinction between a church using its influence in behalf of good government and a church which organizes its members into a canvassing club to boost one set of individual candidates, distributing handbills at the church doors and personally soliciting votes, as seems to have been done in Chicago. It is bad enough for a church to mix up in practical politics in any way; but to use the membership as a political club is to push things to the last degree.

Mrs. W. W. C., Mount Joy, Pa. The passage in I Sam. 18: 10, in which mention is made of an "evil spirit" in the heart of Saul, is interpreted as referring to his mental condition after having been convicted of disobedience against God. (See I Sam. 15: 10, 11.) "He had wilfully disobeyed the divine command and his final rejection had been the result. He was left to his sins and his punishment." The consciousness of his transgression and rejection at times took such possession of him that he became frenzied, and in the phraseology of that early time it was said: "An evil spirit took possession of Saul." Josephus, the Jewish historian, says on this subject: "The divine power departed from Saul and removed to David. . . . Some strange and demoniacal disorders came upon Saul and brought upon him such suffocations as were ready to choke him; for which the physician could find no other remedy but this: that if any person could charm those passions by singing or playing upon a harp, he advised them to inquire for such an one." All of which today would be explained by saying that the king's melancholy occasionally assumed the form of acute mania.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE COURAGE THIS NATION NEEDS

BY DR. FRANK CRANE

At a mass meeting of the National Security League held at Carnegie Hall in New York City on June 14, Mr. Hudson Maxim read a letter that he had received from ex-President Roosevelt.

The letter severely criticized those who are active in their endeavors to promote peace and to abate militarism.

A number of college students, in Columbia University and elsewhere, have bound themselves not only to oppose war as a method of settling international disputes, but also to refuse to enlist as soldiers if such enlistment is for the purpose of killing citizens of another country in an endeavor to adjust international relations.

These young men have done nothing but carry out the plain teachings of Christianity. They pledged themselves for humanity as against that based and mad nationalism that is now making Europe a hell. If their example were followed by all professed Christians, it would mean the sudden end of all war.

These college men, Mr. Roosevelt says, "The course of conduct which these men and these like him advocate for the nation would of course not only be a peculiarly chosen avoidance of national duty, but our people at this time, but would also inevitably tend permanently to encourage the spirit of mental cowardice no less than of national cowardice."

Extending his remarks, Mr. Roosevelt continues: "Weakening people, as we all know, sometimes does a course of action which is infamous, and is approved by the great Gospel-based party. If, in cases, there are always some brave men to be found, and on doing or advocating deeds of national cowardice."

"The fact remains that the advocates of pacifism have been most prominent in our country since the past five years have been preaching pacifism. Such preaching, if persevered in long enough, softens the fiber of any nation, and above all, softens the fiber of the individual, and if it is reduced to fact, it is ruinous to national character."

"One whole, for the nation as for the individual, the most contemptible of all sins is the sin of cowardice, and while there are other sins as base there is no baser. The prime duty for this nation is to rectify itself so that it can protect itself."

MR. ROOSEVELT is a man of great attainments, extraordinary efficiency and strong convictions. It is to be regretted, however, that his force is marred by intemperance of expression and intolerance of opinion.

He further lacks two essential things needed in a public leader: his intellect is superficial and works only in conventional lines, and he has no spiritual vision.

His lack of intelligence is shown by his acceptance of a matter of course of the old principle that the only way to secure justice for a nation is to be ready to make war. He slips easily into the mental groove where all the statesmen of Europe run.

It ought to be unnecessary to point out to any one how in reason the bald fallacy of this principle. It is not a matter for argument; it is a matter of fact, history, of present conspicuous illustration. The military preparedness never has abated or prevented war. Every nation that has tried it is gone down. The nations now trying it are on their way to ruin. Germany, the best prepared of all, is self fighting the whole world, with no possible outcome but her utter destruction.

The facts, however, make no difference to the individual that surrenders itself unconditionally to a hostile power.

W I D O not wish to make Mr. Roosevelt's mistake and rush to an unwarranted extreme. It is not just that we have an efficient army and navy; that is, sufficient to protect ourselves against sudden attacks by lawless peoples. No one objects to spending enough money upon our armament to keep up to the mark.

But there comes in the lack of vision. Armament and preparedness for war do not prevent war; they merely provoke war. This also is not arguable. It is history.

And what this country wants, what this great, free democracy wants, is to prevent war, not to make it.

And there is but one way to obviate war; and that is by government. War results from the absence of international law with force behind it. Consequently, the only way to render war impossible is to create some form of World Government.

It is to substitute the United States of the World for the present system of fifty-three independent armed nations.

WAR among nations is precisely the same as a riot in the city streets. Only an efficient city police can stop a riot. Only an efficient international police can stop a war.

Forty-eight reasons for American neutrality

Reprinted by permission from a copyrighted cartoon in the Chicago Tribune by JOHN T. MCCUTCHEN

This being manifestly the case, the chief aim of our nation should be to set up at once some form of international federation, carrying with it a central army and navy.

To improve our army and navy, therefore, is well enough; but it is as nothing compared to the necessity of advocating now earnestly and vigorously the only plan that ever will estop war.

Just at this time, the efforts of many men, newspapers and magazines to urge Congress to build more forts and ships, to increase our army and generally to fan the flame of militarism, is peculiarly stupid and wicked.

I F WE must prepare, let us do so quietly. Let us not blazon it to the world, and invite those hostilities that invariably come from truculence.

Let our main energies be devoted toward the beginnings of World Government.

Let us commence with the Western Hemisphere, inviting all American republics to join us in a League of Peace and Mutual Welfare.

Into this nucleus of the United States of the World let us invite China and Japan; and there is every reason to believe they will enter.

Then, when Europe has spent herself in the folly of armed nationalities, she will be glad to join.

This is vision. This is constructive statesmanship. This is going to the root of the matter. This is intelligence.

Why go on forever down the stupid ruts of madness?

MR. ROOSEVELT speaks of cowardice. There is a deeper cowardice.

Physical bravery is cheap. This war has demonstrated that the millions are courageous. Myriads of men have rushed upon belching batteries where instant annihilation was certain. They have watched in hideous trenches. They have marched weary miles. They have agonized, endured. All in splendid courage; all the more splendid because they had no idea what it was all about, and were dying because their governors were too ignorant to manage public affairs.

We have plenty of that kind of bravery in America.

It is common, much commoner than intelligence. You can find a hundred men to fight when you can find ten to reason.

But there is a higher courage that is scarce. And that is the courage to believe the higher laws.

Mr. Roosevelt is the slap-your-face-if-you-insult-me type of hero. That accounts for his popularity.

Jesus Christ was the turn-the-other-cheek type of a hero. That is why he is not popular, and never was in this war-crazed world.

Millions follow Christ as a sort of fetish, or formula of salvation, or rigmorole of superstition, who have not the slightest conception of his program of life.

Jesus had the kind of courage that can wait, suffer, bear insult and be crucified.

This is as far above bull-necked courage as the sun is above a rush-light.

THIS frightful war is upon us as a judgment for the apostasy of the church. She has deserted the Humanity of Jesus and sold herself to the miserable egotism of Nationalism.

There was no Patriotism in Jesus. He was for Humanity.

War is utterly, abominably, horribly opposed to Christ!

It is the very spirit of Antichrist!

If the nominal Christians of Europe had simply said: "We will not go out and kill our neighbors. Take us and shoot us. We can die. We cannot deny our Master," there would have been no war. There would have been no cannon-fodder.

They did not do this because they were spiritual cowards. The young men of Columbia are spiritual heroes.

I AM with them. I would vastly rather die with them for refusing to go to war, die with them against a wall, shot as traitors, than to die killing Germans or Mexicans, because the government at Washington had blundered.

IT IS the militarist who is the coward. The whole troop of swaggering, swashbuckling, hell-roaring alarmists who are doing their best to thrust their country into the horrors of war, simply because their minds are incapable of reason, their eyes incapable of vision, and their souls incapable of any higher courage than a fist-fight—these are the poltroons, these the real cravens in humanity's conflict.

THE victories of Christendom have been won by the Cross, not by the Sword.

It is the Martyrs, not the Conquerors, that constitute the seed of progress.

The courage we want is the Christian courage of vision, of intelligence, of heroic self-sacrifice, and not the brutal, heathen courage of red rage and murder.

Instead of drifting doltishly into this hell-stew of Europe, let us say some new word, stand for some higher thing, worthy of the intelligence and dignity of the greatest republic of history.

Let us declare at once for the Federation of the World, the only program that can abolish war.

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

GREAT BRITAIN and France having formed coalition cabinets, there are signs that the fashion thus set is to spread to Russia, as, at a meeting of the Duma leaders in Petrograd a week ago, a resolution was adopted to request the Czar to convoke the Duma at an early date, with the purpose, immediately after convocation, of moving an address to the emperor demanding a ministry in which the Duma would be represented.

This would involve the retirement of the present prime minister, Goremkin; and, if carried into effect, this program would initiate a startling innovation in the scheme of Russian government, constituting, as it would, the first practical recognition of the political importance of the Duma in the choice of a ministry, and would be a long step in the direction of the adoption of the British system of parliamentary government. Therefore it will be extremely interesting to watch the political developments of the next few weeks in that empire.

Senator H. LaFontaine of Belgium, in an article in the Contemporary Review, makes the first definite statement, from a source worthy of respect, as to the amount of material damage done in Belgium during the campaign there last August and September. Out of the 1,536,336 dwellings in Belgium it would appear that approximately 10,000 have either been destroyed or rendered uninhabitable, or a little less than two-thirds of one per cent.

According to this same authority, about 400,000 of the million refugees have returned to the country. From other sources we are advised that the agricultural activity in Belgium this spring has been great, and that the country in that particular, at least, is moving toward a normal condition.

The elections in Greece have resulted in a majority for Venizelos, which logically means that Greece will take part in the war on the side of the Allies. The greatest advantage in this would be that it would give the Allies much greater facilities as regards bases of operation. This participation probably will not, however, take place before the middle or end of July, as the newly elected Boule does not meet till then.

Directly conflicting accounts of the fighting between the Turks and the Russians came to us during the week, in which both sides claim gains of some considerable importance. This Transcaucasian campaign will probably grow more important in a few weeks, as a much stronger Turkish effort may be expected in this direction, particularly if, as seems probable, Russia finds herself in a very difficult situation on her western front. We know that she has been obliged to transfer a portion of her Caucasian army to Galicia, and to all appearances she will have to transfer more of it to Central Poland within a short time. If this happens, it will be Turkey's chance, and presumably she will improve it.

The Italian campaign against Austria still remains in the stages of preliminary operations. On the eastern front towards Trieste, the advancing Italians have arrived at a point from whence the city can be seen, a distance of about twelve miles away, and their next movement will bring them directly in front of the first Austrian line of defense, when serious fighting may be expected.

On their western front in the movement on Trent and the Tyrol, the operation is still in the absolutely preliminary stages, and hence has not sufficiently developed to afford a basis for comment.

The week closing June 17 has been marked by the two most murderous air raids which have yet occurred, one by the Allies and one by the Germans. The first attacked the German city of Karlsruhe in Baden, and besides considerable material damage, killed twenty civilians and wounded some thirty. The second was made on an unknown portion of the English east coast and resulted in about thirty deaths besides a considerable number of wounded. In both cases women and children formed the majority of the casualties.

Both sides are reported to be organizing large fleets of aircraft for attacks on the other, and this being the favorable season of the year for this form of warfare, these raids may be expected to increase largely in number and in the resultant casualties.

The submarines also have been very active during most of the same week, and seem extending the sphere of their operations. For the first time ships have been torpedoed off the west coast of Ireland and as far south on the French coast as near the entrance of the harbor of Bordeaux. The loss of life has been considerable.

The campaign in the Dardanelles, both on land and sea, still remains shrouded in considerable mystery both as to the actual operations and as to the results achieved. Mr. Asquith announced in the House of Commons during the week that the government regarded it as against public policy to give out any news of these operations and that all that could be said at the present time was that they were proceeding satisfactorily and that they would eventually be crowned with success. From such news, outside of such from Turkish sources as has leaked through, it can be gathered that the fighting on the land has become trench fighting entirely, that such progress as the Allies have made has been necessarily slow and will continue to be so, owing to the difficulties presented by the ground, and that the casualties have been very heavy. The Turkish bulletins claim advantages at several points, and the sinking of a warship of the Agamemnon class, but this latter claim has been officially denied by the British Admiralty.

Great Britain appropriated another billion and a quarter during the week for war expenses, and Hungary issued a fresh war loan for $250,000,000. The total war cost per day for all the combatants is now estimated at $65,000,000. Fifteen days at this rate would more than pay off the entire interest-bearing debt of the United States.

Both Great Britain and France, who are purchasing largely in the United States, have evolved a plan of paying for these purchases by inducing their subjects who are holders of American securities to exchange such securities for war bonds issued by their respective governments, which governments can sell or place such securities in the American markets and thus raise the moneys necessary to pay for such American purchases as these governments are making. The plan is an interesting one, but it remains to be seen whether it will work. Several billion dollars' worth of American securities are supposed to be held abroad, principally in Great Britain.

The peace movement, to which attention has recently been drawn in these columns, initiated by Holland, must not be lost sight of amid the clash of arms. Though not attracting a very great amount of public attention, it is the most serious and most well-founded of all movements that have been started since the outbreak of the war, and in due time will bear fruit.

Albania, that unfortunate little country on the eastern shore of the Adriatic, between Greece and Montenegro, which seems to have been the sport of destiny since its organization into a government by the powers, was this week invaded by both Serbia and Greece in a little war of their own, the former from the east and the latter from the south. The Albanians, who are a race of mountaineers and have many of the qualities of the Swiss, will no doubt put up a strenuous fight, but will, it is to be feared, be overwhelmed by the weight of numbers. The object of the Serbia is of course to secure a foothold on the coast, while the Greeks have long been desirous of annexing the southern part of the country.

Northern and central Serbia are still in the grip of typhus, which does not appear to be even coming under control. Cholera may follow summer fevers.

During the last week, in the western campaign, such honors as were won were won by the French. These continued their offensive on the line from Richebourg l'Avon to Arras, and made further gains though perhaps not quite as rapid as in the preceding week. The importance of the stake, the possession of the town of Lens, for which the French are primarily contending here, is very considerable, for this town and its immediate vicinity is mined a large percentage of France's coal supply, and France is very short of coal, so short that the scarcity thereof is having an appreciable effect on the manufacture of munitions of war.

These gains, which were only won after severe fighting and heavy losses, comprise the complete possession of Neuville St. Vaast, directly north of Arras; control of the so-called labyrinth, a little northwest of Neuville; the absolute occupation of Souchez and its approaches; and the complete control of the Latta Hills. Any one of these taken singly is of comparatively little importance, but the combination of the several advances is of value. Groun was also gained by the French at Aix, Noulette and Angres to the north of Souchez, but here their advantage was not so marked. At the advanced points the French line has reached within four miles of Lens.

A little to the east of Lens there was also some severe fighting during the latter part of the week between the British and Germans.

At Hoo the British made a thousand-yard gain, and at the south Festubert at one time had a very considerable gain, having taken three lines of German trenches over a front of six miles or so. A strong German counter attack, however, drove them back to their former positions, regaining the lost trenches. The casualties in this fighting were very heavy, some twelve or fifteen thousand in all.

Considerable fighting took place during the week at or in the vicinity of Moulin-à-Toutvent, a little to the east of Soissons, in which both sides aimed at a captured trench or two. There was a little infantry fighting in Champagne, north of Perth and La Mesnil, and a good deal of bombarding, particularly in the Rheims section.

In the Argonne and between the Meuse and Moselle unusual quiet prevailed during the week, which for this section is very unusual. There was some fighting of a preliminary character in the Argonne and in upper Alsace. The indications at present

Two colporteurs converted from idleness to tramping for Christ. They walked from San Francisco to New York City, distributing 3,000 Gospels and winning 119 souls. At New York they conducted several services in the Bowery Mission.

"THE ENTRANCE OF THY WORD"

ONE hundred years of peace between the United States and England were recently made the occasion of a year-long celebration, replete with evidences of the value placed upon so long a period of good will. In 1916 the Christian public will be asked to celebrate the passage of one hundred years of war. War against ignorance, against folly, against misery and crime, against sin. The weapons of this warfare were not carnal. The soldiers and their commanders were armed only with the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. The headquarters of this army have been the offices of the American Bible Society, Bible House, New York.

Ninety-nine years of this work are over. The centennial will close an era of Gospel work conducted with printer's ink, quite as advantageous to the world as that other period of one hundred years celebrated for the absence of war between two great nations.

In its ninety-ninth year the American Bible Society issued 349,725 Bibles, 728,832 New Testaments, 5,0160 portions of the Scriptures; a total of 6,3717 volumes. This total represents an increase over the preceding year of 1,137,541 volumes. The bulk of this increase was in the Far Eastern lands. Taking the ninety-nine years as a whole, the society has issued 109,908,608 volumes, consisting of Bibles, Testaments and portions of the Scriptures. One of the things that cannot be done in figures is to estimate the number of lives that have been touched by this instrumentality.

The Bible Society has the ready assistance of many Christian organizations in the distribution of its publications, but colporteurs continue to be the seed division of its forces. This body of men continues to go to and fro in the earth; in every habitation of the earth, and on the seas, offering the greatest family doctor book a sin-sick race can possibly obtain. Their experiences, if only we had time to read about them, are packed with human interest.

There must be something exciting in winning over as students of the Protestant Bible a prizefighter, a mother superior, a Mohammedan, and a saloon-keeper. In mountain homes, in lumber camps, in prisons and hospitals, at county fairs, at ports of entry, at the village corners, as well as in the quiet of a comfortable home, the colporteurs wage their war for Christ.

One of these men uses nine languages in his work. They travel thousands of miles and visit many thousands of families. And often such families! Yet, after the colporteur's repeated visits, and a period of instruction in the Bible, again, "such families, often!" For the entrance of his Word giveth light. In the Atlantic Agency Field of the Bible Society, out of 68,561 families visited in the year just closed, 11,599 were found to be without Bibles. There are fifty-two different languages spoken in that territory.

The work is being carried forward with progressiveness throughout Central and South American countries, the West Indies and Cuba. In Cuba the society finds its Bibles very much in demand, and the people quite ready to pay for them. In Venezuela, their agents meet with determined resistance on the part of the Roman Catholic priests, often supported by the civil authorities. Yet several million copies of their publications were distributed throughout these South American countries.

There has been a marked increase in distribution of Bibles and portions in the Orient, China especially, and in Japan also there was a heavy increase. The native workers in these countries are determined fellows, and determined women too, because there are many women workers in those lands. The missionaries are the greatest help in the foreign field, however. In the Philippines, as has been described in the Christian Herald, educational lectures with motion pictures are conducted, admission to which is secured by the purchase of a Scripture portion. The missionaries approve this course—which by itself has been the means of circulating over 137,000 copies—but the Roman priests oppose the plan.

And yet, throughout the world, the total number of men and women engaged in this colportage work is small. There are only 1,933 in all. But they bear an immense share of the work of distribution and of pioneer missionary work. The Sunday schools, missionary societies, young people's organizations, auxiliary Bible societies and others are important agencies in getting the publications of the society into homes where they will do the most good.

The translation of the entire Bible into the Portuguese language, begun in 1903, was completed in 1913. This is for use in Brazil. A revision of the Zulu version of the Bible is in progress, the corrected proof sheets passing back and forth between New York and South Africa, exactly as though they were going from an office in the Bible House to the composing room on another floor, though with some difference in point of time and means of transportation. Similar revisions are under way in several countries, so as to bring the Bible up to date, as it were, for those lands. The society says that the average American does not dream how many tongues the Bible is printed in, and yet new needs are constantly coming to light.

The centennial of the American Bible Society will be marked by three new undertakings. One is a Bible Congress, which will be held this summer at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. Then there will be the founding of a Bible House at Panama. And the society will participate in the Panama Conference of Missionary Societies. The society intends to utilize to the utmost the traffic on the Panama Canal for the further distribution of Bibles, as it has been found that the boats passing through the Suez Canal afford excellent opportunity for the circulation of Bibles to peoples of many nations and tongues.

The British and Foreign Bible Society of London and the societies in Scotland and Germany are expected to take part in the American centennial celebration. Many important conferences and public meetings addressed by world leaders in religious work will mark the centennial.

WHEN MONT-LAWN SMILES

SOMETIMES Mont-Lawn is in tears. But they are not salt tears. They are merry, sparkling, leaping, laughing, sporting tears, dashed down upon a refreshed world from sun-kissed clouds. When that happens, all the fun and jollity of Mont-Lawn are concentrated. Every youngster is under roof in the big upper floor of Fort Plenty that opens on all sides to all the winds that blow. Anyone sensitive to the uproarious play of children must keep miles away from Fort Plenty on such a day.

It enters now the Fourth of July! The Fourth of July, by the way, was made for children. Fourth of July sprang into the calendar in order that children should ever be free to become good and useful and thoroughly happy citizens of a republic. Nearly three thousand of them get a fair start in the direction at Mont-Lawn every year. And the Fourth of July is the beginning.

For many readers of the Christian Herald live near enough to Nyack to go to Mont-Lawn for the day? Hark up—no, down into your pockets for a fare! Just enough to get to the station and home again; the buses from Mont-Lawn will carry riders from and to the station. And it is a very pretty ride through this historic town and country. You strike into the main street and up its load hill, and then out along a gentle country road. Just as you begin to wonder where Mont-Lawn really is, the youngest member of your party will shout out, "I see it; I see it!" And true enough, Old Glory is the first proud and happy object to apprise you that the Children's Home is near.

Then the overhanging trees hide the flag from sight. Soon you turn out of that road, and begin to climb a very steep bit of hill. There is the flag high above you. Then comes the picturesque wall with its legend, "Christian Herald Children's Home." What thousands of children have shouted aloud at that sight! What thousands have looked back upon it—as the big stage carried them away again to their city haunts—with wistful, hopeful, grateful eyes!

YOU may search for it, but you simply will not find a prettier sight than greets you as the full sweep of the great lawns and their background of tasteful cottages bursts on your sight. You are distracted from the beauty of it only by the lure of the wonderful playground opposite, swarming with children. Between the two, you ride on and turn into the main grounds past the Lodge—a gift building with a remarkable story of love for children behind it—and so on up to the old-fashioned Homestead, next to which stands, in all its attractiveness, dear old Fort Plenty. You can't make up your mind which you will do first, when you alight; whether explore Fort Plenty, or hurry over to the Children's Temple back there to the left. But what you really will do first is to receive the most gracious welcome in the world by one of the most gracious hostesses imaginable, the superintendent of the Home, and her staff of co-workers. Then you will meet a lot of delightful people, who have come there just like yourself to celebrate the Fourth of July with the Mont-Lawn children. You will give most of the morning up to rambling around the grounds, sitting on the veranda of the Homestead, sampling the very excellent refreshments offered in the tent on the lawn, listening to the band, and lolling in the deep shade to watch the boats on the blue, white-capped Hudson down below, or to watch the clouds above its eastern bank.

Promptly after noon hour you will watch the children in their orderly but carefree march to Fort Plenty, where you will see them take their places at the long table and stand in perfect ease and respect while they sing their beautiful verse of grace, and then, in amazement, you will watch them fall to upon their noon repast, like the ladies and gentlemen they actually are at heart. You may wait until they finish and see them stand and hear them sing a word of thanks before marching in perfect order and at the same time perfect abandon, to enter anew into their pursuit of life, liberty and happiness.

After a reasonable lapse of time there will be the parade of the children to the Temple and a brief hour there of simply marvelous singing by them. Honestly—I say this without fear of successful contradiction—you will get one thrill at least right at the opening of these exercises such as you have never had before. And as often as you go to the Children's Temple and hear the children sing their flag song, you will receive that same delicious thrill. This delightful hour over, these urchins of the New York streets will entertain you with all sorts of racing games, folk dances, and perhaps some little impromptu fun of their own. Then reasonable quiet will prevail, and two or three addresses, well worth hearing, will be made by good friends of this institution. We do not announce their names in advance, but no audience has ever yet been disappointed.

All this time Old Glory has been waving its benign protection over the scene. The band, when opportunity offers, has been doing its part with entire satisfaction to all. Now, there is just the least hint of the end of day. Soon the beautiful flag will be drawn down before the mists of approaching night. The speeches are over. The singing by everybody of a patriotic song or two is over. Every child is standing facing the Star-Spangled Banner. Every hand is at salute. A sudden great chorus sounds out: "I pledge allegiance to my flag" (how straight and true those three hundred hands stretch out towards the symbol of freedom!) "and to the republic for which it stands. One nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

You simply can't remain seated. Everybody is up. The band knows its duty. And the national anthem closes one of the greatest Fourths you ever spent.

COMING?

THE JOY OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

A SERMON BY REV. EDMUND T. BYLES*

TEXT: "For you, therefore, that believe is the preciousness." I Peter 2: 7.

THIS is a text from the Revised Version. At first we do not like it. We seem to lose the tenderness of the beautiful old rendering "to you, therefore, that believe he is precious." Yet the new and truer rendering has a beauty of its own. "The preciousness" sums up in a word the happy Christian experience of the joy of which the epistle so far is full. It stood for the secret of happiness which Peter possessed and was shared by those to whom he wrote. He begins by exclaiming, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He says they have "a living hope," that they "greatly rejoice," that they "rejoice greatly with joy unspeakable and full of glory." They who believe have the secret of happiness. For them is "the preciousness" of the knowledge of Jesus.

It is the same truth of which the New Testament, and the Old Testament too, is full. Religion is a joyous experience—not a creed, a ritual, a system of morality. As Paul argues in his great Epistle to the Romans, it is an experience which Abraham and David had, and now we too; for "being justified by faith, we have peace." To have peace is a glad consciousness. Peter is expressing the same thing when he says in our text that believing in Christ we find his "preciousness"—the treasure of a happy Christian experience.

Let us look first for a moment at the conditions of it. It is "to you, therefore, that believe." Now what does this mean? It cannot, of course, mean that we believe in Him as we may be said to believe in the Pilgrim Fathers or Christopher Columbus—that is to say, that we believe in him merely as an historical or even as a divine personage. Because true "believing" is always followed by a certain experience—"in whom believing ye rejoice"—in the relation of cause and effect. And if there is no effect there is some mistake about the cause. Therefore it cannot mean accepting a creed; for that kind of faith does not bring this happy experience, as many who believe themselves to be Christians sadly know.

"I Will Never Leave Thee"

In faith, as in all things, Jesus was our example. The faith that brings the preciousness is when we lean on God in Christ as the husband leans on the gentleness and wisdom of the wife, and the wife on the strength and hardihood of the husband; as David and Jonathan leaned one on the other; as Peter leaned on Christ, when for a little while he walked on the stormy waters "looking unto Jesus"; as many a strong man of the world leans, for the sweetest joy of his life, on the dear companionship of some little child. We ask ourselves what we should do if some loved one should be taken away from our side, and we dare not answer. How we lean on them! But what would it mean if Jesus were taken out of our lives? Would it make any real difference? Would it leave any real blank? If not, we do not yet possess the faith that brings "the preciousness."

And what is this "preciousness"? Is it not the treasure of a rich and satisfying friendship? The New Version and the Old are, after all, one: "To you, therefore, that believe, He is precious."

The Chief Among Ten Thousand

There is the joy of loving some one who is in every way worthy—who commands our admiration and our reverence. All true love is founded on respect. Jonathan fell in love with David when he saw him stand "with the head of the Philistine in his hand." David's winning grace of bearing and the proof he held of his devout and reckless courage won Jonathan's instant admiration. So mutual respect is always the foundation of the deepest love. There is intense delight in the heart's possession of one worthy of our respect and loyalty, whom we may call our friend. So when one has seen the noble courage and exquisite charm of Jesus, and has learned to let the mind often gladly think of him, he has found one of the greatest joys of life and an element in the "preciousness" Peter speaks of.

But there is another and still greater element in it. It is not only, nor even chiefly, loving. It is being loved. We instinctively crave for favor. Whose heart has not been touched when some little tot pathetically asks, "Do you like me?" How often are we older folks unconsciously or consciously asking that? It is not a good query to encourage; it is apt to lead to vanity and selfishness. Let us love and not ask too carefully whether we are loved or not. In the case of all people except One. We regard to the gracious and heroic Christ, we may indulge to the full the sweet consciousness, "I am loved."

A Constant Friend

This is the chief meaning of the Cross—its deepest and most essential significance. And the "preciousness" of that great deed of love is where we make it personal, as when Paul said, "He loved me and gave himself for me." The first message of the resurrection morning was to the denier: "Go tell his disciples and Peter." That evening, when he came to the upper room, one was absent. When he came again, the week after, it was to the missing Thomas he first spoke; and in such gentle and convincing fashion that there burst from the doubt-ridden heart the cry "My Lord and my God!" It has been said that, like Thomas, one of us had been missing, not from the upper room, but out of the plan of redemption. Jesus would have come and led again for that missing one. Let us believe it. Our Friend loves us individually. His words of comfort, "Weep not," "Be not afraid, only believe," "Thy brother shall rise again," were spoken thus. And in the home beyond it shall be as the best Browning makes David say:

O Saul, it shall be
A face like my face that receives thee; a man like to Thou shalt love and be loved by forever.

Professor J. Y. Simpson, in his beautiful book on Henry Drummond, says of that noble and gracious Christian that although he was always receiving confidences and being sought by men in trouble, he never seemed to need any sympathy for himself, even in his long and agonizing sickness, giving more comfort and cheer than he received; and that although the most approachable and liberally of men, he was yet distinguished by a certain happy aloofness or loneliness. And he beautifully says that he was reminded of the planet Uranus, whose irregular orbit puzzled astronomers until the secret was discovered in the powerful attraction of the hitherto unseen planet Neptune. So that great and influential life was governed by the attraction of an unseen power—an unseen Friend.

May that friendship be the attraction that governs our lives. May our glad secret be the "preciousness" of the experience of a heart that "leans back" on Him.

FIRST PRAYER IN CONGRESS

In "Thatcher's Military Journal," under date of December, 1777, is found a note containing the identical "First Prayer in Congress," uttered by the Rev. J. Duchesne. It may well be prized as a sacred relic of olden times:

"O LORD, our Heavenly Father, high and mighty King of kings, and Lord of lords, who dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers on earth and reignest with power supreme and uncontrolled over all the kingdoms, empires and governments; look down in mercy, we beseech thee, on these American states, who have fled to thee from the rod of the oppressor, and thrown themselves on thy gracious protection, desiring henceforth to be dependent only on thee; to thee they have appealed for the righteousness of their cause; to thee do they now look for that countenance and support which thou alone canst give; take them therefore, heavenly Father, under thy nurturing care; give them wisdom in council and valor in the field; defeat the malicious designs of our cruel adversaries; convince them of the unrighteousness of their cause; and if they persist in their sanguinary purpose, oh, let the voice of thine own unerring justice, sounding in their hearts, constrain them to drop the weapons of war from their unnerved hands in the day of battle! Be thou present, O God of wisdom, and direct the councils of this honorable assembly; enable them to settle things on the best and surest foundation, that the scene of blood may be speedily closed; that order, harmony and peace may be effectually restored, and truth and justice, religion and piety prevail and flourish among thy people. Preserve the health of their bodies and vigor of their minds; shower down on them, and the millions they here represent, such temporal blessings as thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, thy Son, our Saviour. Amen."

NEWS OF THE KINGDOM

—THE DATES OF THE Bible Conference at Mountain Lake Park this season are August 1-8, and the program will be in charge of the Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.

—EVANGELIST EDWIN R. DOW of Wharton, Ill., and his assistant, Professor Harold F. Holbrook, have just closed a very successful three weeks' union revival campaign at Franklin, Neb. A large number of people accepted Christ as a personal Saviour. All the churches will receive substantial additions to their membership.

—IN ONE OF MISSIONARY JANSEN's missionary trips in the Philippines he recently journeyed from congregation to congregation, and found that his three pair of alpargatas (Spanish soldier's shoes) were worn out before he could get back to the city, and his feet were even cut and bruised where they were unprotected. Yet not only the workers (Filipino) gladly went with him, but also numbers of the Christians—though well nigh worn out—traveled with him from congregation to congregation in order not to lose any of the services.

—EVANGELIST "BOB" JOHNSON has conducted some unusually successful campaigns in Pennsylvania during the past year. It is claimed that he has won to Christ over 25 per cent. of the combined population of the towns in which he has labored. In one church, the mid-week prayer meeting increased from 50 to 400; one Sunday school increased from 350 to 750, and a men's Bible class to 342. In Brookville, a town of only 3,000 population, he had a record of 1,920 converts.

—MISSIONARY CHARLES W. POSNETT of Medak, Nizam's Dominions, India, writes to the Christian Herald of Gospel triumphs in his large parish, which includes more than a thousand native villages, in which there are now 150 Christian communities. In many of these places, the whole out-caste population has become Christian and there is a constant pressure of applicants for baptism. Last year 2,466 new converts were baptized. Many of the villages that have been won by the Gospel are in need of teachers and evangelists. Owing to the war, which has greatly diminished contributions for the work, it was found necessary to economize, and seventy evangelists and Bible-women were dropped for lack of support. It may even become necessary to close some of the institutions for a time until the stringency has passed. Missionary Posnett travels through his seventy-mile district on camel-back.

—AN UNUSUAL WELCOME was given to Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf on his arrival in Bradford, Pa., to open a religious campaign. The executive committee in charge invited all friends of the movement to join in a "welcome delegation" at the train and a parade through the city. Dr. Biederwolf was greeted by the ministers of the city and nearly two thousand Christian friends. In automobiles and to the music of two bands they proceeded through the principal streets to the Y. M. C. A. building, where Rev. Russell Showers, in behalf of the people of Bradford, extended a welcome to all the party.

—MISSIONARY JOHN A. HOWARD, of the American Baptist Mission, Napore, India, writes: "Over 20,000 died in India from snake bites last year. Every evening we had to go out and engage a bullock cart to take our goods to another place. Our rule is always to take a cane and lantern at night. As we were along the road, one of my friends started to see he saw a snake glide toward the bush. He jumped and hit it with his cane. After with it a short time, it became angry and spread its hood, showing the hooflike eyes. Then my friend said in Bengali: 'How full!' I'm frank to confess that I preferred beauty to remain at a safe distance. It was a cobra. A man was bitten by one of them. Before he had gone half a mile he died."

—IN ADDITION TO THE conferences Evangelist Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and M. Alexander since January 3, campaigns have been held in Lima, Ohio; Atlanta, Ga.; Charlotte, N. C. The number of additions to the churches, up to and including May 6,438. Young men offering themselves to ministry, 155; young women offering themselves for the mission field at home or abroad. In Atlanta there were about 4,000 decisions for Christ, and hundreds are being received in the churches. In Charlotte in the last meeting there were 846 conversions claimed.

The Witness of Difficult Enterprise

SUNDAY, July 4. Philippians 4: 13. "I can do all things in Christ who strengtheneth me." The Christian believer is to give witness of his communion with Christ by his ability to do difficult things. The power of the resurrection must be attested in chivalrous enterprise. There must be a certain quiet and sunny assurance in doing impossible things. It must be given naturally, spontaneously, unconsciously, and with all the quietness with which a strongly-engined motor-car takes a precipitous hill. To a sixty-horsepower motor a stiff gradient does not exist. To a soul which is strengthened with the grace which is in Christ Jesus impossibilities are wiped out. "I can do all things in Christ."

John Smith of Harrow, the man whose sacrificial piety has left such a firm seal upon hundreds of Hrovians, was once speaking of some display of moral courage to an old pupil, who remarked: "That was very difficult. I wonder he could do it!" "Difficult?" answered John Smith. "Difficult? He was a Christian!" That is the apostolic tone, as this is the apostolic spirit. The apostle faced the changing road in the faith that they had sufficient equipment for every encounter, and that every facing difficulty would be only a privileged opportunity for additional conquest. Difficulty became an occasion for the unlocking of larger resources in the unsearchable riches of Christ. And so every difficulty came to be interpreted as a promise, and thoroughness was always redeemed. Where difficulty abounded grace did much more abound.

The world is always arrested by the quiet and splendid achievement of difficult things. To see sorrow borne with hopeful courage, to see prosperity won with thoughtful tenderness, to see disappointment met with sweetness, to see the long uncertain day ended with patience, to see personal injuries received in unrevenging meekness, to see kindness in the garish day, and to hear songs in the night—these make the world stand still and wonder. Thus do our very difficulties become missionaries of redeeming grace.

MONDAY, July 5. Isaiah 39: 1-8. "What have they seen in thy house?" These representatives of Babylon, then an obscure state, must have returned to their master with very glowing accounts of what they had seen in Hezekiah's palace. Probably the story of his treasures, which they carried off, became an incentive to the subsequent invasion and captivity of Judah. It was a most immitic act on Hezekiah's part to make this wanton display. It was a contemptible exhibition of vanity and pride, which were absolutely inconsistent with the professions and protestations of the previous chapter. It is easier to die well than to live well, easier to turn our face to the wall in the bitterness of our spirit than to walk in our house with a perfect heart. Surely God had loved his soul back from the pit for something better than this!

It is Isaiah's inquiry suggests a solemn thought to us all. When our friends or visitors tarry under our roof, what do they see there? Do they leave us impressed by what we are or by what we have; by the jewels of our character or the wealth and vanity of our entertainment? Is their thought of us that we are pilgrims and strangers, with our citizenship in heaven; or that, like Hezekiah, in the closing sentence of the chapter, we are principally careful that there should be prosperity and serenity for our time at least? Impress your visitors with the Christian temper, the holy atmosphere, the courtesy, the mutual consideration and the affection of your household! These are the things which they should treasure as a holy retrospect. A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth.

Labor for God Never Lost

TUESDAY, July 6. I Corinthians 15: 58. "Be steadfast, unmovable, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." A little old church in the country village seemed to have failed. The vines are now a tangle of unattended growth about its ancient porch pillars; the paint is worn nearly off its sides; the shingles on the neglected roof rattle in the wind, and the grass is all rank between the stones in the walk that leads to the door that now no longer opens to the Sunday worshippers. The "church folks" kept it open for many years, but with great and ever-increasing struggle and sacrifice. Finally the burden, financial and physical, became too heavy for the handful of devoted souls to bear; the young men and young women left the old home for the city just as they were becoming old enough to take the mantle of church responsibility and service falling from the old people's shoulders. "It's no use," these plain home folks said at last, with something decidedly like moisture in their eyes; "we must shut up the church!"

Little did these hard-working country people realize how truly their labor had been not in vain in that old red meeting-house. They could not know that when the door of their beloved church home swung together for the last time on its already rusty hinges, even at that very moment, perhaps, there opened some wider, grander church portal in a far-away city or land, maybe on the other side of the world, where sons or daughters, removed to more prosperous scenes and larger vision, had sought to find for themselves and for others the way to God in the only way they knew, along the path they remembered leading from that little secluded home church in the country hamlet, where their fathers and their mothers prayed.

They thought, these old and faithful souls, they had failed, when they perforce must close the church; but it was only the failure of the "wheat ears" of which the Master spoke that fall into the earth that they may not abide alone, that they might indeed live again in greater fruitage in another field. "... forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." C. S. C.

WEDNESDAY, July 7. John 9: 13-25. "Whereas I was blind, now I see." What a contrast between the opening and the close of this chapter! The blind sees; the beggar is enriched; the abject is an apologist. The outcast on the temple steps is a worshiper within the true shrine. The soul that was heretofore ignorant of Christ owns him as the Son of God. And all this because of the personal interest our Lord took in him. He had elicited his faith, and in answer to his faith had healed him, and the fact of his healing was now the irrefragable proof that, first, Jesus was a Prophet; second, that he was from God; third, that he was the Son of God. The Pharisees might argue as they chose, but could never convince this man that a great miracle had not been wrought. Their arguments split on the rock of the fact of which he had experience.

This is precisely the truth which Tennyson admirably expresses in those lines of "In Memoriam":

If ever when faith had fallen asleep
I heard a voice "help me no more,"
And heard an echo become more
That trembled in the gods' deeps:

A warmth within the heart would melt
The freezing reason's colder part,
And lo! a man to write, the heart
Stood up and answered "I have felt."

When a sinful man can testify, as Colonel Gardiner did, that the vision of the Crucified Lord, and the power that he gives, has entirely delivered him from the power of vices and passions by which he was held for long years, so that he walks in liberty and happiness, surely that is as genuine a fact of the spiritual, as any stubborn fact which meets the scientist in the physical. The basis of Christianity is not in the reason, but in the life. We are blind, we see; we are weak, we do things in Christ.

A Psalm that Gives Refreshment to All

THURSDAY, July 8. Psalm 119: 1. "Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord." The 119th Psalm is unique. It is the longest of the Psalms, and it is truly a work of art. It is divided into twenty-two sections, each section containing eight verses, and each verse beginning in the original with the same letter of the alphabet, while each of the letters is used in turn. In each verse save one there is some form of mention of the law of God. It is one of the best examples in sacred literature of painstaking accuracy in literary form, and the Psalm par excellence to elevate the Scripture as a guide of life.

The Psalm is autobiographical, and some have thought that the writer had Daniel in mind as he wrote. The author speaks of himself as in exile, as being persecuted, as a young man, as being tempted to employ deceit, as having fallen into sin and learning wisdom from his fall. It also speaks of the writer as being covetous, but finding counsel for his weakness in the joy of God's precepts.

The Psalm is filled with the sense of humility, such as Paul felt when he warned himself that he who preached to others might himself be rejected. More than all these sacred songs, this poem elevates the stainless beauty of the law of God as a buttress and power to restrain and rescue from sin and temptation. Its pervasive spirit is found in the fifty-fourth verse:

Thy statutes have been my songs
In the house of my pilgrimage.

Our humanity never gets tired of this Psalm. It matches well nigh every human mood with its balm of solace and strength.

The "Hidden Root" that the World Cannot Understand

FRIDAY, July 9. Colossians 3: 1-10. "When Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested." Christ is the hidden root of our life. He was the Root of David. All that was fair and beautiful in psalm and throne was first in Christ; and from him we also derive our freshness, fragrance and beauty. Man may pluck the fruit and tear the foliage, but cannot reach the hidden source of our ever-springing life. We must draw upon Christ; but our communications with him are hidden from the eyes of men. They cannot understand us. Why we should hate what they love, and love what they hate; why we should put our fingers in our ears and fix our eyes on something beyond their horizon, and press through Vanity Fair to a city in which they have no part; why we should be so peaceful and content amid the wild tumult of the world is as hidden as the Person of our Lord. Our life is sweet, strong and happy because it is encased in the presence and love of Christ. He is hidden in God, and we with him.

But he is to be manifested. Every eye shall see him. Glory is the revelation of hidden quality. The rainbow prism is the glory of solar light; the flower is the glory of the root; the success of the boy is the glory of the obscure home where he first saw the light. The quality of Jesus will one day be displayed before the eyes of the universe, and we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. We are hidden and misunderstood now, we shall be manifested then. We are now like stars hidden by drifting clouds, but then shall the righteous blaze forth in their Father's kingdom. Here we are incognito, there we shall wear our court dress.

SATURDAY, July 10. John 1: 39. "Come and see." A missionary once said to a German Jew in Bulgaria, "I want you to consent to be a Christian for twenty-four hours; then you may see how it seems and how you like it. Will you do so?" "Oh, yes; I will for twenty-four hours." "Well, then, first, I want you to believe that Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary." The Jew threw up both hands and exclaimed, "Oh, no, I could not do that." "But it's only for twenty-four hours." "Very well, then, I will." "Second, I want you to believe that Jesus died on the cross for the sins of the world." "Impossible, impossible! I could not believe that." "But it's only for twenty-four hours." "Well, well, all right; I will till tomorrow." "Third, I want you to believe that Jesus arose from the dead." "Oh, oh, that I could not do." "But just for the time being?" So he consented. "Fourth, I want you to believe that Jesus ascended into the heavens." "Oh, impossible! No man could do that." "But just believe it till tomorrow. Fifth, I want you to kneel down with me and pray to Christ the Saviour." The old Jew prayed, "O God, Jehovah! If Christ be the true Son of God, let him save me!" When they arose the Jew, putting his hand upon his heart, said to the pastor, "I feel so strange right here." He had received a touch of the divine spirit in his soul. The next day he came to the minister and said, with a smile upon his face and peace in his heart, "I will take him for another twenty-four hours."

The Christianity of Christ is a glorious heart experience. The half was never told except by the revealing power of the Holy Spirit of God.

The Day We Celebrate

INDEPENDENCE DAY brings with it this year, in addition to the flood of memories of the glorious past, a profound sense of gratitude to God, who has kept our beloved country at peace, and has lavished his blessings upon us in such abundance that we have been enabled to become the helper of the nations. In the generations that have passed away since the first Independence Day, there has been no return of the anniversary in which we as a people have had deeper cause for gratitude than the present. This is the idea that should be uppermost in the minds of the American people on the glorious Fourth—the thought that should inspire the oratory of the day and give tone and character to the celebration everywhere.

At this moment the eyes of all are turned toward Washington. Our people know that there is an element at work, bent on thwarting the earnest desire of the nation for peace. They know that, to a very large extent, the newspapers of the country are under the influence of that element, and hence can not represent the real desire of the people, but only the wishes of a comparatively small, venal, reckless faction, which would not hesitate to plunge the country into war to serve their own purposes. They know that the military ring, which has cursed every country in Europe, has secured a strong foothold here and is sparing no effort to excite the spirit of war. And they know that war, while it would bring suffering and untold misery to multitudes, is largely sought by the militarists and by the munition manufacturers, especially the latter, in the hope of enriching themselves, although such wealth would be coined out of the blood of Americans!

No worse evil could happen than that the war-seeking element should succeed in winning over the administration to its view. If under the pretext of "stiffening up our government and giving backbone to the President" in our negotiations with the belligerent powers, they could involve us in the mad struggle, their object would be fully attained. A great crime would have been committed against our nation, which holds in its heart no thought of war. There was a general hope that in the note to Germany our government would recognize the principle of arbitration, since we ourselves had originally proposed that principle, and offered it to all the world as the sane and just method of settling international differences. We stood in honor bound to reaffirm that principle. Our people desired it, and they still regard it as the one honorable available means toward a solution of the issues that have arisen between Germany and ourselves. And they know that a step in the other direction, taken from whatever motive, may easily prove to lead straight to war.

One of the greatest dangers that threaten the republic is the commercial spirit, which would trample down and degrade even the highest aims and noblest ideals. An American poet, Nelson Gardner, whose work will be better known in the coming years, has this wonderful stanza, which might well be written in letters of fire, so that all might read it at the Fourth of July celebration:

*"'Beacon of Nations' is thy rightful name,
And always should thy states resemble stars.
Thy torch of freedom heavenward should flame,
Consuming chains, and melting prison bars;
But Mammon now thy native luster mars,
And often are thy people stricken down
Low as are serfs that kneel before a crown;
For gold is power, and man but grovels when
The purse is mightier than the sword or pen."*

That wise counsels in Washington may prevail and that the enemies of peace may be confounded and put to shame is the hope of the people of this nation, and should be the central thought as we unite in celebrating the anniversary of American independence this year.

Courageous Missionaries

ALTHOUGH they do not pose as heroes, the soldiers of the Cross in foreign mission fields are often subjected to severe hardship and privation. During the present war missionaries in all parts of the world are having a hard time of it. Not only have their regular sources of support been delayed, but they have frequently been in personal danger. Yet only a few days ago a band of some seventy newly appointed missionaries left for parts of Asia that are well within the war zone. Bishop Hartzell writes from Africa to the Christian Herald that many missionaries in his large territory have voluntarily submitted to material reductions in their salaries, and some have even accepted the risk of self-support, rather than leave their posts in the present crisis. In a greater or lesser degree this is the situation in almost all the missionary fields today. These faithful workers need our sympathy and support, and we should not fail them. It must not be said that the Gospel flag was pulled down at any mission station for lack of means to go on with the work. Our churches and their various affiliated organizations should make a strong effort to keep the flag flying and to uphold the hands of the devoted missionaries, thousands of whom are now putting comfort, health, and even life itself into the balance, depending in faith on God's providential care and on the liberality of his people at home to keep them going. Let them not be disappointed.

The Chicago Car Strike

CHICAGO, after wrestling for a few days with what was probably the most extensive car strike any American city has yet experienced, has settled it in record time. Over 14,000 men quit work on the surface and elevated lines, causing much inconvenience to the business interests of the entire city and tying up building operations in which 125,000 workers were employed. Something of the magnitude of the strike may be gathered from the fact that 1,095 miles of surface roads and over 900 miles of elevated lines were at a standstill and their combined passengers, aggregating 3,800,000 persons, were compelled to accept the limited facilities of jitney busses, steam cars, motors and hacks—or to walk to and from their business. Bicycles and roller skates were resorted to by many, and there was a sudden call for cots, to be used in offices and warehouses. The elevated and surface men demanded a substantial increase of wages and a representative on the State Board of Arbitration. Fortunately there was very little disorder, although it had been proposed to import strike-breakers from the East. Foreseeing this possibility, the Chicago City Council forbade the companies to employ strike-breaking crews, unless the men so employed received twenty days' instruction in Chicago. Some idea of the extent of the losses involved in the strike may be inferred from the fact that the daily income of the surface lines averages $86,000, and of the elevated, $25,000. To this would have been added the daily loss in wages to the striking employees. Fortunately, wise counsels prevailed; the representatives of both sides conceded certain points and agreed to submit the others to arbitration. This result was reached at an all-night conference in the mayor's office, and when daylight broke next morning Chicagoans were delighted to learn that the great strike was over. The arbitrators will deal with the proposed new wage scale, and Mayor Thompson will act as referee on all disputed points. All changes will date back to June 1. Chicago is to be congratulated on the prompt and satisfactory termination of a situation which promised to be a serious one for all classes. It has set a new record and given a fine example of business foresight, tact and moderation, which other cities might profitably keep in view.

God Is Love

FRIENDS of a lady who believes in Christian Science laugh over a story told about her tiny boy who understood something of the methods of "demonstrating." He had hurt his thumb quite badly, and instead of asking for sympathy or medicine came into his mother's room holding up his bruised thumb and saying manfully through his tears: "God is love."

Now the trouble with Christian Science—one of the troubles, that is—is that it is not willing to recognize the value of material helps. Liniment or iodine may help a bruised thumb. But while the opponents of Christian Science insist upon this fact, there is no need for their denying the other fact that it does help a hurt thumb to say: "God is love."

The struggle of the mind to explain the hurts of life has been one of man's chief tasks. Even the child comes early to feel that there are apparently two forces, or two sets of forces, in the world trying to help him, the other trying to hurt him. The child mind of man developed the fantastic pagan theology to account for this: some gods were good, some were bad. By various twists and and wrestlings, the human mind has sought to arrive at the truth about life's sorrows. The Christian has one supreme answer to the problem: answer of the little boy with the hurt thumb: is love." In the midst of all life's pain, the Christian knows that the heart of God is kind.

The sufferings and death of Jesus, aside from their healing power for sin, have this message to the world: "God cares." After hearing his words and beholding his deeds and his death, after reading the words of his chief apostle, describing how the whole body suffers when the smallest member is bruised, we know that every throb of human suffering hurts God. He sends the pain? Who knows? That question may find an answer some day. While he suffers while we suffer; he suffers as we suffer: he cares.

And so, because God cares, the Christian suffers and still be glad. With every thorn that offered the superabounding grace of Christ's companionship and tenderest love. The Christian suffers hopefully, having not only the glad divine love for the present, but the assurance of the coming of that day when God shall wipe away tears from off all faces, when "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away."

America at Its Best

A WHOLE state invited to a wedding! Is something typically American about that. Everybody is everybody's friend. No one wants to hurt anybody's feelings. Every one wants to rejoice in the happiness of every one else. Therefore—instead of sending invitations to a few selected friends, instead of the difficult distinctions between close friends and other friends, between friends and acquaintances, between new neighbors and distant neighbors—come everybody and share our joy!

This was the invitation Speaker and Mrs. Clark sent to the whole state of Missouri when their daughter Genevieve was to be married the other day. It was beautiful; it was sensible; it was American. It typifies not only what must be the true American spirit towards neighbors at home. It is what must be our attitude toward all the world. Come, be friends! Come, share our joys! Come, laugh, and labor, and hope—and pray with!

Young Patriots All

FLAG DAY this year has proved to be a splendid national inspiration. In every large city great gatherings of school children assembled to do honor to the Stars and Stripes. In Greater New York nearly a million boys and girls were massed in the various squares and parks, where, bearing such a multitude of flags, has never been witnessed before on any public occasion. They went through a series of exercises that were both beautiful and impressive. Childhood, representing twenty-five different nations, pledged its united allegiance to "Old Glory."

These young Americans are being trained in the ways of true patriotism. To them the flag is much more than a waving sheet of color; it represents the soul of the nation to which they belong, and radiates the inspiration of every incident in the history of their country's progress which they have learned in the schools. They are beginning to understand why strong men's eyes fill with tears when they look upon the waving flag, and to grasp with their young minds the idea of a great and united people and of the glorious history of its past.

In his address at Washington on June 14 President Wilson appealed to his hearers to wave the American flag next to their hearts not only on Flag Day but on all days. Our children are already to a much greater extent than most of us imagine. In their case there is no question of difference of nationality or descent; the flag is theirs, and they love it with all the ardor of childhood, for it represents to them everything that is great and noble. They know its history better than most of their elders, and their love for the glorious starry banner will grow with the years.

SEVENTY-SIX NEW PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONARIES APPOINTED

SEVENTY-SIX regularly appointed missionaries were added to the force in the field by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of the United States during the year April 1, 1914, to April 1, 1915. With eight deaths and twenty-five resignations, there was a net gain of forty-three. In addition, four short-term workers were sent out. There are now seventy-six under appointment, expecting to sail this fiscal year. The eighteenth annual conference of the Presbyterian Mission Board at which the newly appointed missionaries were present was held in the banquet room at 130 Fifth Avenue, New York, from June 5 to June 12. The addresses were of a very high order and a wonderfully spiritual atmosphere pervaded the conference from first to last. Missionaries are the real heroes and heroines of the world; not those who wear crowns and sit on thrones, nor those that wear gold lace, the badges of rank and glory, and ride horses and lead armies, but the simple men and women who breathe a poisonous climate, a strange language and customs, to carry Christ to those who have never heard of him, to fill the world with light and love. They are the real heroes and rulers of the world, obeying the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Mark 16: 15.)

Real Burglar-Proof Safe

IN a recent report from the American consul at Nuremberg, Germany, mention is made of a burglar-proof safe which is really safe. The steel of which it is made will resist attacks of acetylene flame. In order to burn a hole large enough to get the hand into the opening six hours' time would be required, and the use of 2,400 gallons of acetylene and 2,600 gallons of oxygen. This would require 600 pounds of raw material, rather uncomfortable baggage for a burglar to handle, and most of the whole night of burning to get a hole large enough to get his hand in for action. The steel is so hard that it cannot be bored or tapped, and all the screws, rivets and nuts must be made and cast with the plates. The soul of a good man or woman is a burglar-proof safe into which treasures are placed and are secure for time and for eternity. "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." (Matt. 6: 20.)

Firemen Celebrate Progress

MORE than 2,500 members of the New York City Fire Department paraded on June 12 at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the present paid organization. For the first time the present generation of New Yorkers had a chance to compare up-to-the-minute motor trucks, water towers, engines and general fire apparatus with the modest machines of the hand-pump time of years ago. Fifty years ago New York City was under a million in population. It had a good water supply and an efficient police department. It had telegraphic communication, with ocean telegraph well in sight, but no paid fire department. The delay in organizing the paid fire department was due to the singular efficiency of the volunteer firemen. Those whose memories cover those times will recall the splendid class of men who made up the volunteer fire departments of most of the cities and villages of the country. They were the men who owned their own homes and were masters of their own business, employers of labor, men of standing and influence, as well as the young men growing up. They held to the excellent theory that it is a citizen's duty to give his personal service for the protection of the property and life of his city, and it was an honor to be a fireman. Firemen, like policemen, have to have the heroic spirit for the discharge of daily duty under the greatest risk to life. An important feature of the celebration was the bestowal of medals upon the heroes, who in spirit said: "Neither count I my life dear unto myself." (Acts 20: 24.)

WHAT strides of progress photography has made! It catches images of the earth, sea, air, sky, and countless worlds in space. It is the handmaid of sciences and aid to many arts. It is now busy revealing the secret of the waves of the ocean, their size and shape, to aid in the construction of ships, docks and breakwaters and to enable men to repeat the words of authority used by the Creator in whose image he is made: "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." (Job 38: 11.)

Bryan Head of Winona Assembly

WILLIAM J. BRYAN, formerly secretary of the state, will be president of the Winona Assembly after its reorganization in August, according to the statement of S. C. Dickey, the present manager of the assembly, which is now under the control of a trustee. "Mr. Bryan has virtually accepted the position; all that he asks is a new Winona free from debt," Mr. Dickey is reported to have said. It is said that the liabilities of the Assembly are $900,000 and the assets $100,000. It is understood that plans for a reorganization free from debt will be effected, and that Mr. Bryan will assume the presidency. Chautauqua meetings and Bible conferences are held by the assembly, which is controlled by the Presbyterian Church. Winona, like all such assemblies, proclaims this truth: "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." (Prov. 4: 7.)

Government Wins Oil Lands Suit

TEN sections of California oil lands near the town of McKittrick, Kern County, valued at $15,000,000, were declared to have been fraudulently patented by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in a decision by Judge Robert S. Bean of the United States District Court of Oregon, filed at Los Angeles the other day, and were ordered to be restored to the government. The land is in the Elk Hills district of Kern County, and would supply the United States navy with petroleum for twenty-five years. Another suit involving oil lands in the same area, which are valued by the government experts at $320,000,000, is pending in the United States District Court. Whatever may be the ultimate outcome of the suits, the fact is generally admitted that the fraudulent appropriation of large tracts of the public lands, especially in the West, by individuals and corporations has been enormous and criminal. Some of these frauds have been detected and restitution compelled, others are undetected and the injustice remains. The opportunity for these frauds grew out of the just policy of the government to throw open the public lands to old soldiers and others who would occupy themselves in clearing the forests, plowing the fields and building homes for the making of a mighty empire. The restoration of property taken by misrepresentation is thus mentioned: "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." (Luke 19: 8.)

THE WAR AND AMERICA

THE most important news at present deals with the agitation for preparedness against war. The resignation of Secretary of State Bryan, which he hoped would crystallize the peace sentiment in this country, appears to have accomplished that, and also to have divided the country into two classes of peace advocates; the one clamoring for a greater army and navy to protect us against war, the other assailing that doctrine and demanding pacific measures in Washington.

The National Security League

Those who are for preparedness launched their campaign in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Monday, June 14, at a meeting called by the National Security League, a newly formed organization. The officers of the league are Hon. Joseph H. Choate, honorary president; Hon. Alton B. Parker, honorary vice-president; S. Stanwood Menken, president.

June 14 and 15 the league held a two days' conference in New York, an amazing feature of which was the exhibit in the Hotel Astor of implements of war, supplied chiefly by the government. A Whitehead torpedo, twenty-one feet in length and weighing 1,350 pounds, was transported from the destroyer Balch at the Brooklyn Navy Yard to the hotel, on a truck, its progress across the city creating a streak of war spirit. A 14-inch shell, samples of shrapnel, machine guns, war aeroplanes and practically every most modern device for conducting deadly war, made up the exhibit, which attracted thousands of both men and women. Placards bravely announced that the league would insure peace to America by the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars for this kind of argument.

The exhibits were in charge of regulars and militiamen, who explained the habits of their pets to visitors. Shortly after the hurriedly arranged exhibition opened, Secretary of the Navy Daniels ordered the gun crew of six men who had been detailed from the Brooklyn Navy Yard by Rear-Admiral Joseph Strauss, chief of ordnance, back to their duty, on the ground that the demonstration was contrary to the navy regulations.

Tuesday evening a mass meeting was held in Carnegie Hall, attended, the New York Times stated, by "nearly as many women as men." The National Security League, however, had not succeeded in stirring up great popular interest, for the audience was small. The meeting lasted four hours for those who remained to the end. Among those who spoke were ex-Secretary of War Jacob M. Dickinson; also Dr. Lyman Abbott and ex-Judge Alton B. Parker. A virulent letter from ex-President Roosevelt to Mr. Hudson Maxim, inventor, endorsing the league, was read (and is discussed on the first page of this issue of the Christian Herald). The fate of Belgium was held up as a warning to the United States, and the arguments focused in the declaration: "If the Government of the United States is not to omit 'any act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty,' it stands pledged in President Wilson's note of May 13 to the use of force, if Germany persists in her attacks upon our citizens traveling on the high seas." The league is strongly endorsed by many army and navy officers, and its purpose is to arouse a public demand that Congress authorize the creation of a huge army and navy and system of armaments for this country, and the lever with which the league hopes to move the public is the declaration that the United States is almost sure to be drawn into the European war in defense of her honor and rights.

Business Women Protest

Two days before the Security League's conference, the National Women's Trade Union League held its fifth biennial convention in New York, and enthusiastically passed two resolutions in the interests of peace. This league represents 100,000 women. One resolution calls for the organizing of women workers "to resist with all their power any attempt to embroil the United States in the conflict now devastating Europe or to involve our country in any armed interference in the affairs of Mexico"; urges "the abolition of manufacture of arms and munitions of war for private profit"; calls upon the President and Congress "to place an embargo on the exportation of arms," etc., and pledges working women to refuse to engage in or endorse war.

Women Oppose Preparedness

One of the newest of the peace organizations is the Women's Peace Party, of which Mrs. Amos Pinchot is president. This organization sent delegates to the Security League meeting in Carnegie Hall, to submit questions to that organization; their

"while we favor praying for peace, we favor something also to support that prayer"—in other words, if the Almighty cannot send peace, then let us see if the Bethlehem Steel Corporation can accomplish it.

The plan of this organization is to produce a working union of sovereign nations to establish peace among themselves, and to guarantee it by known and available sanction at their command. The resolutions that were adopted called for a league to enforce peace by the joint use of the economic and military forces of the signatory powers, against any one of their number that goes to war or commits acts of hostility against another, before any action arising shall be submitted to a council of conciliation for hearing, consideration and recommendation. It might be suggested that the principal difference between the League to Enforce Peace and the National Security League is: the latter would create only an American market for war material, the former a world market.

Labor Denounces Militarism

The fifth public event occurred on Saturday night, June 19, when Carnegie Hall, New York, was nearly filled with a determined body of men and women called together by organized labor to proclaim where they stand on the question of the day. Here, too, there were notable speakers, chief among them ex-Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that Mr. Bryan was cheered and cheered again by the immense audience, which stood to welcome him when he made his appearance, inspired by Mr. Bryan's sacrifice of himself in the interests of real peace. The audience left no doubt as to its position on peace by preparedness. Every denunciation of that policy met with a storm of approval. Bryan's pronouncement of a determination that the United States should not be drawn into the European shambles received thunderous approval. The people of the country spoke to the public through this meeting. A resolution was adopted calling upon the government to take over and control the manufacture of all arms and ammunition and her equipments for war purposes. An immediate session of Congress was demanded in order to promote domestic peace. Industrial relations as well as international relations were in the minds of the leaders of this meeting, but the question of peace over war with Europe dominated all else.

Other Demonstrations

On Monday evening, June 21, the Socialist Party of America occupied Cooper Union, and its most notable speaker denounced preparedness as a means for preserving peace, the manufacture of war equipment for private gain and all efforts to create a war spirit in this country.

For June 23 a monster mass meeting at Madison Square Garden has been called, to voice the popular demand that the administration at Washington disregard the attempts to put the United States on the same military basis as Europe, engineered by financial interests, and instead shall observe the principle of arbitration for which this nation stands.

The purpose of that meeting was to express an unmistakable way the determination of the American people that this nation shall not be drawn into the war, but shall rather preserve peace for itself and seek it for Europe.

In addition to these and other public meetings throughout the country to protest against war, Mr. Bryan has issued his promised complete statement on the causes of war in Europe and the way to peace. We shall review this contribution to the subject in the next issue of the Christian Herald. Mr. Bryan has succeeded in interpreting and putting into plain speech the mind of the American people on this subject. There never was a time in our history when calmness, common sense, courage, were more needed on the part of the individual. It is a time for every man to see the fullest and clearest light on the question of the day, and to decide and to speak for himself and refuse to be stampeded by a propaganda for war which has as its base solely and wholly the expectation of huge private gain from the manufacture of the implements of war.

questions, however, were not answered. One of them was, "Is Europe today your example of peace by preparedness?" The Women's Peace Party held a mass meeting in Cooper Union, New York, on the night following the Carnegie Hall meeting. A terrific thunder storm thinned down the attendance, but the audience was enthusiastic. Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Immigration Commissioner Frederic C. Howe, and Congressman Frank Buchanan were among the speakers. The arguments were all directed against preparedness. Congressman Buchanan declared that the surest way for America to keep out of the war was to keep out of the war zone. Commissioner Howe declared in favor of a popular vote before any war is ever declared, with the proviso that those who vote for war on any issue should be the first to be sent to the front, a suggestion that brought an ovation. At this meeting the press was denounced for its misleading headlines, and its abuse of public confidence by the publication of one-sided news and the suppression of information essential to an enlightened public opinion. That a large part of the press is influenced by the financial group which controls the output of munitions of war was freely charged.

Would Enforce Peace

The fourth important event in the series of "peace" demonstrations was the organization of the League to Enforce Peace, American Branch, in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, June 17. Ex-President William Howard Taft was made president of the organization, and among the other officers are men who also endorse the National Security League. The principle back of this movement is that "the only way to meet force is with force." This was so declared by President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University, chairman of the committee on resolutions. Mr. Taft argued that

TRAGEDY AT ATLANTIC CITY. A great pleasure crowd on Sunday, June 20, witnessed in terror the struggles of some 200 persons caught in a mighty undertow of a record high tide. Warned by the increasing strength of the waves, most bathers had left the water when a mammoth wave sent the rest rushing for their lives before it, on to be caught in the powerful return current and carried out toward sea. Professional life-savers and scores of bathers and bystanders risked their lives to help those who were in peril and some of the latter were in turn caught by the undertow, beaten by the terrific waves and three of them perished. Five persons in all were drowned, the bodies of all but one being recovered, and quite a number of others were more or less injured. Some of those rescued were made delirious by their experience. In some cases rescues were made by a human chain of men who linked hands and formed a line far out into the surf. While most of the imperiled bathers succeeded in saving themselves, many owe their lives to the heroism of the rescuers, who had to risk their own lives to be of service to the others. The tragedy occurred in the morning and created such excitement among the thousands who had friends in bathing that the police reserves had to be called on to keep the crowds back from the water.

THE MEXICAN TEETER-TOTTER.

The American warning to Mexico is having the effect of a boy astride the center of a see-saw, Carranza sitting at one end and Villa at the other. On July 18 Carranza was high in the administration's good will, according to reports, and a man of his party was looked for recognition at Washington as provisional president, the rumor being busy with several names for the post. But within twenty-four hours Carranza struck the ground with a thump in disfavor with his generals and ministers, and Villa rose into view with a plan for the pacification of his country, as called for by President Wilson; his plan has been despatched by messengers to Washington. In passing might be mentioned that General Obregon, already famous for other exploits, has recently been slain and brought to life again in full uniform, by the press despatches. Meanwhile the United States War Department has been making estimates, and announces that the event of intervention, the first year's cost for the maintenance of an army of 500,000 men will be $80,000,000. We ought to be able to buy Mexico outright for less than that—save life in the bargain.

TRULY LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL FOOD INSPECTION.

By a skillful hunting back to 1902, the government is able to discover that it has been defrauded of about $27,000,000 by the oleomargarine industry through dishonest passing off on the public of 200,000,000 pounds of colored oleomargarine as either butter or its uncolored substitute, in either case the industry saving a tax of about ten cents a pound. The Treasury Department, probably on the principle that misery likes company, opines that most of this product has reached the consumer as butter. The Department of Justice is working on the cases, and has convicted forty-two violators since January, sentencing twenty-nine to prison terms and collecting fine amounting to about $148,000, besides recovering a little over a million dollars of the taxes that were dodged. This decision of the public and robbery of the government is particularly contemptible, inasmuch as the statute which has been violated was created in order to give oleomargarine a cooking basis with butter, as well as to protect the public from a fraudulent substitution. It is said there are 6,000 individual cases of fraud. The industry seems to have been expert in devising means to deceive the people and the government yet it is not apparent to the lay mind how such a steal could go undetected until reaching such a gigantic figure. It will some time before the taste of this thing is out of the public mouth.

THE "PREPAREDNESS" CAT OUT OF THE BAG? We are informed by the New York Times that Rear-Admiral Charles Sigsbee, retired, states that "an adequate fleet is one that can meet successfully whatever is likely to be brought against it in the event of war. We cannot restrict the growth of a possible enemy. We can only match it from year to year." Ex-Secretary Bryan, in his Carnegie Hall speech, put it this way, in effect: Imagine three farmers whose lands join each other and surround a lake. Comes a stranger and points out to number one farmer his weakness in case the other two fall out with him, and persuades number one to buy a cannon to defend his lake front. Then the stranger goes to farmer number two, tells him about that gun, and shows him he needs two guns for his protection. Then to farmer number three, and easily persuades him that since his neighbors are armed and have three guns between them he needs three in case of "eventualities." Then back again to number one to point out the futility of one little cannon against his two hostile neighbors' five cannons, etc.

AERIAL HERO FALLS TO HIS DEATH. On June 17 at Paris, while flying his aeroplane with the American writer, Henry Beech Needham, aboard, Lieutenant Reginald A. J. Warneford lost control 500 feet in air through an explosion, and with Needham crashed to earth, both being killed. Warneford but shortly before had won the Victoria Cross and the Cross of the Legion of Honor for bravery in flying above a Zeppelin which he wrecked with bombs, its crew of twenty-eight men perishing; the first recorded destruction of a Zeppelin by an aeroplane.

YAKUIS AGAIN REQUIRE DISCIPLINE. Three thousand Yaqui Indians, in the Mexican state of Sonora, are reported under arms and raiding the territory, American settlers being in danger of their lives. Accordingly Admiral Thomas B. Howard sailed on his flagship Colorado June 17, carrying three companies of United States marines, for the west coast of Mexico, under orders to land an expeditionary force if necessary, and the cruisers Chattanooga and Raleigh followed post haste. This fleet headed for Tobari Bay near Guaymas, the seaport of Sonora. Ninety miles inland is an American colony. Admiral Howard has about 2,000 men available for land action.

"WAR BABIES" STORIES ON PAR WITH ATROCITY TALES. The extraordinary stories that have appeared from time to time in the press to the effect that England has some 20,000 to 30,000 unacknowledged babies born in the vicinity of the great camps, which the nation would have to account for somehow, are declared unfounded by an official committee of investigation presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The problem is real but infinitely less in extent, and private societies will handle it for the country.

EVERY FACTORY A CAMP. Through the appropriate channel of the National Security League, the United States Rubber Company, of which Colonel Samuel P. Colt is president, announces that the executive committee unanimously approves a proposition looking to the enlistment of all the employees of the company's forty-six plants in the National Guard or the Naval Militia, and the forty-six managers have been notified to encourage such enlistment in every way, the pay of employees to be continued during the annual tour of duty and their vacations not to be affected. Where the "proposition" originated, and how much "encouragement" the employees must have, are not stated. But the president of the league says this is one of the most important moves towards aiding in a practical way the national defense that has yet been initiated in this country.

KANSAS IN SMILES. Three thousand tons of Kansas alfalfa at nearly $25 a ton has been contracted for by the army quartermaster for use in the Panama Canal Zone, and Kansas farmers point to the deal as the testimony they want that Kansas alfalfa leads off as a prime general utility hay for the whole world. From an initial seedling, these automobile-owning agriculturists cut from four to six tons of alfalfa per acre on unharrowed, unfertilized land, and keep doing it for a matter of twenty years, and then start again, so they tell us; and we don't know why it shouldn't be the truth.

AFTER-CLOSING-HOUR WAR NEWS. On June 22 the fall of Lemberg appeared imminent, the German armies being within nine miles and the Russians falling back and giving signs of intentions to evacuate the city. . . . The French continue making gains along the Western line of battle, with here and there a setback. . . . The Italian advance is meeting with a more determined and better organized resistance. Pola has become an important objective of the Italian attack. . . . In London the House of Commons by unanimous vote gave a first reading to a bill presented by the new Chancellor of the Exchequer McKenna, calling for a maximum war appropriation of $5,000,000,000, the public to be asked to lend the money at 4½ per cent., redeemable at the government's option between 1925 and 1945. . . . Plans are practically complete for making a $50,000,000 loan to the French Government to cover war purchases in this country, the security being American stocks and bonds which Paris bankers will deposit here.

ARBITERS OF WHAT WE BUY IN CONVENTION.

The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World convened in Chicago June 21, ten thousand strong, to discuss the ethics and the mechanics of advertising, a business which has become a profession. It was prophesied by one enthusiast that within the next five years advertising will be a course in every well-regulated school, business college, and university. Among the speakers was Bishop Warren Candler of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, who spoke on "Commerce and Christianity." The advertising fraternity is really a university for instruction of the public in the art of getting the best for one's money.

NEW SECRETARY OF STATE. It appears to be about settled that President Wilson will appoint Robert Lansing as Mr. Bryan's successor in office.

LIFE AND DEATH IN THE PRISON WORLD.

On June 17 the Court of Appeals denied the application of former Police Lieutenant Becker for a reargument of his case, leaving him hope only of executive clemency; it is rumored that Governor Whitman may reprieve Becker pending a vote on the proposed constitutional amendment abolishing capital punishment; Becker is sentenced to die in the week of July 12. . . . On June 20 Mrs. Edmund Allen, wife of the warden of the Illinois Penitentiary at Joliet, was murdered and her apartment set afire to destroy her body, presumably by one or two negro trustees, one of whom was the personal servant of the warden. Warden Allen is widely known for his introduction of the honor system at Joliet. . . . On June 21 Governor Slaton of Georgia commuted the death sentence of Leo M. Frank to life imprisonment. Frank was first secretly removed to the state farm. The governor's action incited mob demonstrations of hostility, and when thousands marched upon his country home, where he was taking refuge surrounded by members of the National Guard, he proclaimed martial law within a half-mile zone and the troops threatened the crowd with fixed bayonets. The governor was hanged in effigy. He asserts that he acted in accordance with his conscience, and believes the law is satisfied by the life incarceration of the convicted man. . . . June 21 Henry Siegel, who failed to placate the depositors of his wrecked department store bank, was placed in the Monroe County Penitentiary at Rochester, N. Y., to serve a ten months' sentence.

FOR DEFENSE ONLY. The Arizona, chief of our super-dreadnoughts, whose keel was laid March 6, 1914, was launched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, June 20, in the presence of 75,000 people. A bishop of the Episcopal Church offered prayer, Miss Esther Ross of Prescott, Ariz., broke against the hull simultaneously a bottle of water and a bottle of wine and shouted: "I name thee Arizona," the bands played the national anthem, and the crowds shouted themselves hoarse. A notable company, including the Secretary of the Navy and also Dwight B. Heard, an Arizona editor who is credited with the movement to christen the ship with a bottle of water, witnessed the event. The great vessel is 608 feet long with 31,400 tons displacement, and should make over 22 knots. She will carry twelve 14-inch guns in four turrets, besides smaller guns, and 1,000 officers and men. Her cost is estimated at $16,000,000.

The president of the company said: "I will not be the means of helping to prolong this war."

that the French are about to launch a formidable offensive in this region, in which case this section of the line will figure more prominently for the next two or three weeks.

Von Mackensen's movement in northern and central Galicia assumed this week considerably larger proportions than at first. This Austro-German army is now operating over a long front, beginning at Cieplce, north of Sieniawa, and almost directly south of the Russian town of Tarnograd, whence the line of the front runs to the east to Lubaczow, on the Lubaczowka River, a tributary of the San, and thence still eastwardly to a point near Niemizow, where it turns and runs south to a point on the Przemyśl-Lemberg Railroad, a little to the west of Sadowawisznia, which present position represents a very considerable general advance, both to the north and to the east, from the general position when last disclosed to us, and was reached only after a general assault on the Russian positions all along the line, the Russians giving ground nearly everywhere.

In the course of this fighting, which was begun on June 12 and terminated momentarily on June 15, many thousand additional prisoners were taken, besides a very considerable quantity of artillery, a loss more serious to the Russians than that of the men.

From Sadowawisznia the line turns to the southeast and runs through Rudnick, which was captured towards the close of the week, and thence still southeasterly to the Dniester, and then runs easterly along that river, now on the southern bank, now on the northern, to the frontier of the Russian province of Bessarabia and into that province to a point a little to the west of the town of Chotin, where it again turns south and runs to the Rumanian frontier.

The line of General von Mackensen's army will probably move in the general direction east and northeast from now on, while the right wing of the combined Austro-German armies, running from Maryampol to Chotin, will attempt to progress north and northwest.

In southern Poland all was quiet, but at the beginning of the week the Germans on the Warsaw front a wedge through the Russian line covering that city at a point a little northeast of Bolimow, and attained a position which is nearer to Warsaw than any they had so far gained. Possession of since last November. Russian counter attacks on this position were repulsed, though the German attack was not seriously pursued, as it had for its object more the keeping of the Russians busy on this front so as to prevent their sending reinforcements to Galicia, than a serious movement on Warsaw. In the north there has been serious fighting all the week to the east of the military road running from Augustowo to Kovno, and there has also been hard fighting along the Dubysa River. Still farther north, in the vicinity of Shavl, the Germans have continued their advance to the eastward, the Russians retreating before them.

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 11. I KINGS 1: 1—2: 12

Marble—then Mud?

By Amos R. Wells

DAVID, the bright shepherd boy, an old man? It seems incredible; yet he was so old that he had to be told that another had usurped his throne. D. L. Moody once read a newspaper that spoke of him as "old." "I never got such a shock from a paper before," said the evangelist. "I cannot conceive of getting old. I have a life that is never going to end." The "dead line" is advancing. When Jonathan Edwards, at the age of forty-six, was dismissed from the Northampton church, he wrote of his prospects in despair, since he was "so advanced in years." We do not now consider sixty very far "advanced in years."

Joseph Zeitlin died in Brooklyn December 2, 1910, at the great age of one hundred and six—probably the oldest man in the country. He attributed his longevity to the fact that he never worried, did everything regularly and never in excess, and played with children at least one hour every day. Trust, simplicity and purity—that is a fine prescription for a hale old age. Unfortunately, David had not followed these rules in perfection.

Adonijah, the usurper! Strange that neither he nor his mother learned the tragic lesson of his brother Absalom. He had always had his way, and that is a terrible thing for any boy or girl. David had never said to him, "Why hast thou done so?" Therefore his failure was quite certain.

The Christian general, O. O. Howard, was promoted during the Civil War to the head of a corps; but when it came to the grand review in Washington the friends of the humiliated general made a determined effort to have him ride at the head of his old corps. General Sherman sent for Howard and appealed to him, as a Christian, to yield the place, which Howard gracefully did. "Now," said Sherman, "you are to ride by my side at the head of the whole army." Howard protested, but Sherman insisted, and that was the reward the noble veteran received. If Adonijah had been satisfied to take the second place, or the third, he would have received the first place somewhere, if not at the head of the kingdom.

Bathsheba ran considerable risk when she pushed her boy to the throne. If she failed, Adonijah would certainly kill her, and she had only the memory and will of a feeble old man to rely on. But mother love will risk anything for the boy.

It seems strange at first that

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and with a love mind." I Chron. 28: 9.

It is a serious question for all parents to ask themselves whether they have commended God to their children in such a manner as to make them desire to know and serve him. A young son of a friend of mine said to her the other day: "You see, mother, there are many fellows here that I care for, but when a fellow has got his father for a chum, doesn't want any one else." Then, after a pause: "Isn't father splendid, mother? Do you think that I shall ever be as good as he is?" Now, in a case of that sort, is it at all likely which way that boy will go? There is, first, the close tie that binds father and son in a comradeship which makes alienation and disobedience impossible; and there is, next, the admiration which gives the young soul a perfect ideal, in which the thought of God bulks largely, as a strong formative influence. The steps by which we may come ultimately to appropriate David's exhortation are, therefore, apparent. First, engage the love of the young soul, by sharing its life, and opening to it a share in your life. Then, let it be so and felt that whatever is best in you is due to that God who is the home and source of all that is dearest, gladdest, loveliest in human life. Young hearts will then turn to him in flowers to the sun.

Benaiah should express before David the prayer that Solomon might become greater than David had been, and his kingdom mightier than David's; but David himself would have been the first to say, "Amen." Every wise man wants his son to excel him. Every wise ruler wishes his successor's administration to surpass his own.

In Dr. Alexander MacLaren's sermon on I Cor. 3: 12, 13, he tells how the Jews built "wood, hay, stubble," upon "gold, silver, precious stones." "You will see," he said, "in the walls of Jerusalem, at the base, five or six courses of those massive blocks which are the wonder of the world yet, jointed, well laid, well cemented; and then on the top of them a mass of poor stuff, heaped together anyhow. You may go to some modern village, on an ancient historic site, and you will find, built into the mud walls of the hovels, a marble slab with fair carving on it, and on the top of that timber and clay mixed together." It is a sad symbol of what happens in many a life, in many a nation's history. The Jewish kingdom got a noble start in the reigns of David and Solomon, but later reigns added rubbish and wrong to the early foundations, the kingdom became divided, and at length fell away in ruin.

what seems now clearly to have been the unnecessary shedding of blood. We are grieved to hear David, his last hours, directing the slaying of Joab, his old general, and Shimei who cursed him. We see how the old pagan superstitions, with which they were surrounded, fought in the minds of these men with their truer and nobler ideas of God. David may have felt the old traditional compulsion to avenge the deaths of Abner and Amasa and Absalom, as well as punishing Joab's late rebellion and may have felt that since Shimei's curses had been fulfilled he should after all be punished. Solomon, then, has Joab slain, then after offering Adonijah immunity, becomes again suspicious and has him killed, and, after offering to Shimei terms of safety, which are violated, directs his execution also.

The statement is freely made in the Old Testament that God was disappointed, from time to time, in the way his creatures and servants behaved. He had good reason for being disappointed then, as he has good reason for being disappointed now, that even his chosen leader and instruments fail so sadly of understanding his real purposes, and of carrying out his real desires.

But Solomon, as we shall see in our study next week, felt his great lack of wisdom, his failure to comprehend God, and pleaded for more understanding. It was doubtless because he saw that he was willing to be taught and led that he gave him the opportunity of being king. Absalom and Adonijah both failed of their ambitions. Each wanted to be king, neither of them was God's choice. Absalom seemed for a while to be the

Solomon Anointed King

By Arthur H. Howland

AGAIN we find in the chapters between our lessons records which surprise and disappoint us. Solomon was God's choice for king of Israel, but David in leaving the throne, and Solomon in assuming it, directed pele's choice, but nothing indicates that Adonijah was popular. He "exalted himself," saying, "I will be king." The words of the Saviour tell the story of his life: "Every one that exalts himself shall be abased."

Adonijah complimented Nathan and Balaiah and Zadok by not inviting them to his spurious coronation. Communities and organizations are separated in this subtle way into groups of people who can be counted upon to take part in some shady enterprise and groups of people who can be counted on to oppose it. It is a great thing to belong to that group of the non-compromisers, the people who can be counted upon in every issue to do right, and whom nobody would think of trying to interest in anything wrong.

Solomon had had good training. His mother believed in Israel's God, the true God. We must not blame her too severely for her sin, because, under the idea of the divine right of kings, she probably believed that in obeying him she was obeying God. So, in spite of this terrible blunder, she was a good mother and reared Solomon well. He came also under the influence of the wise and godly Nathan. Adonijah's mother was, on the other hand, a pagan woman, who never had accepted Israel's God. We are also told that David neglected discipline in Adonijah's case, as he evidently did with some of his other sons, for "his father had not disciplined him at any time in saying 'Why hast thou done so?'"

At Solomon had doubtless the careful training of both father and mother, and the whole narrative, as we see in his own later writings, implies that he was a dutiful son. From his last choice and from the familiarity shown in his subsequent writings with science, philosophy and history, we may reasonably conclude that he had been studious in his boyhood and early manhood. He had evidently resisted the temptations of a life at court and came to the throne with what was for those early times a remarkably pure, devout and modest character, the fittest man to rule God's chosen people.

BATHSHEBA, a woman of beauty and energy, may have been a granddaughter of Ahithophel, the counselor of David in his early years. She retained her influence over David until his death and was plainly instrumental in having her son Solomon crowned as king after David. Solomon's path to the throne, like many another Oriental potentate's, was marked by intrigue, rivalries and even murder.

Oaths in the Orient take one of two forms—that of simple swearing, by invoking the presence and witness of God, or a more solemn form, mentioning some specially sacred object involving a curse on the maker of the oath. Moslems swear by the "beard of the prophet" and Christians by the "sacred sacrament," or some greatly revered local saint. Both use the form "by the life of God," which is the modern variation of David's "As the Lord liveth."

It is said on good authority that when the present king of Italy came to his throne he gave a solemn promise or an oath to the old Emperor of Austria that he would never fight against him, and this solemn oath figured largely in so long holding Italy to neutrality, the queen mother being especially concerned in this matter of the oath.

Bathsheba "bowed with her face to the earth"—one of the most graceful forms of salutations in the Orient still practiced in many circumstances where deep homage and deep reverence find expression. At the salaamlik in Constantinople the body is bent forward and the eyes kept on the ground until the signal for the "Long live the Sultan" releases the shouts from the bending bodies as they rise erect.

Abulom, the would-be king, rode a royal mule to his death. Adonijah, following Abulom's example, made his attempt to be king, and David, in his overfond blindness, was shutting his eyes a second time to this folly. Better advised this third time, Solomon was to ride David's "own mule" as a sign of his father's favor and the next step to the throne.

"Make his throne greater." You can always compliment a man in Syria and never hurt his feelings by wishing his son a longer life, a greater name, greater wealth, greater power and blessing than himself. Solomon's name in Oriental history, story, song and tradition is greater than that of David to this day.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS FOR JULY 11

Making Life Worth Living

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Time 12: 13-28 (Consecration Meeting).

CHRISTIAN reformers often accuse the church of urging people to consider the glories of the other world for the sake of diverting their attention away from the unrest and oppressive conditions under which they live in this world. They say that the preaching of resignation, humility, self-sacrifice is for the purpose of making the oppressed willing victims of their oppressors.

When we come to Jesus himself, we see how skilfully he balanced his teachings. He did command humility and resignation, but he also denounced invidious language those who would oppress the poor and the weak. In today's Scripture lesson he first refuses to act as a judge or divider. This does not mean that he is not interested in justice and fairness; not anxious that every one shall have his rights. But he is not going to enter into an individual family disagreement and try to settle it. Then he took occasion to rekindle the spirit of gain-seeking. It is this spirit that produces oppression and injustice and woes of many sorts. Some utter against this almost universal motive of gain-seeking his wonderful parable of the Rich Man, who chose the life that was not worth while at received at life's end the shameful verdict "Thou fool!"

He only life worth while is the life of service, the life of love, the life lived in touch with God and in touch with man, the life that loves God ardently and serves man joyously and strenuously. Young people of the church today have an opportunity never before equaled. We must purge the church of the charge of neglecting the oppressed; we must warn against the folly of the selfish life; we must lead men to the Carpenter of Nazareth who came to reveal to us and to live with us the Life Worth While.

Epworth League. Isa. 35: 6-10; 55: 1; 12: 1-3; John 4: 10-14

STUDY these Scripture passages together in the prayer meeting, line by line. Some young people claim to think that religion is not a matter for youth but for old age. But consider such words and thoughts as these, from these lovely Scriptures: "Be glad," "Rejoice," "Blossom as the rose," "Blossom abundantly," "Rejoice with joy and singing," "Be strong," "Fear not," "Waters and streams," "A pool and springs," "Songs, joy, gladness." That is Isa. 35—all centering around the beautiful word "Holiness," verse 8.

"Ho!" "Come, buy, eat!" "Without money and without price." "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." (Isa. 55 and Isa. 12.) Then that scene by the Samaritan well. "Never thirst," "a well of water," "everlasting life."

A MOST interesting report from the committee in London is printed below. England, especially around London, will continue to be for a long time the refuge of the thousands upon thousands of Belgians who fled into this land of another speech to escape the terrors of war. This is a huge problem in charity to be thrust upon a nation whose own homes are being robbed of their supporters by the war. Our English committee administers the fund sent to it indiscriminately among all waifs and widowed mothers who have been left destitute. The seven children referred to in the report, we understand to be English children; and because of the provision which has been made to look after Belgian refugees, we are quite sure that the bulk of the Christian Herald relief goes to English women and children.

The fund is still rising, and on June 15 amounted to $160,658.87. The American public is being newly appealed to on every hand for aid to relieve increasing distress in all sections of Europe as well as in Palestine. We again remind our readers that the Christian Herald fund is the only one of which we know that is intended chiefly for the widows and orphans. The various committees—there now are nine fully formed committees composed of able, eminent men at work—exercise wise discretion, of course, and do not confine their efforts to the relief of widows and orphans when, by so doing, they might have to refuse aid to others in the very extremity of need. But the proportion of the fund thus humanely employed is small. We know our readers will approve every individual case of helpfulness; and inasmuch as we have undertaken to search out and provide for the widows and the orphans first of all, we urge you again and again to give the work your fullest co-operation.

Please address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Report from English Committee

LONDON, June 2.

THE interesting photograph which accompanies this report is of the seven children received into the National Children's Homes through the agency of the fund, as described in your issue of March 31.

Since then the committee have placed seven other children in the same excellent institution, upon the payment, as before, of fifty dollars each child. It is felt that no wiser way of expending the money or of benefiting the little ones could be found than thus securing them a comfortable, healthy home, with sound Christian education, and a technical training for some useful and honorable calling in life. The demand for boys and girls from Homes of this kind on the part of employers of labor is very great, and on entering the army of the world's workers the lads and girls have the pick of situations and every opportunity of rising on the industrial ladder. This second batch of seven cases was carefully selected by Sir Robert Perks, the chairman of our committee, from twenty-two cases in waiting for admission to the Homes.

The widows and orphans of North Sea fishermen lost through mine disasters constitute a class of cases of touching interest. Many of these brave fellows have been engaged in the sweeping operations, incurring great risks and removed subjects of terrible dangers. After success in this noble work, they have sudden death from these hidden engines of destruction. For the most part they are young and vigorous men off in the fulness of health and strength, and leaving wives and children of tender years to the pity and compassion of the world.

One case is of a widow twenty-nine years of age with six children, aged seven, five, four, two and one, and the last five months. Another, forty years of age, is left with five children, eleven, ten, nine, five and one years. As the legal leaving age is fourteen, the eldest will not for some time contribute to the family income.

The cases of which these are samples are strongly recommended by the Shipwrecked Fishermen's Society, an excellent organization, and the secretary and local agents kindly assist in the administration of your relief, which gives an added guarantee of the worthy character of the recipients.

Not all cases belong to the humbler classes. Indeed, it is often those of professional and business, or their dependents, who are most hurt. Ordinary charitable funds do not extend to them, and the unexpectedness of the present circumstances has left them unprotected with agencies adequate to undertake their protection.

To the credit of many widows be said that they bravely supplement their small pensions or other means of income by such work as they are able to do, but the cases are numerous where no work is possible, only that of a light character, owing to physical weakness. One widow who is being helped by the fund has five children, ranging from eleven to two and a half years, and being subject to fits, cannot earn her own living. An old couple, 79 and 75 respectively, lost their main support in the death of their eldest son, a chief gunner on an armed merchantman, which foundered in a gale or struck a mine. They have small pensions, but have to maintain a paralyzed son who was in the navy.

The work continues, and it is a source of profound satisfaction to the English committee that they have been enabled to reach so many of just the class of cases specified in their instructions.

SEVEN WARDS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FUND

"To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

PIONEERING TODAY FOR CHRIST

ONE cold day in January I dropped off the train in Camas, Idaho, and called at the largest house and asked if I could preach there and organize a Sunday school; and they said "Sure, and welcome." When I learned that they had nine children, all at home, I was not surprised that they should give a hearty welcome to a Sunday school, even in a private house of only two rooms.

The next day, which was the Sabbath, we had a good meeting. The men had to bring in their chairs and wagon seats, and some of them stood up around the wall. We put in a Presbyterian for superintendent, a member of the Christian Church for assistant, the oldest son in the family of nine children for secretary and a Methodist and Baptist for teachers. Then I said, "Where shall we meet?" and there was a great silence, for there was no other room in the neighborhood that would hold a dozen people.

To encourage them to build, I offered to donate, as my part, the windows, doors, hardware and paper for the building. The man in whose house we met said he would give two acres of land. Three carpenters, who had homesteaded in the neighborhood, promised to give their work on the building. Eight men said they would go with their teams to the mountains twenty miles away and haul down the logs. Two others promised to go to town, fifteen miles away, and bring out the lumber. We then appointed a committee of three men as trustees to arrange matters, to boss the job and to have charge of the building when completed; and everybody went to work.

On the sixth day we had an old-fashioned "houseraising bee," as was customary in Abraham Lincoln's time in Kentucky, a hundred years ago. More than twenty men were present we could have church, Sunday school, day school and social gatherings—costing in all not more than $150, besides labor, land and logs, which were contributed by the people.

There is no place where such a building is more needed or more highly bachelors or single women, living alone, often homesick and earth-hungry for society and friends. The church is always a safe place, such lonely people can have a warm welcome and a happy time with friends.

Our greatest need is active Christians. We look to the churches in the East to send them to us. Teachers get high salaries in Idaho. Perhaps four-fifths of them are from the East. These are often our only hope for a Sunday school. Hundreds of Mormon missionaries, sent all over the Eastern states and to Europe, are offering Uncle Sam's free homesteads as their strongest argument to persuade people to become Mormons. If they will adopt their faith and come to Utah or Idaho they will be given 160 acres of good land free and their expenses paid by the church. This offer of government homesteads has done more to give five mountain states into the political control of the Mormons than all other influence combined. It has filled up these states with Mormon converts.

In the neighborhood where the church mentioned above was built the people are altogether Gentiles, intelligent, up-to-date, wide awake and from one valley in Oregon. The neighborhood above mentioned has a dozen such churches could be organized, and four of them would be a fine field for a pastor some day. The land should be taken by Christians instead of by Mormons.

QUAINT CHRISTIAN FISHERS OF NEWFOUNDLAND

"WE'VE only got one life to live on this yarth," Jack Roosa said—and his big brown eyes sought his interrogator squarely. "We might as well live it right!"

Friend, a fellow passenger on the mail-boat, which plies the ice-filled Northern seas, from St. Johns to Nain, on the coast of Labrador, a thousand miles north of the capital of Newfoundland (to which colony, Newfoundland, it serves as appanage), had asked a question. In the winter these trappers of Labrador place their traps at intervals along huge circuits, visiting each in turn, and carry the catch to their little cabins—or tents. There, winter nights, the trapper cleans, or flenses, the skins, prepares them for the spring trading and stacks them until the trapping period is over.

Sometimes a single fur, say that of a silver fox, will represent as much as a trapper will need for years to come, and Friend had asked if it did not happen that trappers, crossing the wild, and coming on some other trapper's tent, would steal his furs, trusting the falling snow to hide all tracks.

Jack Roosa, however, viewed the questioner askance. No such notion had ever entered his head. Steal? He had heard, of course, of people doing that down to the south—but no, no one stole up here!

Promptly on arrival at St. Johns the traveler feels this natural honor and hospitality and honesty. In the big hotel at the capital there are no keys. You go to bed in a strange place, with your room unlocked, and every one else does the same!

AT THE little village church you find that the bell, instead of being mounted in the steeple or belfry, is set up in a little pent-house, often only a cover, out in the churchyard close by. Far more convenient, that, to the bell-man, just to step across the sward to the bell in pleasant weather.

Every Sunday the year round the good fishers gather at their little churches here. Service is much the same as it would be in a church of like sect in other Anglo-Saxon lands; but, along with the church life, there go some interesting customs.

For example, every so often the fishermen fish for the church. That is to say, they rise at their usual early hours, take a snack of the breakfast, then go down to the sea and sink the heavy cod-traps. In due course a school of cod, traveling along through the sea, strike the heavy line running out from the trap and follow it squarely into the pound. There they stay, too foolish to find their way out; and so, in due course, the fishermen come, raise the trap and take the catch to shore.

Windlashed by bucket from punt to fish-stage, the cod are carried into the "curing-barns," as they are called, where the women await them; the men, the while, going out after more, ever more. The first woman of a group will take a cod from the barrel of wet, slimy fish, lay it on its side and cut the head off squarely. With a dapper fling she tosses it to her neighbor, who cuts the cod open, removes the liver—later to be reduced to cod-liver oil—and then throws the fish to her comrade. The third woman scrapes the lining clean, even to the backbone, then throws the fish into a tub to rinse.

Finally the fish are stacked on huge boards and carried out to sun-dry on a stage over which boughs of evergreen have been scattered, that the breeze may get in and keep the fish from "burning." Finally the fish are stacked on huge boards and carried out to sun-dry on a stage over which boughs of evergreen have been scattered, that the breeze may get in and keep the fish from "burning."

Again, shortly before Christmas, men, women and children repair to the forest that covers the interior of Newfoundland, to cut firewood for the church. That is to say, they cut the pole-like trees, trim off the branches, stack their huge sleighs full and draw them to the settlement. There all this wood is piled high upon one sleigh; boys and girls, old and young, take hold of the ropes, and with merry songs bring it, full-tilt, to the parsonage, to present it to their spiritual leader.

The fisher-folk are a pious class; what's more, they live their religion throughout. Every summer ten thousand of them, more or less, desert the towns of Newfoundland for Labrador, where the cod fishing is better still. There they live in temporary structures on the coast—little "curing-barns," again—with the native fishers' dwellings behind. And here, at their work, these folk sing the church hymns, and stand contented with their lot, practicing throughout their daily lives the Ten Commandments, as one seldom finds them observed among an Anglo-Saxon people.

Much of this is due to the good work of the rectors back in the little home towns. Much is due also to the splendid work of the itinerant missionaries of the various Christian denominations who visit Labrador through the summer. These young fellows, freshly graduated divinity students for the most part, will come to a settlement and hold divine service on the rocks.

It is a far, far cry from even the nearest of the great centers, with their varied advantages for carrying on Christian endeavor, to the lonely Labrador peninsula, or even to Newfoundland. And yet it is a question if any community of like population the world over can show as small a percentage of evil-doers or as large a percentage of actual Christians who are living out the tenets of their faith to the last detail as on this great and lone peninsula of the Labrador; or as can be found in Newfoundland, tenth in point of size of the islands of the earth. "With only one life to live on this yarth, zur," they believe they might as well live it right.

FOR THE CHURCH

"—and he said 'Rest alone isn't enough for you'."

WHEN overwork, worry or illness have sapped your strength, rest and quiet will help you—but you still feel you need something to rouse the appetite—and above all, something to strengthen the enfeebled nerves.

And it is then that many physicians will advise rest—and Sanatogen. For they know that Sanatogen, combining the nutritive qualities of a food with the invigorating properties of a tonic, will reconstruct the wasted tissues, RE-build and RE-vitalize and help the enfeebled system gather up new energy and a new fund of health.

The Right Rev. William Theodorus Capers, Dean, Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., says:

"I feel constrained to write you and say that Sanatogen has done everything for my wife. I have found this preparation restores a normal appetite and gives vitality to the nervous system."

The Right Rev. The Bishop of Southampton, writes:

"It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative. It is undoubtedly beneficial."

Such has been the grateful experience of scores upon scores of others whose very names must be convincing. And remembering that over 21,000 physicians have testified in signed letters to the medical profession's belief in Sanatogen, you surely can have no hesitancy in turning to Sanatogen for the help that your system needs.

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists everywhere, in three sizes from $1.00 up.

Suggestion For July Investors

IN placing July funds consider this fact: that good real estate feels least of all the blighting effect of wars and panics, and securities based upon it reflect the soundness and stability which it affords.

Your interest return will be above the average and the security of your principal assured if your funds are invested in A-R-E Six's, the 6% Bonds of the American Real Estate Company.

These Bonds are war-proof, time-tried and panic-tested. They are based on the ownership of selected New York real estate, which has withstood every test and remains today one of the safest and most fertile of the world's investment fields.

A-R-E Six's are Debenture Bonds, the direct contract obligations of the American Real Estate Company, and are issued in two forms:

In denominations of $100, $500, $1000 and upward, interest payable semi-annually, and principal in ten years.

Look up good investments at once, by writing to banking houses for their lists.

G. J., MISSISSIPPI. Doyle Consolidating Mining Company stock is quoted by curb brokers at 2 cents per share. If we owned the stock and could get two cents per share for it we should lose no time in selling it. Perhaps E. R. Marden would bid more for the stock. At the time he was selling it to investors he professed to think it was an excellent investment. There were others who disagreed with him, including the Christian Herald.

MISS F. S., NEW JERSEY. The Philadelphia Electric Company's stock is listed on the Philadelphia Stock Exchange. The stock has a par value of $25, and was issued at the rate of $22.50 per share. Dividends at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum are now paid on the stock on a basis of $22.50 per share. Five per cent. was paid annually from 1903 to 1907, when the dividend rate was increased to 6 per cent., which was maintained until 1912, when the stock was placed on a 7 per cent. basis. There is probably no traction stock in the country entitled to a better rating than the shares of this company.

MISS C., MARYLAND. We see no adequate reason why you should wait until the war's close to invest. If you wait until then your loss in interest will amount to considerable and you will, in all probability, be required to pay more for good securities than now. Even though this country were to be plunged into a participation in the war it is not believed that American bonds would sell appreciably lower and surely their intrinsic values would not be impaired to the slightest degree. Good bonds are a purchase at this moment. We look for higher quoted values from now on to the close of the war.

E. M. C., NEW HAMPSHIRE. In increasing numbers conservative investors are turning to farm mortgages to give the required degree of stability to all diversified lists of investments. The largest investors in the country are the life insurance companies, and they are extensive buyers of Western mortgages. One big life insurance company, the Union Central Life of Cincinnati, goes so far as to exclude all other kinds of investment to protect its policyholders. The Financial World says: "This company (the Union Central) buys no bonds, but confines investment of its funds received from policyholders, except such as are made upon the insurance of its own policyholders, to farm mortgages. In the forty-eight years of the company's existence it has made 86,523 mortgage loans calling for an investment of $163,479,727. The company's experience with these loans has been that it has lost less than one-fifth of one per cent., taking into account the expense of foreclosures to which it had been put and the cost of disposing of the property." One-third of your proposed investment of $6,000 should be placed in good mortgages.

MRS. U. J. M., NEW HAMPSHIRE. (1) Swift & Co. first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds at $960, yielding 5.25 per cent., are a sound investment. (2) Momence, Ill., Kankakee County School District 5 per cent. bonds are a direct obligation of an entire populous and prosperous school district and are payable from taxes levied against all the taxable property within the section. These bonds are a legal investment for the savings banks in your state. Accept the firm's offer on both issues.

J. W. C., OHIO. You want us to direct you to stocks which promise to make money for you. You want to "take advantage of low prices, hold the stocks for five years or more and then sell them out at a good profit." All this seems quite easy. But the Christian Herald cannot give its readers aid in such speculative matters. No man knows what stocks are going to do next year or five years hence. If we knew what you ask we could quickly obtain a fortune from easy speculation.

J. C. K., NEW YORK. (1) The Cobalt mine "pinched out" years ago. Several New Yorkers are said to have lost a million dollars or more in the enterprise. (2) Thunder Mountain (Idaho) was a failure. Prospectors claimed that the whole district was sprinkled with gold. But when systematic mining operations were commenced there in the summer of 1905 it was found the gold came in "blanket formation," and could not be economically recovered. Many millions of dollars were invested in properties there, but only one mine ever paid dividends.

O. D. P., VERMONT. Finding securities for an investment for $800 that are tax-exempt in your state would be difficult. The tax laws in Vermont are very stringent, and while we are strongly of the opinion that the average investor in bonds in Vermont does not return the same for taxation, still, if the purchasers complied strictly with the law they would necessarily have to pay taxes on almost every issue of bonds, if they held one or more of the same. While we do not want to pass on the ethical side of this matter of taxation, believing that every investor should decide this question for himself, still we are aware that if taxes were paid on bonds there would be very few purchased on account of the very limited return which would be derived therefrom. You must use your own discretion. We suggest the following bonds which come in $500 and $100 denominations:

Ohio & Western Utilities Company first lien 5% bonds at	91
The Tulsa Corporation first mortgage 5% bonds at	95
Missouri and Southeastern Utilities Company first mortgage 6% bonds at	99
Minnesota Gas and Electric Company first mortgage 6% bonds at	100

A NATION'S BIRTHDAY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN your mother and sister and brother and father celebrate their birthdays, you kiss them, don't you, and wish them many happy returns and give them some gift to show them that you love them and wish them well? You do that every year, and every year the loving words that you say grow more tender, and the gifts that you give come from a heart more overflowing with affection.

The hundred and thirty-nine years ago a little nation was born in a small house in Philadelphia. The little nation had many godfathers who wrote a remarkable birthday speech and signed their names, names that will live through history until the end of the centuries, for it was baptized in the blood of a great war. As the little nation grew older, it waxed strong and vigorous and greatly beloved, but it looked upon scornfully at first by the other nations, who were old and aristocratic and loaded with family traditions, looked upon, maybe, as we would look at a romping child who plays by itself, laughing, through the golden hours of sunlight. And so it grew.

Last a time came when the little nation became sick, and gasped, and almost died, while a great wound, as broad as a river, cut it nearly in two. But it struggled, with short tortured breaths, for life, and finally it began to grow better until, in another court-house farther south, the wisest physicians of the country proclaimed that it would again grow well and strong. As the years went by the scars from the great wound grew fainter and less distinct. In time they will be no more. This nation, our nation, once small but now very great and very beautiful, celebrates its birthday every year on the Fourth of July. What do we give it for a present?

I WAS talking to a girl a few days ago who had just come home from her first trip to the national capital. I asked her what had impressed her most of all.

"Why," she told me, "one day I went out to Washington's home at Mount Vernon. I went all through the beautiful rooms, and wandered around the holy grounds until finally I came to a great tomb. It was Washington's tomb. As I stood in front of it, more impressively, I noticed that every man who passed by took off his hat. Somehow, that sight sent a deeper thrill into my heart than any other."

"Is a beautiful thing, this respect for a great man who has passed on. It is a beautiful thing to respect a great nation that is living. Respect is one gift that we owe our country on its birthday."

These are wonderful times—history-making times—that we are living in. We every day, see something happen in that has never happened before, or recall of some new departure from old to new. War clouds hang darkly just across the ocean, and oftentimes a bursting flame leaps out of the horizon. I remember, as a little child, playing in the tumtum with bonfires. It was a pastime that my mother did not approve of. I was always closely guarded by watchful grown-ups who shooed me away from every gleaming ember that stretched snaky, inviting fingers in my direction. I would play around the fire happily, because I knew that the grown-ups would not allow me to get burned; and when the glowing sparks had died away and gray ashes had taken the place of the leaping flame, I would be unhurt, and my hands would not even be soiled by the smoke and soot.

Isn't the easiest thing in the world to play with fire and never suffer from burns. It isn't the easiest thing in the world to stand in the light of a glowing wood-pile and come out with clean hands. If I had been alone while

I watched the bonfire, I would probably have been seriously burnt. I would surely have been scorched a bit and made very dirty. Over across the ocean the fire may be very red with blood and flames; it may be very black with ashes and smoke and misery; but if we have faith in the little nation (now grown big) and in the wise and capable minds helping to guide this nation, the fire may leave us unburned. It may leave us with clean hands.

That's another birthday gift that we owe to our country—the gift of faith.

ONCE, as I was walking through the East Side of the city, I saw two little boys fighting. Before long other little boys, friends of the first two, rushed toward the scene of combat and took sides in the fight there in the street. Angry words and large stones and a few tin cans were flung from one side to the other, until the uproar could be heard at quite a distance, and a crowd started to gather. Every available child for blocks around seemed to be in the midst of the mêlée, and because it was impossible to get through the crush of surging humanity I lingered there on the outskirts and watched with wide eyes until I saw a broad-shouldered policeman pushing himself into the thick of the fight with a club raised threateningly over the not very large combatants. As I turned to go through a side street, I heard a small chuckle at my side, and looked down into the face of a tiny boy who had made no attempt to join in the combat. As I looked a smile wreathed his dirty cherub face, and he winked with a deliberate flicker of long lashes over dark eyes.

"You aren't fighting?" I questioned in wonder. Every little boy in the world seemed to be fighting there on the sidewalk.

"Naw!" said my small companion. "But isn't any one a friend of yours?" I questioned again, eager for information; "isn't there any one you want to help?" I was not very well versed in street fights.

The child looked up into my face with a twinkle of roguish eyes. "Ain't I helpin' more by keepin' out of it?" he asked me.

We owe our country that kind of help on its one hundred and thirty-ninth birthday.

HAVE you ever been in a great hall, or at some big band-stand, listening with the mixed crowd to the music of an orchestra? Have you ever noticed how some people were listening to the classical selections with rapt faces, while others were frankly bored? Have you ever noticed how some people will sneer in disgust at the ragtime that other folk pile up while their feet beat time on the ground? And then, when you have gotten the picture in your mind—and it's a picture of great contrast—have you ever heard the different instruments take up the melody of an old song, and as the violins and the cellos and the flutes blended together softly in the first chords, have you ever seen smiles chase away frowns, while hats came off and the audience, at last united in spirit, rose to its feet? That happens whenever a band or an orchestra or even a hurdy-gurdy plays the "Star-Spangled Banner," and loyal citizens are near at hand.

Oh, our little nation is grown up now; it is no longer a child playing in the sun, for it has grown-up cares and grown-up difficulties. Since, each year, it grows nearer and dearer to us, on its birthday we should give it gifts. The greatest gift is love.

The Best of Its Kind

I have taken your paper about 25 years, and I expect to take it the remainder of my life. It is the best of its kind, and my children love it every week as much as I do. MRS. C. J. H. Belmar, Neb.

We are glad to say that she is now herself again." Mrs. K. McC., Westfield, N. J., writes: "A few weeks ago I asked for your prayers for the restoration of my sister's mind. Now I want to acknowledge God's answer to our prayers. Even the doctors declare that her recovery is nothing short of a miracle. Prayer has restored her and saved her from a living death." A RELIGIOUS CLUB

A UNIQUE CLUB has just been launched in London. It is called the "Wesley Club," and its headquarters are in the great Wesleyan Central Hall near the Houses of Parliament. It is globe. Indeed, one of its aims is to make the Hall even more of a gathering place than it has been for all members of the great Methodist family, numbers of whom come to London from all parts of the earth and visit the first club to be formed solely in connection with a religious body, and owes its inception to Sir Robert Perks, who, among other things, revolutionized the underground railways of London, organized the Million Guinea Fund which the Wesleyan Methodists raised some years ago, and made possible the erection of the magnificent hall which houses the new club. Sir Robert is a member of the Christian Herald Relief Committee in London.

The club is open to all Methodists—Wesleyan, Primitive, United, and of both sexes—and whether they come from England or other parts of the Hall. The visitors' book shows many names from New York, Philadelphia and other American cities, as well as those of callers from Australia, Africa, and even from Asia.

Politics will be barred in the Wesley Club, and in the first list of members names prominent in all the British political parties appear. The club, in short, is intended to be a place where members of the Methodist body can indulge in that free-and-easy social intercourse which has been one of the good results of that outstanding Methodist characteristic—brotherliness.

THE LIBERTY BELL ON ITS TRAVELS

THE Liberty Bell, America's treasured historical relic, is to leave its resting-place in old Independence Hall early in July, to make a long journey to the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The school children of California had much to do with the new journey, as these youngsters drew up and signed a petition two and a half miles long, asking that the bell be sent to the fair.

The first journey of the bell occurred away back in Revolutionary days, long before it was cracked. When the British soldiers were threatening to take possession of Philadelphia, the good people of the city were determined that they should not find the bell. So hasty preparations were made to take it to a safe place of concealment. Allentown was selected, and there the bell was conveyed one night, and safely hidden. After all danger was passed, the bell was again hung in the tower of Independence Hall.

The next journey of the bell was made to the New Orleans Exposition in 1885. Nearly ten years after this, in 1893, it journeyed out to the Columbian Fair in Chicago. Then followed a number of trips in rapid succession. In 1895 it attended the exposition at Atlanta. In 1902 it took another jaunt to the South and helped to make the Charleston Exposition a success. The next year it went to Boston, and its last journey was in 1904, to the St. Louis Fair. By that time the dangers of accident attending its touring seemed so apparent that all further requests for the bell from various sections of the United States were refused until the present one.

To prepare it for shipment to California, the clapper has been removed, and within the bell a steel "spider" framework has been clamped to the interior with the intention of preventing any possible widening of the crack during its journey, but it is reported that as a result of this handling the new crack has widened.

Great precautions have been taken to preserve the bell by Professor Alexander E. Outerbridge, Jr., of the Franklin Institute, a metallurgist of distinction and an eminent authority on the effects of stresses and strains of metals. Speaking about his distinguished patient the other day, Professor Outerbridge had this to say:

"My attention was first called professionally to the illness of the bell early in the year 1909. The curator of the museum at Independence Hall, having noticed an appreciable extension of a new crack in the bell, applied to the Franklin Institute for an expert opinion. I determined, after a careful examination of the bell, that risk of injury attends it every time it is removed from its case in Independence Hall, as it is certainly suffering from a grave ailment."

THE LIBERTY BELL ON EXHIBITION AWAY FROM HOME

"In 1914 I again made a careful inspection of the Liberty Bell, and found that the new crack had grown in length far beyond the letter 'Y' in the word 'Liberty,' which marked its visible end in 1909, showing very clearly, indeed, that the metal is still under 'molecular strain,' and the constant though comparatively slight tremors of vibrations to which the bell is subjected while in its case are slowly causing 'breaking down in detail,' to use a technical expression."

The Liberty Bell was first cast in London by Thomas Lester, on the order of three eminent men, Isaac Norris, Thomas Leech and Edward Warner, then superintendents of the State House, Philadelphia. It arrived in the Quaker City in 1752, and was tested in August of that year. Mr. Norris states: "It was cracked by the stroke of the clapper, without any other violence, as it was hung up to try the sound. When we broke up the metal, our judges here generally agreed it was too high and brittle. We concluded to send it back by Captain Budden, but he could not take it on board, upon which two ingenious workmen undertook to cast it here and I am just now informed they have, this day, opened the mold and have got a good bell, which, I confess, pleases me much." Mr. Norris further states that in order to toughen the alloy, which was evidently too brittle, about 10 per cent. of copper was added to the metal of the original bell when remelting it. In a subsequent letter Mr. Norris wrote: "After it was hung in its place it was found to contain too much copper, and Pass & Stow, the workmen, were so teased with the witticisms of the town" that they re-cast the bell, adding, Mr. Outerbridge believes, tin to restore the tone which the excess of copper had destroyed. The third bell, which was placed in position June, 1753, proved to have a high, sonorous quality, and Pass & Stow were then paid £60 13s 5d ($295.25) for their labor. It is probable that the effort made to increase the resonance was overdone, for bitter complaints against the loud and harsh clamor were made to the assembly.

There is no record of the final composition of metals employed by Pass & Stow, but it is known that they must have used at least two dozen of the largest crucibles or melting-pots then known in order to melt the more than 2,000 pounds of metal required. Under these circumstances it was impossible for the casting to have been of homogeneous composition, and the bell was, therefore, subject to abnormal shrinkage and cooling strains, which actually caused a great crack to occur years later.

An old sign which was placed upon the frame and yoke of the Liberty Bell years ago bore this announcement: "Frame and Yoke Whereon hung the old Liberty Bell when on Monday, the 8th of July, 1776, at 12 o'clock noon, it was rung obedient to its motto: "Proclaim liberty throughout the land and unto all the inhabitants thereof."

For fifty years after that July day in 1776 when the old bell rang out its memorable message, it continued to be rung on every festival and anniversary. It was rung on February 22, 1832, in honor of the centennial of the birth of Washington. While being tolled on the morning of July 8, 1835, in memory of Chief Justice Marshall, who had died two days before, the old relic suddenly cracked. On Washington's birthday, 1843, an attempt was made to ring it, but the bell has since been mute.

Finally it was removed from its position in the tower to a lower story, and later it was placed on its original timbers in the vestibule of the State House in a prominent position immediately beneath where a larger bell, presented to Philadelphia in 1866, now proclaims the passing hours.

To Isaac Norris, the speaker of the Colonial Assembly, is ascribed the honor of having originally suggested the prophetic words, from Lev. 25: 10—"Proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof," which were cast on the bell. The reason for the selection of this text at a time when there was not the slightest thought of a break with the mother country has been a subject of much conjecture, but the true reason is apparent when the full text is read: "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year and proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." In selecting the text the Quakers had in mind the arrival of William Penn and their forefathers in America.

A WALK AMONG THE FLOWERS

BY MARIETTA HOLLEY

WHAT is more wholesome and delightful than an early morning walk among your flowers? The sun is still low in the eastern skies, its bright rays softened by the overhanging foliage of the trees. You walk down the gravel path blithely. Maybe in the house the ears pressed down upon you, but here in the sweet morning air you are young again. Yes, under that tea-rose is a new bud, holding in its tiny breast the secret of rosy life and sweetest perfume. Now, every morning that baby-life will appeal to you till its full glory of bloom is reached.

The wistaria and roses over the laced arch vie with each other in making the arch triumphal. The long lily-ordered path, which later will be full of beauty, has still some humble plants smiling on you, rising early, as were, while their stately neighbors are still asleep. Modest English violets lift their blue eyes and greet you. In the corner the snowball tree is full of spheres of whiteness. The syringa end with their weight of perfumed whiteness.

A walk on one side of the garden is bordered with morning glories and nasturtiums. The honeysuckle vine over the summer-house at the end of the walk is a mass of blossoms, and as you approach, two gay little humming-birds swing in the air and dart away. Too many flowers here to note the birth of a new bud; as well count the dizzy movements of the humming-bird's wings.

What a freedom from cares and perplexities one finds among the flowers! They are never unkind; you may be with them from morning till night and not have one bitter memory or disagreeable thought to take with you to your pillow. A tiger lily won't dig its claws into your breast, the calla lily will not prolong her call indefinitely. The sweet william's honeyed personality is honest and sincere; sweetness that will not under fancied provocation turn into vinegary revenge.

The snowdrops will not chill you with cold words and looks. The dogwood will not bark at you, or dog your footsteps. There is a clump of the beautiful variegated variety bending over a quiet corner of the fish pond, its pretty leaves reflected in the water. It has no canine faults, but all the canine virtues: fidelity—no running away from its mistress to follow strange masters.

Jack-in-the-pulpit does not preach too loudly, or make awkward gestures, taking your mind insensibly from the heavenly message he is striving to deliver, and which your soul earnestly desires to grasp, the mind being willing but the body weak. How sweet is that little bed of wild blue violets that covers the sunny corner between the cedar tree and the willow! There is a ground-bird's nest just beyond it. The bird felt safe in building its nest in that sheltered spot—step lightly. Just a few steps farther, no near the path you can reach it with your hand, hidden away in the thick shade of an evergreen, is a robin's nest. The robin too felt it was with friends when it laid the slender foundation of its home. We feel flattered at the compliment.

A little farther on we come to a rustic bridge arching over the water; an ivy vine climbs along one of its latticed sides with its sprays almost touching the water. Beyond the bridge is a wilderness of green, beneath the shade of which tall ferns grow proudly. But you do not cross the bridge, but turn and follow another winding path through the overhanging trees, and come out into an open space where, between two grand old trees, hangs a hammock, hemmed in from intruding eyes by flowering shrubs.

Just the thing! You sit down into its comfortable embrace. You have had a long walk, but not too long, and as you rest in dreamy content you instinctively wonder what new phase of beauty your flowers will present when you take your evening walk, and what new message they will speak.

All these attractions are added now to this prince of the new-day Sixes.

A body so graceful, so unbroken in line, that the car has been called "The Road Cruiser." All the former attempts at flowing lines now seem crude in comparison with it.

A roomier tonneau, an extra-wide rear seat. The most comfortable seats you have ever known. Room in plenty for seven people. Yet the tonneau room is doubled when the two extra seats disappear.

Enameled leather upholstery. A leather-bound top-piece to body and doors.

And now a finish, to equip for which cost us $100,000. We have built enormous ovens, which hundreds of bodies can enter at a time. Each coat of finish is now applied under pressure. Each goes to the oven for baking. The result is a brilliant finish which resists attack. This 1916 HUDSON will retain its look of newness.

And now our output is 100 cars daily—of this one type alone. That has made possible a $200 reduction. That, with last year's reduction, makes $400 since this new-type car came out.

This car sold at $1750 only 15 months ago. Since then, 51 improvements have been added. There is more of luxury, comfort, room and beauty, plus this Ever-Lustre finish. Yet the new price is $1350, because of a multiplied output.

24 Million Dollars Paid in 20 Months

This new-type HUDSON has been a surprise. We knew it would win in the long run. But we did not expect such sudden change to lightness and refinement. That's the reason for past delays.

On our first model we never caught up with our orders. On our second model, all last summer we were thousands of cars behind. In 20 months this car trebled our output. And in those 20 months men paid for it over $24,000,000.

But a greater marvel is the present HUDSON place. Every old idea of a quality car is now practically discarded. This light HUDSON, designed by Howard E. Coffin, represents the new idea. This is apparent everywhere in the class of men who own it.

We shall this season build 20,000—the largest output ever known on a Six. But this summer's demand—while the model is new—is bound to exceed our production. It will be the car you want if you buy a Six. We urge you who want early summer delivery to see your HUDSON dealer at once.

If not, see the car as a matter of interest. See what the new things are.

NEXT to fresh air and bread in the essentials of life comes cleanliness. And to most people this means the use of Ivory Soap.

Ivory Soap satisfies millions of families not only for the bath and toilet, but for nursery use, for particular laundry work, for washing dishes, for cleaning fine furnishings and for brightening up the house in general.

The work of Ivory Soap practically is unlimited because its mildness, purity, quality and freedom from alkali enable it to clean thoroughly—and safely.

THE DIVINE RIGHT OF PRESIDENTS

HERE is such a thing as the American spirit. It is the misfortune of our political system that although that system was devised in order to learn and carry out the will of the people, it is capable of being a mere instrument of a powerful few, who are thus able to substitute for the real mind of the people their own will.

The American spirit revolts at the doctrine of the divine right of kings; yet so surrounds its government with sentimental loyalty as unconsciously to falter in the error of believing in the divine right of Presidents. And this in spite of the sad evidence that Presidents are not always divinely guided.

The safety of our democratic institutions, and the perpetuation of democracy itself in the world, are imperiled when the people are willing to suppress their own feelings and their own judgments and their own wishes, and allow the feelings, judgments and wishes of a group of persons to determine the destiny of this nation in any crisis.

Nothing can be more clear than that it is the duty of every American to get the most light possible upon every question, think his own thoughts and give public expression to his convictions. When the people fail to do this, the President is without any reliable information as to the state of the public mind on a national question. But when the people do do this, the President is able to give expression to the will of the people in all his public acts.

In the present crisis, William Jennings Bryan has truly expressed the mind of the American people. The test of this can best be found in the individual reader's mental and heart attitude toward Mr. Bryan's public statements in the last few weeks.

Part of this supplement is devoted to a remarkable exhibit of the attitude of the public toward Mr. Bryan's statement of the American spirit. These letters have come to us from all parts of the United States: Vermont to California; Wisconsin to Mississippi; East, West, North and South have spoken in these letters.

As for Mr. Bryan, the man, the politician, the leader in other fields, the Christian Herald has nothing to say to its readers. It has no interest in his political aspirations, if he has any, nor does it support him nor any other individual as a leader-at-large to the American people. But we are in absolute accord with his principles in the present crisis, for we are convinced that he has sounded the one note with which the voice of the American people is in tune.

WE ARE FOR PEACE, BUT—

AT a quarter to eight o'clock on Thursday evening, June 24, two New York men got up from a table in a restaurant five minutes' walk from Madison Square Garden and stepped into the street. "Plenty of time," said one of them; "with box tickets we don't need to get there before quarter or half-past eight."

"But," protested the other, "can we get in? They are arranging for overflow meetings to take care of the expected crowds."

The other man laughed. "There will be no overflow meetings," said he, with assurance. "They won't even fill the hall. There's no need to hurry."

Nevertheless, they strolled in the direction of Madison Square Garden, and began to note with a little uneasiness long lines of men in the streets surrounding that immense structure. Presently they found themselves right in the thick of the press, and realized that one of the very biggest public demonstrations New York has ever witnessed was under way. Box seat tickets? When the New York police hold up their hands and say, "No more will be admitted tonight," box seat tickets rapidly shrink in value and in potency.

At these two men were determined to attend the mass meeting of the Friends of Peace at Madison Square Garden, New York, June 24, 1915, and with hundreds of others who were not to be discouraged they fought to get near the entrance door. It was of no avail. Men and women came streaming out of the lobby, unable to get into the auditorium. Turning away, these two men found themselves wedged in a throng that filled Madison Avenue from curb to curb. Two lines of men, three and four abreast, standing close together, completely encircled Madison Square Garden. Passing down the lane which the police kept clear between the patient rows the two men finally reached the pre door, and to their astonishment gained admittance. One of them is giving this brief account of that great meeting for peace.

THE entire vast floor of this biggest of auditoriums was given over to fenced-in chairs, forming "boxes" of six each, a broad aisle bisecting the room. This arrangement, with the entire gallery system thrown open to the public, would accommodate between twelve and fifteen thousand people; a huge platform for the speakers had been erected at the center of one side of the immense room. Bands at either end of the hall played with scarcely any clashing of notes. The building was absolutely full; as full in that dizzy gallery, running entirely around the auditorium, just under the roof, as it was in the reserve boxes on the floor. From floor to roof Madison Square Garden was full of men and women, very few children; representative men and women: representative of the good homes and the best business interests of New York and its suburbs.

This tremendous meeting was called by a group of organizations: the German-American Alliance of Greater New York; United Irish-American Societies; American Truth Society; American Independence Union; American Humanity League, and many others. All these societies are American in their origin and scope. But the astonishing fact must be recorded that the press of New York, excepting only some of those newspapers that are printed in a foreign tongue, refused to regard the meeting as representative! Not the least remarkable evidence of this is found in the unique circumstance that not a single New York paper had photographs made of any feature of this mammoth outpouring of the people, and not one of the commercial photographers, who make a business of supplying news photographs to the papers and periodicals, "covered" the event.

THE huge, enthusiastic, patriotic, intensely serious meeting in Madison Square Garden clearly and absolutely expressed what is in the heart of the American people today on the subject of war with any of the present belligerents in Europe. The entrance of former Secretary of State William J. Bryan, accompanied by his wife, evoked a magnificent ovation: for the man? No—for the truthfulness with which he has defined the American mind in the present national emergency. Mr. Bryan has become for the moment the one real spokesman of the American people, and the people recognize that splendid fact and ungrudgingly give him his due of praise and confidence.

A great host of men and women within the Garden stood and cheered and cheered and cheered the stalwart exponent of their beliefs as he was escorted to the platform. They continued to cheer long after he had taken his seat, and were persuaded to silence only by the knowledge that time was passing. Outside the Garden, even greater multitudes gathered in immense companies to listen to eight speakers who addressed overflow meetings as enthusiastic in all respects as those within reach of Mr. Bryan's eloquence.

The message that this great representative gathering of American citizens sent to the Administration at Washington in the name of the American people was voiced by Mr. Bryan. He had a few kindly things to say about his relations with President Wilson, and a few stern things to say about the unfairness of the New York press, but it is solely with his utterances on the great question of the hour that we have to do here. It might be in order perhaps to include one statement of Mr. Bryan's, to the effect that for twenty-five years he had not known the New York press to be on the side of the American people on any question. As an example of their sincerity, he said that for more than two years the newspapers had kept trying to tell the people that he ought not to be in the cabinet; then when he stepped out they switched around and accused him of endangering his country by so doing.

"Will the people support the President in case of war between this country and any other country?" asked Mr. Bryan. And he answered his own question: "Yes, a thousand times yes; but whether or not we should engage in war is a question which is still open for discussion." Right there he made a most important point. There is no division in this country as to supporting the Government in case of war; the sole question is whether or not we should engage in war, and on that question the American people not only are entitled to speak, but ought to speak with vigor and clearness and without being subjected to the charge of treason: a charge absurdly hurled at the so-called pacifists by the advocates of force. As Mr. Bryan said: "In view of the efforts of a portion of the press to force the country into war, it is the citizen's duty to enter his protest now; he cannot afford to risk the happening of some unexpected event which might make resistance to the war sentiment more difficult." "Shall the nations honor be maintained? Yes, a thousand times yes. There is no division among the American people on this subject; but what does national honor require?" And Mr. Bryan proceeded to show the gradual but complete change in public sentiment as to what constitutes national honor, summing up his argument by reference to the abandonment of dueling.

Dueling was at one time common in the United States. The custom was so thoroughly supported by current opinion that Alexander Hamilton, though he himself disapproved of the practice, felt that it was necessary for him to risk his life, for fear a refusal to fight would destroy his usefulness in public life—he so stated in a note written just before he left home for the fatal encounter. The sentiment then dominant would have branded him as a coward; behold the change that has taken place in a century!

Today every state in the Union has a statute against dueling and public sentiment now supports the man who declines a challenge instead of the man who sends it. Why this change? Because brute force is giving way before the superior influence of the mind and the heart. This has been accomplished by those who have taken their stand on the side of intelligence and morality. It has been a struggle—all progress is the result of struggle—but truth always triumphs at last, because the heart

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

THE Christian Herald in its supplement of June 16 printed in full the administration's note to Germany, demanding a strict accounting for the sinking of the Lusitania and assurances that her submarine warfare would not in future imperil American citizens; and the public statement of former Secretary of State Bryan, explaining his resignation from office and calling upon the American people to advocate the principle of arbitration and peaceable methods of settlement of international questions, including those which have arisen with Germany and with England. In doing this, we ask our readers to declare their preference between these two documents: one advocating inevitably to war in certain contingencies which are possible, the other advocating even yet the application by our government of the principle of arbitration to those same contingencies if they arise.

In response to this invitation we are daily receiving a huge mail from our readers. Up to the date of going to press the proportion was in the ratio of one letter in support of Mr. Wilson's policy to every twenty supporting Mr.

Bryan's principles. In printing a large number of these letters in abstract on the following two pages, had we retained this proportion the space which would have been required by those supporting the President's note would have been but one-twentieth of the two pages, whereas we have given one-eighth of the space in order to present a fair sample of both classes of letters. We have no quarrel with readers who do not agree with our policy, yet we would call attention to the different spirit shown in these two groups of letters.

We hereby affirm the above statements to be accurate in all respects, and the abstracts on the two following pages of representative letters from these groups to be verbatim abstracts without omission of any parts essential to the declaration of the writers. In addition, we affirm that no attempt whatsoever has been made in reproducing these letters to select letters or sentences from them in order to give any particular color to the general effect. All letters upon this subject received will, without exception, be sent in an especial way to the President at Washington.

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

HEADS OF FAMILIES APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT THROUGH THE CHRISTIAN HERALD TO AVOID WAR

These Stand for the President's "Strict Accountability" Note

In this section of the United States we think W. J. Bryan the smallest man in the country today, and stand back of Woodrow Wilson.—E. R. Ballard. Mississippi.

I live on a farm in the mountains of Virginia. I have been a supporter of Mr. Bryan in the past, having voted for him for President three times, but I do not approve his course at this time. The community in which I live is about equally divided between the two leading political parties and there is not a man here who is not standing with the President in this crisis.—From W. S. Hale, Virginia.

I will try to give you the opinion of our community. They think this move of Mr. Bryan's is simply to bring him before the public as a possible candidate for the next President. The common people—the strength of the nation—are opposed to war. They have implicit faith in President Wilson's ability to keep out of the war.—From Mrs. John A. Payne, Michigan.

Woodrow Wilson is the greatest American since Abraham Lincoln. If your request for a statement of attitude among your subscribers is an honest one be fair and tally one for Woodrow when you tell him how your subscribers stand. Remember that the devil's lie to Eve in the garden was the more subtle because of the fact that it was half truth. So don't tell the President that a certain number of your subscribers favor Bryan's policy. Tell it to him just as it is. If people wake up the President needn't lie awake nights over it either.—From Olive W. Elsbree, New York.

For many years I have subscribed to and read your paper with pleasure and profit. Especially Kindly discontinue at once. I do not care to pollute my home with a paper containing articles like those of Hall and Spaeth as published in issue of June 16th. The writers and publishers of such articles should be sent to jail for high treason or interned in Belgium.—Geo. S. Hobart. New Jersey.

These Stand for Mr. Bryan's Plea for "Peace by Arbitration"

We gladly endorse Mr. Bryan's policy to secure peace.—D. L. Gillette, Mrs. D. L. Gillette. Connecticut.

I would have the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement, prevail.—L. Herbert, M.D., lay reader to Christ Church, Episcopal. North Dakota.

I unhesitatingly say: I pray that the counsels of peace as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement may prevail; I also pray that the Christian Herald may keep right on in the good work, which it has so nobly taken up. . . . That supplement is a powerful four-page issue.—From H. C. Rundell, Missouri.

I have carefully read President Wilson's answer to Germany's note, and then Mr. Bryan's, and of the two I must say that Mr. Bryan's idea appeals to me as being far the best in every respect.—Earl L. McCrocklin. Indiana.

I heartily endorse the efforts you and others are making to keep our nation from the crime of needless war. . . . Such a service is invaluable to the homes of our land. Let the money makers who reap their harvests from the field of battle just keep silent for awhile and give the common people an opportunity to speak, and the question will soon be settled for the side of peace and progress, with a strong faith in God. . . . I believe Christ has a solution for every national problem, and he will meet every crisis if his followers will heed his voice as expressed in his Word.—From W. M. Baker, Pastor Christian Church, Iowa.

With all my heart I endorse William J. Bryan's statement, entire, from beginning to end. I do pray that our President will hear the voice of the millions of the common citizens of the United States to avoid war under all circumstances.—Jennie L. Hanson. Missouri.

I don't see how a Christian can do otherwise than favor W. J. Bryan's peace policy.—A. T. Cragbon. New York.

I and nearly all of the people in this rural community favor Colonel Bryan's plan in this diplomatic entanglement with Germany. . . . Our government had trouble in getting our citizens out of the war-stricken countries at the beginning, being also warned of the dangers that naturally awaited them. Was it not purely for others to return under the circumstances? The press does not voice the sentiments of the majority of the people in this immediate locality on the war situation. . . .—From Marcus Fisher, Pennsylvania.

We believe in the Christian doctrine of peace, and fully endorse Mr. Bryan's statement.—D. F. Pratt, Mrs. D. F. Pratt, Harold W. Walker, Mrs. E. G. Walker. Massachusetts.

We are with you heart and soul in your eloquent and unanswerable plea for peace with honor and against war and dishonor.—From Timothy Grove Taylor, Mrs. S. M. Weed and S. B. Chamberlin, Pennsylvania.

have the articles on the war by Anthony Arnoux been of interest and value. To order you to stop sending the paper would be a distinct loss to the literature on the family table. . . .

Is it possible that you so mistake the real temper of the American people as to suppose that they prefer the mystical utterances of Mr. Bryan to the simple and straightforward message of the President? . . .

The only peace that can be assured as lasting must be based upon the destruction of that militarism of which Germany has proved herself the leading exponent. Her successes have been based upon the fact that she has outdone all other nations in preparation. . . .

The undersigned is as desirous of a lasting world peace as Mr. Bryan or any other pacifist. He was born the only son of a mother early widowed; was educated among the Friends and has imbibed many of their principles; has labored under heavy handicaps for his daily bread from his earliest years; would be from the nature of his business and its location among the first to suffer ruin from war; yet would give all that he possesses, including his three sons, to support the principles maintained by the President in the present crisis. . . .

I challenge you to print this and send it to the President along with the peace-at-any-price messages.—From John F. Chase, Rhode Island.

I have been a subscriber to the Christian Herald for years and all my family pledge ourselves entirely with President Wilson. We think W. J. Bryan is contemptible.—From May J. Y. Sullivan, New York.

I live in a rural community with the plain people, the great middle class who make up the rank and file of the American nation, and I say to you they don't want war. . . . If we are to remain out of the war, then for God's sake let us not make statements that we can only back up by war.—O. Arthur Nattier, Illinois.

I am American born and have lived most of my life here in southern Indiana, never having been near the United States boundary. I am for peace. . . . and see no good reason why we should do anything that may lead to war to avenge what Germany may have done on the sea. In the first place the people that lost their lives on the Lusitania knew they were gambling with death before they shipped on the fatal voyage. They gambled and lost. . . . Those people went two thousand miles from our shores to get in danger they knew of. Should we send our men to kill and be killed? Never.—From Charles E. Wyman, Indiana.

Your comments on the action of William J. Bryan and the article by Rev. Thomas C. Hall strike a responsive chord in northern Wisconsin. People here are very anxious that nothing be done by our government that will even suggest war. An embargo on arms and ammunition would be highly satisfactory to us. Your position is well taken. . . . Jerusalem seems to be suffering the ravages of famine, pestilence, sword, and locusts. What a fulfillment of God's words to the people of Israel!—From H. H. Savage, Pastor Baptist Church, Wisconsin.

I believe I am safe in saying that 75 per cent. of the farmers and workers in this vicinity are in favor of Mr. Bryan's ideas, although we all think a great deal of President Wilson and are loyal to him.—From Albert A. Albrecht, Illinois.

We choose the counsels of peace as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement. May God bless you in your good work.—W. U. Brown. North Dakota.

God forbid that America should have any part in the war in Europe. E. A. and E. C. Goodwin. Iowa.

I am for Mr. Bryan and Mr. Bryan's idea of "peace by arbitration," if that is at all possible. . . . Twenty-five years from now, when the world catches up with Mr. Bryan, his name will be held in the highest honor by the nations of the earth. I notice they are saying: "He is not a politician"—quite true. Others are saying: "He is not a great diplomat"—not after the old order. Still others are saying "Sentimental statesman." But I notice none of them are saying "He is not a Christian statesman."—From W. A. Hutchinson, Michigan.

God bless Mr. Bryan and grant that his plan may be adopted by the United States, for we would have "the counsels of peace . . . prevail."—Mr. A. Charles A. Peck. New Jersey.

I endorse Wm. J. Bryan's position on peace or war.—J. W. Jenner. Texas.

After carefully reading President Wilson's answer to Germany's note and also Mr. Bryan's statement, we agree with Mr. Bryan as to the course to pursue.—From Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Vance and Family, Tennessee.

We fully endorse Mr. Bryan's statement, . . . and hope that the peace sentiment will prevail.—H. B. Lehman. Arizona.

A nobler step for humanity has not been taken since the Man of Allile than W. J. Bryan's.—Cartter Christian Sunday School. Illinois.

I wish to express my opinion in favor of the conscientious stand which I believe Mr. Bryan took when he resigned as secretary of state. I am glad he believes in peace, and believes that we can have peace by adopting the "new way," which, I believe, is God's way. I am an admirer of Mr. Wilson; but I believe Mr. Bryan's policy is the best. I greatly appreciate the stand taken by the Christian Herald against our furnishing ammunition and other war material to the nations now engaged in war.—From J. B. Hedrick, Pastor M. E. Church, South, Virginia.

With my whole soul, body and spirit I endorse the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement.—J. Q. Swim. Oklahoma.

I endorse Mr. Bryan's statement. It sounds full of truth. And would avoid war.—Wm. Roland. Michigan.

Having been a subscriber to your most valuable paper for some thirty years I have found this paper on the right side of every important question, and now, as we find this week's issue presenting one of the most important international issues that has ever come to the notice of the American people, we feel it our duty to respond to your most reasonable request to state upon which platform we prefer to stand and pledge our support, and just here it might be well to state that we have also been a subscriber of Mr. Bryan's Commoner since the first issue of that valuable paper came from the press. Having studied carefully all of Mr. Bryan's patriotic efforts to elevate every American citizen to the highest and noblest aspirations that are possible for us to grasp, we therefore wish to help President Wilson by standing upon Mr. Bryan's platform as set forth in your last issue, looking to a peaceful settlement of international difficulties.—From Thomas L. Dunn, West Virginia.

We endorse Mr. Bryan's peace policy for the United States.—My H. Rumble, Caroline A. Griffin, Lavinia Wilson. California.

I am heartily in accord with Mr. Bryan's foreign policy.—Ernest R. Boker. Indiana.

I have read Mr. Bryan's reasons for resigning his high office, and feel that God is with him in this matter. And so we all should be. . . . I know that the people in this locality do not want a war with Germany. . . . By the known law of God (if not the law of man) we should not ship munitions of war to any country to murder these brothers for gain. I am no German nor son of a German (nor is it necessary for me to be so in order to know wrong when so plain) nor do I uphold her in her butchery. But when men are in a death grapple they will do things that seem abnormal to those standing calmly by. Stop sending munitions of war to Europe, for in our case it is certainly wilful cold-blooded murder for money.—From Ezra K. Kennedy, Massachusetts.

I stand for the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement, and I have occasion to know that I speak for the seven hundred inhabitants of town of Schleswig.—B. S. Andresen. Iowa.

I heartily endorse Mr. Bryan's statement. . . . I have not met a man of woman who favored anything that savored of war.—J. W. M'Laughlin. Iowa.

In my judgment it would be well for this nation to follow the old adage, "It is better to bear slight wrong than to resort to law for trifles." We might paraphrase it and say, "It is better to bear slight wrong than to resort to war for doubtful cause." The councils of peace as suggested by Mr. Bryan, or some similar course, should certainly prevail.—From Frank E. Scott (Attorney at Law), Texas.

I would have the counsel of peace prevail. The common people carry the brunt of the awful, indescribable torment that we always bring. Have we no right to cry with might and voice, "I am for peace!"—From J. R. Raiser. Ohio.

I have read the supplement to the Christian Herald with profound interest. I fully endorse Mr. Bryan's stand. I was a soldier in the war of the rebellion and know some of the horrors of war.—From J. B. Felton, Kansas.

We have a good President, but I think the Prince of Peace would be with Bryan at the present time.—J. M. Broady, J. T. Ch. Orr. W. Broady, Ione Broady, Margaret Go. Huber. Whitcomb, Kansas.

We are very glad, indeed, to see the endorsement of the course taken by Hon. W. J. Bryan in working for honorable peace. Mr. Bryan certainly reflects the hearts and minds of the common American people when he is recommending persuasion a fair trial before resorting to force.—From C. H. Paul, Missouri.

We believe in and hope that Mr. Bryan's statements and counsels of peace will prevail.—From Mrs. P. R. Wolfe, Carmie S. W. Mrs. Mabel Potter, F. R. Wolfe, Kansas.

I am irrevocably in favor of the counsels of peace as presented by W. J. Bryan. I speak for a large number of people to whom I minister as minister of the Gospel, also as mayor of our town.—C. S. Steinmetz, Colorado.

We not only endorse Mr. Bryan's conscientious stand for a course with Germany along the line of persuasion, but his stand at our President advise all Americans to avoid uttering to sea on belligerent ships. We further request that we as a nation quit playing the lottery. We loudly talk for peace, while on the other hand we allow private citizens to furnish munitions to the belligerents.—From F. A. J. Furstenberger, Pastor of Friends Ch. in Indiana.

I sincerely hope that our President will hear the voice of the plain people and accordingly in this critical time. Above is only my opinion, but the earnest desire of every one of my parishioners, 165 voters, members of the Bethlehem Lutheran Church in Altamont, Ill.—From F. W. Brockmeyer, Illinois.

I cannot refrain from writing to show honor you for the stand you have taken. My husband and I are certainly with Mr. Bryan. . . . Don't let us have war! It is so hard now to exist. Can't we clean inside before we try to get into some other nation's troubles?—From Mr. and Mrs. T. R. Brown. Alabama.

I sincerely hope that our President will hear the voice of the plain people and accordingly in this critical time. Above is only my opinion, but the earnest desire of every one of my parishioners, 165 voters, members of the Bethlehem Lutheran Church in Altamont, Ill.—From F. W. Brockmeyer, Illinois.

I am so glad and so thankful to you for asking your readers to express their opinions on Mr. Bryan's course. All week I have been thanking God for a man who under any circumstance whatever dares to stand for peace and for the cause of his Lord and Master. Let us all pray earnestly that God will bless Mr. Bryan, President Wilson and all our leaders.—From A. J. Best, Michigan.

ON THE ISSUE OF PEACE OR WAR

THE VOICE OF THE WHOLE PEOPLE IS HEARD AND HEHEDED IN WASHINGTON, WE WILL HAVE NO WAR

I hope you will remain firmly for peace. We are an old Democrat family, against the policy of the administration in the European problem.—Anderson, Illinois.

There is much right on both sides as the paper and feel the matter should settle peacefully. We feel . . . if the people of the United States wishing to travel in the world would take American ships, or not travel by seas, and if we should place an embargo on arms, ammunitions and foodstuffs, . . . the war would not long continue and we would not be in any way drawn into the war.—Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Blossom, N. Blossom, Joshua R. Wood, New York.

I and unalterably by Mr. Bryan and his views regarding Germany.—Meavitt, Vermont.

While my politics are Republican, I have in a Wilson man, on account of his thoughtful, I think, prayerful dealings with the questions that he has had to solve. While in no position to know the spirit of the nation, know the spirit of our little community, I heard the voice of one of our prominent men at a distance of about one hundred miles the other night. He was saying to one of his neighbors: "I see no sense in sending our boys out there to be slaughtered like hogs for the sake of the Lusitania victims. What good is it?" I think these were his words and they speak the spirit of our community.—From Ter Appgar, Virginia.

I would have the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement, was.—M. F. Davis, M.D. Indiana.

I endorse the principles of ex-Secretary Bryan's statements.—Mrs. A. S. Winnifred Knight, Mrs. Sarah Pratt, Mr. J. W. Pratt, Herbert R. Lord, S. Lord. New York.

am not a German nor a German-American, but a Scotch-Irish ancestry. I do not state because so many papers print to brand as German or German-American any one who seems disposed to be to Germany. . . . I have no patience with those editorial writers who tell us that it is our duty to stand by the President and what he does; or inform us that the President is "solidly behind Wilson," even to the point of going to war. . . . But in spite of content efforts of many newspapers to stir up sentiment against Germany an overwhelming majority of the common people in this country would be opposed to going to war. . . . My knowledge was gained first from the common people . . . blame England for her passenger ships to carry armaments. . . . We blame travelers for having no regard for their country than to go in danger and expect Uncle Sam to take up, and, with all due respect for the idea we blame him for not following Mr. Wilson's suggestion and issuing warning. . . . We believe that if people would harp less on rights and would get a little more common sense and Christianity into their system, the world would get along better. I am a German, but I am not for "My country, right or wrong." . . . I honor, respect and revere the President, but I must stand by my convictions, which happen to be very much common with those of the great commoner, Thomas Leslie Wilson, South Carolina.

I sincerely agree with Mr. Bryan.—O. Chester Wilson, Minnesota.

I would have the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement, was.—H. P. Bagg, Iowa.

There is no word in our language that has meaning than the word Peace. Let us say peace to the world. Thank our Father who has given us a peace advocate in Christ and newspapers who dare stand for truth and righteousness to a world of people.—From A. T. MacDonald, Virginia.

I stand on Mr. Bryan's platform. New York.

That the Christian Herald takes regarding sale of war supplies seems to be only stand a Christian nation can maintain as proper.—Earl W. Gage, New York.

I love the President for all he has done for me. I must say that I prefer and fully endorse Mr. Bryan's course of procedure.—From W. H. Wier, Virginia.

When Mr. Bryan was right. We should have been as long as possible. Germany has paid for those lives, but there are ways to pay to war. . . . "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." I admire a man stand alone for what he thinks right these days when it is so much easier to follow the crowd.—From A. A. Kerrick, Virginia.

I see no reason why the American people can not remain at home until danger is past. I earnestly hope that our President will reconsider the matter, and try to settle this by "persuasion," as Mr. Bryan suggests.—Mrs. J. B. Smith, Colorado.

We citizens and farmers of the United States are opposed to a policy which may lead to unfriendly relations, or even war, with Germany, or any other country. . . . If there is a war, we farmers will ultimately have to pay the bill. We would also like to see international disputes like this one settled by arbitration. . . . We would also like to see an embargo established on the shipment of arms and ammunition to the warring nations in Europe and elsewhere.—Hans Calsen, Raymond Calsen, Herbert C. Calsen, New York.

I heartily agree with Mr. Bryan's stand and his methods. This supplement in itself is so unbiased that if I had money enough I would scatter it broadcast throughout the country.—From Howard E. Green, Pennsylvania.

Your supplement of June 16 ought to be in every household in the country. . . . I hope the President can keep his head under the pressure brought to bear on him. . . . I do not admire Mr. Bryan particularly, but I do know his position about this war. I wish I had a hundred copies of your supplement to spread in Schenectady.—From E. Fitch Buckus, New York.

I most certainly endorse Mr. Bryan's views. . . . While I think President Wilson is all right at heart, I am afraid he has been just a little swayed by the clamor of a few, both men and newspapers. . . . If the President only knew the real temper and sentiment of the people as they really are! I speak more especially of the great Middle West, which I know best. But I can see no reason why the rest of the country should be any different.—From S. L. Loper, Iowa.

Go on, Christian Herald. Your work is Christian, and the world must give you the highest praise for trying to make men better and nobler Christians. Your opinion about W. J. Bryan is mine also.—From W. Busch, Maryland.

I am fully convinced that Mr. Bryan's views in the controversy with Germany are far preferable to those of President Wilson.—From W. F. Manner, Indiana.

We as a family most heartily endorse William Jennings Bryan's principles for the peace of this country and believe he has been inspired and sent as one of the good peace messengers to save our country from war. . . . We must not forget to praise the Christian Herald for all the good work it is doing and has done to promote peace in these critical times.—From Rufus Herrick, Mrs. Rufus Herrick, Jessie F. Herrick, Marion B. Herrick, John Calvin Brust, New York.

I most heartily concur in Hon. W. J. Bryan's peace policy. . . . I feel that the step he took in severing his relations with the cabinet was of God, and I likewise believe that the Christian conscience of this country is, or will be, with him. A Christian American Prohibitionist.—From S. A. Sherman, Pastor Baptist Church, Michigan.

It sounds good at this time.—S. H. New York.

Thank you for giving in their entirety the statements of Wilson and Bryan. The latter's, in my humble judgment, if considered as an oration, embodying as it does the real issue, is the greatest since Lincoln's famous Gettysburg.—From E. E. Peltz, Oregon. (By telegraph.)

William J. Bryan has taken the only ground for a true believer in Jesus Christ, and I believe has already by his action averted war with Germany by showing to the world that the people of the United States are not solidly back of a movement which requires force to carry it out.—From William B. Rhoads, Pennsylvania.

I heartily endorse Mr. Bryan's peace views.—F. J. McComb, M.D. Kansas.

I am heartily in favor of the stand taken by Mr. Bryan.—J. Kemp Wysham, Maryland.

It has been with keen interest that I have read the supplement of your paper of June 16, and I heartily endorse the position Mr. William J. Bryan takes. . . . I am more than pleased to see the noble stand that you have maintained on this question, and I may say that as a humble citizen in my vocation, I come in close contact with the working people in a limited district, and I find that whether they are English, German or French descendants as well as Americans, they all condemn, and none condone, the shipment of arms and ammunition; and the public press in no wise represents the sentiment of the majority of the citizens of the country on this question.—From E. F. Niemeyer, Washington, D. C.

I heartily endorse Mr. Bryan's policy.—Catherine M. South, Massachusetts.

I am decidedly in favor of Mr. Bryan's Christian doctrine of peace.—M. A. Goodhart, Pennsylvania.

I am heartily in sympathy with Mr. Bryan's course. I pray earnestly that he might be able somehow to turn the tide of war. . . . Our people en masse are horrified. I do pray daily for our good President that he may have wisdom in these trying hours to brave the tide and stand firm for peace and right.—From J. M. Fanner, Virginia.

We fully endorse the plan of Mr. Bryan for peace.—Miss Etta Chrisman, Mrs. E. M. Chrisman, Arizona.

Your special news supplement is surely a boon to your readers. . . . I do agree with all Mr. Bryan says, with all due respect to our honored President, who has at this time an immense burden of responsibility resting upon him. . . . We highly value your articles on "The War in Europe." My husband takes several daily papers, but says he learns more from the Christian Herald than from all the others. It gives only what is true and reliable, not a lot of words which in the end tell us nothing.—From (Mrs.) B. D. Mosher, New York.

It was with pleasure that I read the public document by William J. Bryan, and think it worthy the highest consideration. . . . If the rulers of the warring nations had been dominated by the principles therein, war would have been prevented.—From Jacob DeJong, New Jersey.

I fully endorse Mr. Bryan's position on the war question.—J. A. Sartain, Georgia.

I prefer the counsels of peace, as embodied in Mr. Bryan's statement, and do most sincerely hope that they prevail.—Jas. Oates, Alabama.

It is with greatest pleasure that I commend your earnest efforts for peace. . . . I have seen and talked to many, and nearly all are opposed to war and force, contrary to the arguments of a large part of the daily papers.—From Charles D. Sadtman, New Jersey.

We heartily endorse Mr. Bryan's statement, and think the President ought to stop the exportation of arms and ammunition.—Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Speare, Vermont.

I am in full accord with Mr. Bryan's peace principles. . . . But I do not understand President Wilson's note as carrying any actual threat of war. If I so considered it I could not be the strong friend of his policies that I have been from the beginning of his administration.—From Benjamin P. Moore, Ohio.

Myself and family stand with Mr. Bryan on the platform of international relations.—Lynn Crawford, New Mexico.

I heartily endorse the sentiments of Mr. Bryan. . . . It is not he who speaks, but the Holy Spirit of God speaking through him. . . . I hope that his views will be carried across the water that the world may know where we, the American people, stand. There was a statement appeared in the papers recently, which was credited to Mr. Bryan, which said that a declaration of war should be made by the people; that an election should be held, and every citizen allowed to vote, signing his name to the ballot. Those who voted in favor of war should immediately be considered members of the militia, and, in case these were all destroyed in war, the President should have power to draft into service those who did not show enough interest to go to the polls and vote. Only as a last resort should the peace-loving world be drawn into the conflict. I heartily endorse this method also. . . . Let us, the American people, stand by Mr. Bryan, and also rise in our power and say to the nations of Europe: "If you fight, it will not be with material furnished by the United States." Let us pray that God will make the United States the peace-maker and lead us on to perfect peace.—From Harry L. Knight, Iowa.

I heartily agree with Mr. Bryan in his plan for prevention of war and maintenance of peace.—Chas. D. King, Mississippi.

The people in general are for peace, and if we were to get up a petition here 99 out of 100 would sign it in favor of peace. There are six voters in this family and all agree with Mr. Bryan. We also all join in thanking the Christian Herald for the stand it has taken in this matter.—From William Beine, Kansas.

I and my entire congregation, consisting of 126 voting members—heads of families—heartily endorse the stand of the Hon. W. J. Bryan and the Christian Herald against war. . . . If we would be true to our professions, we must at least offer to arbitrate all our differences with Germany.—From M. H. Dallmann, Lutheran Pastor, New York.

I am most heartily with Mr. Bryan in his position relative to the question of peace and war. . . . There was a time when a vice-president could shoot and kill a fellow man over some trouble, . . . but that time is past. . . . We must overcome our bloodthirstiness in national disputes, and settle our troubles in a neighborly way.—From (Rev.) Joseph Ratliff, Kansas.

I am on the side of Mr. Bryan. Think he has the Christian way of bringing about peace. President Wilson set apart a day to pray for peace, and then allows some of the people to ship ammunition and war implements to prolong the terrible slaughter. I don't know what they must think of us as a nation. It certainly must be in the power of Congress to put a stop to the shipping of all war materials.—From Mrs. Sarah Thompson, Ohio.

The people of this community are of one mind in giving praise to Mr. Bryan and his stand and action against jingoism. . . . We want the possibilities of war banished and the certainty of peace established. And we farmers fear this will never be done until the jingoes are denied recognition in Washington and other centers.—From S. L. Duckworth, Arkansas.

I heartily endorse Mr. Bryan's statement, and I believe that we should be willing to arbitrate, . . . and that Americans should be warned against traveling on belligerent vessels, or with cargoes of ammunition.—From B. F. Perkins, Massachusetts.

We, the undersigned citizens of these United States, have and do stand on the platform with Mr. Bryan. Now is the time to do away with the old system which has proved inadequate again and again.—J. L. Comrade, B. L. Davis, A. Allardice, M. Allardice, L. Allardice, O. F. Davis.

I was delighted with the special news supplement of the Christian Herald of June 16. While I honor our president, Mr. Wilson, and consider him a man of peace and of Christian principle, nevertheless my Bible leads me to take my position with Mr. Bryan in his proposed method of dealing with refractory Germany. I, with him and with the Christian Herald, believe that nations as well as individuals should act in accordance with the principles of Jesus Christ.—From Frank M. Field, Pastor Alice Memorial M. E. Church, Michigan.

I am only one humble Christian mother who has noble sons who are near and dear to us—sons whom we wish to see follow our Prince of Peace all through their lives and never be brought into war. . . . I agree with J. Duncan Spaeth of Princeton University in the able article, "The Sober Second Thought."—From Mary Jane Huber Moore, Ohio.

Our hearts are with Mr. Bryan. We admire him for his action of standing by his teachings of a lifetime. . . . We love our grand and noble President and pray he will continue true to his people. But, hurrah for our peacemaker!—From Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Collins, Wyoming.

ENGLAND WON'T RELAX BLOCKADE

ON JUNE 24 Secretary of State Lansing made public the text of the note or memorandum received on the previous day from the Government of Great Britain, in which the latter sets forth its reasons in justification of the treatment of American commerce, under rules adopted by the Allies for restricting trade with Germany and Austria. In his cablegram transmitting the note, Ambassador Page explains that it is not intended as an answer to the American note of March 30, but simply as a memorandum explanatory of the action taken in certain specific cases in which cargoes to and from the United States are being subjected to detention in accordance with the so-called Order-in-Council blockade.

The memorandum is confined to the discussion of those American cargoes that have been detained in British ports. It opens by referring to the assurances given to the United States Government that Great Britain would endeavor to minimize the inconveniences "which must inevitably be caused to neutral commerce under existing conditions." It claims further that every effort has been made to remove all causes of complaint on account of delays, and that "various special concessions have been made in favor of United States citizens." In particular, it is urged, the British Government has conceded all that American interests could properly ask in relation to shipments of American cotton; that considerable shipments of cotton have already been dealt with under the arrangement which made the following provision for such cases:

1. All cotton for which contracts of sale and freight engagements have already been made before the 2d of March is to be allowed free (or bought at contract price if stopped), provided the ship sails not later than the 31st of March.

2. Similar treatment is to be accorded to all cotton insured before the 2d of March, provided it is put on board not later than the 16th of March.

3. All shipments of cotton claiming the above protection are to be declared before sailing, and the documents produced to, and certificates obtained from, consular officers or other authority fixed by the government.

The British Board of Trade, the memorandum continues, has already paid over 450,000 pounds sterling to various American claimants for cotton shipment dealt with in accordance with the above arrangement, and all claims now pending and to arise hereafter will continue to be paid as rapidly as they are presented and proofs of title accepted. Some embarrassment has been caused in a number of cases by consignments for which American shippers had asked protection under this arrangement, now being claimed by Swedish and Dutch firms, the validity of whose titles has to be established.

Referring to the general allegation of delay in dealing with cases of detained cargoes, the memorandum says:

His Majesty's Government remain convinced that, on an impartial review of the facts, it will be admitted that no arbitrary interference with American interests has, in regard to cotton cargoes, occurred; while if due regard be paid to the enormous volume of American and neutral shipping which is continually engaged in the trans-Atlantic trade, the figures and dates quoted in the preceding paragraph will emphasize the restricted nature of any interference which has taken place, and the close attention with which the officials concerned have adhered to their instructions to act in all cases with expedition and with every possible consideration for neutrals.

Special consideration was also accorded to cargoes of particular products destined for the United States, including dye-stuffs, potash and German beet seed; but when it became apparent that large quantities of "enemy goods" were still passing out through neutral countries the British Government felt justified in fixing a date after which such shipments could no longer enjoy special immunity. June 1 was fixed as the date on which such privilege should terminate, but this was afterwards extended to June 15. "American importers having now had three months in which to clear off their purchases in enemy territory, the British Government submits that sufficient latitude has been granted to all the interests concerned. A new appeal, however, has been made that shipments of American-owned goods of enemy origin, being paid for before beginning of March, should be allowed to be shipped without molestation after the 15th of June." Concerning this appeal the memorandum says:

In deference, however, to the renewed representations of the United States ambassador, his Majesty's Government have given further directions that in all such cases as may have been specially submitted through the British embassy at Washington or to his Majesty's Government direct on or before June 15 and passed, the goods shall be allowed to proceed without interference, if shipped from a neutral port on the conditions already laid down, notwithstanding the fact that shipment may not have been made before June 15.

His Majesty's Government will also be prepared hereafter to give special consideration to cases presented to them and involving particular hardships, if the goods concerned are required for neutral governments or municipalities, or in respect of works or public utility, and where payment can be shown to have been made before March 1, 1915.

With the above exception, his Majesty's Government regret they cannot continue to deal through the diplomatic channel with individual cases, but they would again point out that special provision is made for the consideration of such cases in the prize court.

A portion of the memorandum devoted to showing—by extracts from the prize court case of the steamship Ogeechee and so respect to a number of cargoes consisting chiefly of meat and lard—the causes of delay lie frequently with the claimants rather than with the court.

The concluding paragraph of the memorandum is as follows:

His Majesty's Government are extremely anxious of removing all causes of avoidable delay in dealing with American cargoes which may be detained, and any inquiries or representations which may be made by the United States Government in regard to particular cases will always receive the most careful consideration, and all information which can be afforded without prejudice to the proceedings will be readily communicated. They can scarcely admit that on the basis of actual facts any substantial grievance on the part of American citizens is justified or sustained, and they, therefore, continue to appeal to the opinion of the United States Government as enlightened by this memorandum.

UNFORTUNATELY the attitude of the United States and the American shippers have no cause for complaint. Nowhere in the entire communication is there the slightest intimation of any purpose to relax the rigid blockade, either at the present time or in the near future; nor will the restraint be modified to facilitate shipments to or through neutral ports goods destined to Germany, or to be in that country and destined for the United States. The memorandum makes none of the concessions specifically indicated as desirable in the American note.

LABOR'S VOICE FOR PEACE

ON JUNE 22 representatives of a number of national labor organizations met at the St. James Hotel, Washington, and laid plans for an extensive and aggressive campaign to stir up the hosts of American labor to a persistent demand for peace. Representative Frank Buchanan of Illinois was made president of the organization, and resolutions were adopted denouncing the present propaganda to increase the armament of the United States.

The conference also asserted that the manufacture of arms and ammunition should be made a government monopoly. It declared that as the patent rights on and the manufacture of arms, ammunition and the implements of war are in the hands of international combinations of capitalists who sell their products indiscriminately to the governments of the world and promote the sale of such products by arousing and encouraging feelings of national prejudice and jealousy and by employing periodical war scares in different countries, the government should take immediate steps to acquire all such patent rights, so as to prevent the sale of munitions of war to any belligerent power.

SAMUEL GOMPERS, president of the American Federation of Labor, took pains to say when questioned about the new organization that it was in no sense sponsored by the federation itself. Many labor leaders have been greatly disappointed that the machinery of the federation could not be moved to antagonize in some positive fashion the war spirit of America, and many lovers of peace outside the ranks of labor have been surprised and grieved to note the apathy on the part of some labor officials in the present crisis. The new organization will take up the task and endeavor to gain an expression of labor's real sentiment, which will be found to be for peace.

of man responds to nothing else so surely and holds to nothing else so steadfastly.

Examine the modern implements of destruction—rifles that kill at 4,400 yards, 15-inch guns that hurl projectiles fifteen miles, shells each warranted to burst into more than 100 pieces, aeroplanes that drop bombs on unsuspecting cities, death-dealing torpedoes that infest the seas, and poisonous gases that suffocate on land—these are some of the weapons which men are manufacturing to use against each other! This is war as we now have it, and yet those of our countrymen who see in force the only arbitrator of international disputes revel in the daily accounts of carnage and in the name of patriotism and national honor call upon this nation to prepare itself to enter the contest!

These men do not speak the mind or the conscience of the masses—they define national honor in terms that are becoming obsolete. They do not represent either the interests or the purposes of the American people.

I appeal to you to make your views known to the President that he may be strengthened against the insolent clamor of those who ridicule peaceful methods and, as if infuriated by the scent of blood, are bellowing for war. I appeal to you to cast your influence, not in favor of either side, but in favor of peace for the United States and against war with any of the belligerent nations.

The people of the United States are calm; they can afford to be patient. There is the rational honor of a peace-loving nation, not the false pride of the bully or the braggart. As friends, when they differ, postpone the settlement of their controversy until they can consider without feeling the points in dispute, so this nation can without dishonor refer its disputes to an international commission if diplomatic efforts fail, reserving, as our treaties do, the right of independent action when passions have cooled and when questions of fact have been separated from questions involving international right.

This policy contemplates no surrender of real rights; it is a policy worthy of the greatest republic of history. Our nation need not be ashamed to follow the wise advice given 3,000 years ago, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

When in 1902 the Stars and Stripes were hauled down on Morro Castle that the Cuban flag might be raised over the new republic the Cubans, having learned to love our flag, caught it up that its folds might not touch the ground. Inspiring spectacle and prophecy of the future! If others desire our flag to be feared let us prefer that it shall be loved. If others would tremble in awe at sight of it let us pray that the plain people everywhere may turn their faces toward it and thank God that it is the emblem of justice and the hope of peace.

These sentiments aroused the audience to repeated thunders of acclaim; often men and women were on their feet cheering, waving handkerchiefs and giving other expressions to their tense feelings. Proceeding, Mr. Bryan declared that none of the belligerents desires war with the United States: "It is an unintended harm they may have done us." Mr. Bryan did not mince matters in discussing the present issue with Germany. He reminded his audience that the principle of the thirty treaties now binding between the United States and that number of nations has been accepted by Germany and is therefore binding in spirit if not by letter upon our government; the principle, namely, of a year's investigation of any question between the signatory powers before steps are taken toward war. And as to the question which ought to come within the operation of that principle:

The question is not as to the right of American travel over the seas. But what man who loves his country desires to drag it into war by being careless? I stand for protection of a citizen's rights. If it is the duty of a widowed mother to die for his country, then it is the duty of another citizen who wishes to travel abroad to go by the same way.

He contrasted the patriotism of citizens who do not liberally endanger the peace of their country with that of those who would refuse to commit their country to war because of the indiscretion of some and he urged that if the question which has been thrust upon the government cannot be amicably settled with Germany now, it must be until the war ceases and reason and calmness have been restored. "These nations are our friends," he pleaded; "let us treat them all alike. If we cannot settle our differences now we will wait until the war is over."

Such were the sentiments endorsed by the great outpouring from the homes of New York and Brooklyn and Staten Island and New Jersey. The monster gathering for the most part remained set their seal to similar utterances by the speaker who followed Mr. Bryan. And the purpose of the epochal meeting crystallized in a set of resolutions which were adopted by acclaim and the substance of which is found in the above declarations.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

ENGLAND—AFTERWARDS

BY REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN

I THINK it was Mark Twain that said it: "In these modern days there is nothing easier than to prophesy." I should have added: "Until the fulfilment of the date concerning which the major prophet was prophesying." I am fully conscious of both Mr. Clemens's talent and my own modification. It is very easy for me to write—now—about this war is going to do to what I may call the identity of England. It may be so easy for me to prove my points when the war is over. Thereon I comfort myself with two reflections: so many is the present terrible conflict at anybody may be excused for guessing wrongly about the effects of it; and so likely will we all be when it is over that we shall not stop our rejoicings to ourselves at the wrong guesser. Nevertheless, it does seem to me that there are one or two profound changes in the world war is certain to effect in the social character of England, and this irrespective of whether the Allies or the Teutons win the struggle. I have lived in England for five years, my summer home is still in that country; I have studied the national life with some care; I have the advantage of an acquaintance more or less intimate with people of each of the three social classes; I have watched them and talked with them in times of peace and in this time of battle, and I think that I am fairly well qualified to speak with some assurance of the alteration which I cannot fail to see coming over them. Let me add to this paragraph introduction, that I shall confine myself to such matters as are already evident to me; that I shall speak not of any possible or impossible enlargement or shrinking of the imperial map, and that I shall not say reader suppose me biased—my own blood is as much English as German; my family American for over a hundred years; my sympathies with the Allies in these days such statements seem essential.

ROOTLETS OF THE NEW NATION

was dead belonged to the old, and those who remained were facing the new. The old sort of war was over, and in its stead had appeared a trade at which former formulæ were useless; the old England had passed away, and in its place stood a new England, whose face was as yet so closely veiled that we could not tell whether it was foul or fair.

It was from this date that Englishmen began to try to scan the features of their new England.

Perhaps I can best illustrate their mood by two stories: one of an incident at the front, the other of a no less important and significant incident in a silent Yorkshire countryside.

To a certain line of trenches in northern France there had been sent a small detachment of Lord Kitchener's New Army—only some forty or fifty picked men, who had shown themselves especially fit in the training camp "back home," and who were therefore made the envy of their fellows by being detailed to fill a gap in a veteran regiment at the front. They were Cockneys, mostly, with a military knowledge considerably less than five months old. One of them, 'Arry, was alone in a trench with a group of seasoned fellows, fresh from the Indian service and graduates of the Boer War; 'Arry had brought tobacco and a pipe with him from London, and he was generous with his possessions. Suddenly there was a loud explosion, and the trench was filled with the dust from a part of an exploding shell.

One of the regulars came up from that dust with his face ashen.

"Bill's dead!" he gasped. "He was standin' right by me, an' his head's shot off!"

But 'Arry's reply was nothing more than peevish.

"Arl rye," he said; "but where is 'is head? 'E was a-smokin' o' my pipe."

The war was too terrible for the fighter of the elder sort; but, true to the law of natural selection, the war has produced a sort of fighter fitted to wage it.

During the conflict between the English and the South African republics I was asked one day to take luncheon with an English family then living in New York. It was to be a quite informal affair; indeed, if my recollection serves me truly, I was to be the only guest. Just as I was about to leave my hotel, the head of the English family telephoned me.

"We got word only five minutes ago," he said, "that my wife's second cousin has been wounded. I'm dreadfully sorry, but of course we shall have to cancel that luncheon."

Early in January of this year I was invited to dine at the house of a neighbor in the North Riding of Yorkshire. This affair was elaborate; many invitations had been issued, and all the persons invited were there. As I greeted my hostess, I made the conventional and banal inquiry as to how she was feeling that evening. "Rather down," she said quietly.

"I got news this morning that my nephew had been killed at the front. He is the second of two sons to go."

Nevertheless, we were expected to proceed with the dinner, and if it was not an exceptionally merry one, at least it was not a funeral. There was only one subject that was barred, and that was the war. The sort of conflict that has produced the soldiers to wage it has produced the sort of women that can bear its losses.

NOW all this, I submit, has its inevitable effect on the national character. It changes the individuals, and the individuals in turn react upon the national mind as a whole. Eleven months ago, as the most ardent admirer of England will admit, that country stood in grave danger from industrial troubles, from a feminine revolt, from an Irish rebellion, from an upheaval no less momentous in party politics, and from religious troubles—any one of which threats would, in other times, have vexed statesmen and set half of the United Kingdom writing to the Times that the land was going to the dogs. Today those troubles are as if they had never been; and this is so, not so much because the war has united the country

RECRUITING. THE CALL TO THE COLORS RESOUNDS THROUGH THE LAND

FW months ago I stood, on a raw autumn day, in old St. Paul's Cathedral. Outside it was swathed in a pall of fog; the curtain rolled back to reveal the gleaming streets; along those streets, through the heart of the town, thousands of persons of every age and sex were waiting at the curb, huddled, shivering, silent, as a funeral procession passed. Inside there was another sort of crowd, yet a crowd stirred by the same emotion. Field marshals and admirals, among peers of the realm and leaders of both the government and the opposition, under the banners of a score of nations stood, as chief mourner, King of England and Emperor of India, while there was a silence to rest with Nelson and Lincoln the body of "Bobs" Laus and Kandahar. The present will ever cease to be as they sounded the trumpet over the little coffin of what remains on earth of Lord Roberts—Lord Roberts, who once warned the nation to heed, and whom the nation failed to heed. And none, I think, could fail to feel, as we stood about the grave of Lord Sleight, that this was the end of an era. The man that

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic and staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE greatly important event of the week closing June 24 was the fall of Lemberg on June 22.

The long, determined drive of the German-Austrian armies across Galicia, stubbornly opposed by the Russians, occupied the best of seven weeks, the Russian forces in that time falling back fully 150 miles. The German Emperor is reported to have taken supreme command of the campaign toward the close, with headquarters at Pless in Silesia, the direct advance upon Lemberg occupying about twenty days.

The fall of the capital of Galicia was in sight when the Germans captured Rawa Ruska, June 21. General von Mackensen was then able to seize the railway between that point and Lemberg, cutting off the Russian retreat northward. It was apparent that the Russians were also giving ground more rapidly.

Reports differ as to the final movements of both armies. On the one hand it is stated that the German-Austrian troops, after shelling the advanced Russian positions, swept into an emptied city and afterwards took up a vigorous pursuit of the fleeing Russians. On the other hand, advices from Petrograd declare that the Russians evacuated the city in good order, taking with them much of their artillery and ammunition. Eventually the exact facts, of course, will be known. But the five armies of the Dual Alliance are in possession of this very important Galician stronghold, and the Russians are retiring toward their frontier about fifty miles away.

Reports from Vienna give a good account of the final defense of the Russians. It goes without saying that one of the most terrific series of combats in the whole war has been taking place in this region. The reports that do not agree with those of an orderly retreat by the Russians declare that a great many prisoners were taken and stores of supplies and much artillery. No definite figures are given, but it would be contrary to the fortunes of war if a dreadful havoc of death was not visited upon both contending forces, and if the victors did not capture a great number of men and much valuable spoils.

Lemberg is an historic city and has long been a place of chief importance to the Polish nation. It is modern and well governed. One reason why its capture is important is that in Galicia are resources of oil and copper and also of iron now wrested from the Russians and made available to their enemies. This needs but to be mentioned to have its importance understood.

The Russians captured Lemberg September 3, and thence undertook to occupy permanently all of Galicia, capturing Przemyśl and almost reaching Cracow before the Austrians were able, by the help of their allies, to stay the invasion which now has been practically defeated. It seems reasonably certain that the Russians were lucky enough to save the bulk of their artillery, which they shipped to the eastward on the railroad running from Lemberg to Brody, and thence into Russia.

North of Lemberg the Austro-German forces are making rapid progress eastwardly, and their line now runs from Lemberg northeast to Zolance, and thence to Centurinka, both of which places are well to the east of Lemberg. Evidently this wing of their forces is to be hurried rapidly forward to Brody, where the Russians will probably make their last stand in northeastern Galicia. This portion of the victorious forces will probably move on Brezany and Tarnopol, in extreme eastern Galicia, and clear that portion of the province of the Muscovites, but this advance will probably be contested, as the Russian army operating in this terrain is in much better condition than the forces farther north.

It is doubtful whether there has ever been any greater drive in the history of war than the one the Austrians and Germans are now terminating in Galicia. It has certainly cost their opponents about a million men, the prisoners alone being about half that number, and an immense quantity of munitions of war, besides dealing a heavy blow to Russian military prestige. If followed up, as it appears it is more than possible it will be, it would seem as though it must result in Russia's assuming a very passive and innocuous rôle in the general campaign of interest will shift to central and south I an The strategic probabilities seem to point attack on the Warsaw-Ivangorod line sim ously from the west and from the south t Lublin.

It may be greatly doubted whether the T allies will transfer any forces from the either the west or to the campaign, until Warsaw va gorod, Kovno and Riga a cated by them, if such c ur be possible, since the tal these cities would make i poss ble to hold back Russia hea with a comparatively sma for of men.

Owing to the very broken and mountainous country along the Austro-Galician frontier, the Italian advance in Austrian territory is very slow and each foot of ground necessitates the overcoming of natural obstacles as well as the Austrian defense. Much of the fighting is taking place at altitudes ranging from 7,000 feet above the sea upwards, particularly on the western portion of the frontier, where the Austrians are trying to penetrate to the Trentino. In this portion of the field there have been skilful use of snow and on the ice of the glaciers. These conditions make progress very slow. In the Trieste, progress has been equally slow, as the advancing Italians have reached the main line of the outer defense of the city, and siege operations have become necessary.

The determined attempt to take the Austro-Hungarian line along the Isonzo River has been beyond the Italian front, was unsuccessful, according to reports from Berlin, though Rome despatches that the movement there as not yet undertaken in force.

The first month of Italian participation has turned out to their advantage. They have captured several strategic points, and appear to have placed themselves in a strong position all along their line of advance. The Austrians for their part have acted wholly on the defensive, but toward the close of the week reinforcements had come and offensive operations against the Italians may now be looked for.

On sea, the Italian campaign contrived a unique event to the history of war. Two submarines had a fight and one sank the other. It appears that the Italian, the Medusa, popped up her periscope and saw the coast was clear and emerged. It happened that an Austrian submarine was merged very near her, which saw nothing about, and which knew nothing about her. Hardly had the Medusa emerged when the Austrian, in turn, popped up her periscope, saw the coast was not clear and immediately retreated. Such a combination of circumstances may possibly never occur again in the history of submarine warfare.

The Germans have been making a concerted attack during the week on the British North Sea fishing travers, which Great Britain largely depends on for her supply of fish, a food which is more used in the British Isles than in America. A very considerable number of these boats have been sunk as a result, but otherwise submarine activities during the past week have not specially been noticeable.

The Zeppelin raid over the northeast coast of England on June 15, which at the time was reported to have killed six persons and injured forty besides starting some fires that were quickly quenched, is now out, according to later reports, which are either confirmed or denied by the British censors, to have been disastrous to the government navy yards and arsenal at South Shields. This is the location of the Armstrong shipbuilding yards and the ordnance works, 25,000 men being employed there. It is claimed that the damage done was enormous, the report being given out by the Overseas Agency by way of Christiania.

There seems to be no truth in the report that for several months to come, if not for the rest of the war. Unquestionably Russia has large numbers of men still uncalled, but these are not entitled to be called soldiers in any sense of the word, and even if they were, equipment, artillery and ammunition are sadly lacking.

These her own resources will not permit her to supply for a long time, and her facilities for obtaining them from neutral countries are greatly limited by the difficulties of transportation. Then, too, these obstacles once surmounted, the even more difficult question of the high command is to be solved. On the whole, Russia's future in this war looks none too rosy.

There was but little fighting in south Poland during the week ending June 24, which was also true of even the Warsaw line. In the north, however, there were a number of skirmishes of more or less warmth to the east of the military road from Augustowo to Kovno, and farther north there was some animation along the Dubysa River and in the region of Shavli. The Russians report that the Germans are strongly fortifying Libau, and bringing much heavy artillery to that city.

In another two weeks, when the Galician campaign has been fully completed and all the odds and ends have been gathered up, apparently the center

Serians have occupied Durazzo in Albania. It curious that there has been no sympathy by the general public with Albania and its people, when there has been of late so much talk about the rights of small nations.

The Dardanelles campaign is still lacking in detail and reliable news. Apparently the Allied position on land is not improving, the reason for which is that, owing to the danger from submarines, the fleet is unable to give the same degree of support to the land forces it was able to prior to the arrival of submarines in these waters. It would not be at all surprising if there were a temporary halt in these operations. This, in fact, is the most logical explanation which suggests itself of the absolute lack of news concerning these operations.

For the first time in quite a while the Transcaucasian campaign appears in the headlines. The Russians having been obliged to withdraw a large number of their troops in this region for use in Galicia, the Turks saw the opportunity and took advantage, with the result that there was rather hard fighting near Olti, and the Turks gained considerable ground.

The Turkish army operating here apparently to have been reinforced, and to a large degree at least re-equipped, and are possibly in the existing circumstances will make a strong effort towards the city, it will be remembered, not so very long ago belonged to the Ottoman Empire. In the western campaign the last week the French have continued to improve their position on both the western and eastern ends of the line. In the Vosges they have gained a very considerable amount of ground on both sides of the river Fecht, which gain for a good base from which to launch fresh attacks to the east. All told now the French hold some ninety towns in Alsace-Lorraine.

Late in the week the advantage in Alsace and at some other points on the western battle line turned to the Germans. Reports are too fragmentary to enable us to estimate the net gain or the net loss for either side. Doubtless these are fairly balanced, taking the western battle line as a whole, excepting for the action in the neighborhood of Arras, where the French appear to have made decided gains.

From Paris we have the report that ammunition was expended in a most prodigal manner in the two days' action about Souchez and Arras, upwards of 300,000 shells having been fired by the French. This action was accompanied by brilliant bayonet charges and the use of grenades. Eleven divisions of German troops comprising 220,000 men are said to have opposed the movement with heavy losses. The French made slow but continuous gains in this neighborhood.

Late reports state that the German salient, known as the Labyrinth, in the district between Neuville, Vassat and Ecurie, important and strong position, was taken by the French after continuous day and night fighting from May 30 to June 19. If this network of trenches and fortifications to the north of Arras has been taken and held, it is one of the most important of the series of actions on this section of the western line.

On the arrival at London of the Cunard steamer Cameronia, June 22, it was declared that the vessel had sighted a German submarine on June 21 off the mouth of the Mersey, evidently intending to torpedo her, and the captain made a swift effort to ram the submarine, which, however, escaped and failed to attack the steamer.

During the last week Mr. Lloyd-George, minister of munitions in the new cabinet, visited the industrial districts of England and Scotland, and gave warning to the workmen of those districts that in the event that within seven days from the 26th of June the production of these necessities was not very greatly increased, the government would find itself obliged to draft workmen for industrial purposes, using force if necessary. This is the most drastic stand on this very important subject that the British Government has taken during the war, and its outcome will be waited with considerable interest.

THE POPE'S INTERVIEW STIRS ALL EUROPE

ON JUNE 21 the Parisian journal, La Liberté, published a remarkable interview with Pope Benedict, signed by Louis Latapie, a member of its staff, who had been sent to Rome to ascertain the Pontiff's views on the prospects of the European war. The interview, which has been reproduced in other journals, took Europe by surprise. The Pope, referring to what the Vatican had done in respect to the war, had addressed the Catholic powers in support of peace; he had opposed a Christmas truce to the belligerents, and he had tried, with the hope of success, to get them to agree to an exchange of prisoners who were incapacitated for further military service. According to M. Latapie, and in reply to a request that he should express an opinion on the outrage perpetrated by the Pontiff said:

Sanct Accept Atrocity Reports Yet

"I desire that I condemn every crime specifically; but each of the accusations is accompanied by a declaration on the part of the Germans, and I am unable to institute here a conclusive discussion, nor can I make intigations at this moment."

"Is it necessary to inquire as to the neutrality of Belgium has been violated?" asked the correspondent.

"There was under the pontificate of St. N. the Pope replied.

"Is it not known by all that many prisoners have been taken as hostages in Belgium and in France, and shot?" the Pontiff was asked.

"I have received from Austrian officials the assurance that the Russians have also taken hostages among the Catholic priests," the Pope said, "and that the Russians on occasion pushed before them 1,500 living barrier thus exposed the bullets of the enemy. The bishop of Cremona has informed me that Italian priests have already taken refuge in Austria as hostages. There are so many excesses that I feel it is an admonition in my ears. It is permitted to no person, whatever motive, to violate jus-

"Latapie suggested that the Germans had committed other violations.

To this the Pope replied: "The cardinal secretary of state has received the representatives of seven Belgian congregations. They have declared that they are not able to cite a single case in their congregation, protected especially by the Virgin or by some saint. We continue to be imperfectly informed upon this subject."

"As to the burning of Louvain and the bombardment of churches?" the interviewer suggested.

"The Germans reply that their troops have been fired upon," said the Pope. "They have declared that there was an observatory in the tower of the cathedral at Rheims. With reference to Louvain, I have already given orders concerning it. We shall assist in restoring the cathedrals. Is there need to say that we condemn all such things? Every shot fired upon the cathedral of Rheims was felt in my heart." The Pope here struck his breast and added: "But the hour has not yet come to disentangle the truth from all the contradictory assertions which surround it. The Vatican is not a court. We do not give judgment. The Judge is on high."

"At least one can protest against the arrest of a prince of the church," persisted the correspondent.

"I shall surprise you; Cardinal Mercier (Archbishop of Malines) has never been arrested," replied the Pope. "He can go about his diocese as he pleases. I have received from General von Bissing, the governor of Belgium, a letter assuring me that he would repress hereafter with the utmost energy all acts of violence against churches and against ministers of God."

Charges Restriction of Papal Rights

THE Pope then referred to the sinking of the Lusitania, and is quoted by the correspondent as saying: "I do not know of a more frightful transaction. What grief to see in our generation such horrors! I have the heart of a father, and this heart has been torn. But what do you think of the blockade which constricts two empires, which condemns to famine millions of innocents? Is that inspired also by feelings entirely humane? I do not say that after the war I will not proclaim a syllabus, recalling and summing up the doctrines of the church on this subject and regulating for the future the rights and duties of belligerents. Then one will find without doubt the formal condemnation of crimes which will have been committed during the war."

The interviewer then referred to the effect of the war on the Vatican and inquired whether it might be considered that the Pope was free and unhindered in the exercise of his mission in the world.

"The state of war," was the Pope's reply, "puts these interests in danger. We are at the present time in an uncertain situation. I need a guarantee of the material security of my person and the artistic treasures which surround me. They took twenty of my guards, several officers, and others whom I cannot readily replace. I was promised freedom of correspondence, uncontrolled by the censor, but my secretary of state brought me this morning a letter from the Patriarch of Venice with the seals broken. At the Tribunal of Penitence, which deals only with private affairs concerning the faithful, who submit to us cases on individual conscience, several letters have been received opened. We no longer hear anything save the sound of the bell. Reports with nations enemy to Italy are suppressed. The representatives accredited to us have had to leave Rome. Our guarantees and our means are thus much weakened. We have faith in the present government, but we tremble to see ourselves exposed to the uncertainties of public life in Italy."

Rome a Furnace

"ROME is a furnace in perpetual ferment," he added. "Would you say it were absurd in these last days to fear a revolution? What will tomorrow bring? How would the people receive defeat? How would they behave in victory? Every movement of this people—the most impressionable of the earth—has its reflex here. And we feel ourselves less protected today. Do you now understand why we opposed with all our force the rupture of Italian neutrality?"

Here he closed his eyes for a moment as if in a dream. Then he said in deep tones: "The future is dark."

Asked if he expected to take any initiative to promote peace he answered: "The hour does not seem to me to have come. I should not act save with the fullest knowledge, lest

I weaken the moral authority which I hold of God and which I must employ to bring peace again among men. But I shall seek the opportunity; I shall seize the first hand outstretched."

Effect on the Public

IN ITALY especially the interview has caused a tremendous sensation and the statement is freely made that the Pope's expressions must have been misinterpreted. The Vatican organ, Osservatore Romano, is significantly silent, however. A cable despatch, dated Rome, June 25, says: "The Pope gave an audience to Cardinal Gasquet, who deplored the interview, protested against it and urged a retraction. A retraction is likewise demanded by the envoys of the Allies."

As a corollary of what has taken place, the Vatican is said to be seriously discussing the acceptance by the Pope of the invitation which the Spanish bishops have extended to him to transfer the papal establishment to Spain. This is not the first time that the question of change of papal domicile has been under consideration. The conditions imposed by the war would incline the Vatican authorities, possibly, to a favorable attitude toward the Spanish invitation. A famous Benedictine monastery at Einsiedeln, Canton of Schwitz, Switzerland, has been put in readiness for a possible visit from the Pope and his retinue, a temporary change which is said to be favored by the German and Austrian ministers at the Vatican. There is wide indignation in France over the interview.

As regards the accusation that the Italian Government improperly censored Vatican mail, the press of Rome prints what is declared to be an official repudiation of the charge, saying: "From the declaration of war Italy took care to apply scrupulously and with the fullest appreciation the law of guarantees which allows the Pope to correspond freely with bishops and every Catholic. Consequently, precise instructions were given to the censors of foreign mails in order that all letters to the Pope or for the Pope and the secretary of state of the Holy See might be immediately transmitted to their address. An order also was given to the censor in the war zone to pass freely correspondence directed to the Holy See or sent by it. The order was scrupulously applied."

THE CHURCH AND PEACE

BY REV. CHARLES EDWARD JEFFERSON, D.D.*

EVERYBODY seems to take it for granted that the Christian Church is committed to the principle of peace. The birth of Jesus was announced by angels singing of peace, and for 1900 years the Founder of the church has borne the title, "Prince of Peace." Men who know nothing else about the Christian religion know that it proclaims the fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man. The man in the street has forgotten much that he learned when a boy, but he remembers that Christ declared the first and great commandment to be, "Love God," and the second, "Love your neighbor as yourself." The outside world is quite perplexed then over the fact that the Christian Church has never been more zealous in the cause of peace. The longer one ponders the matter, the more mysterious it becomes that professing Christians have never in the mass taken a bold stand against war.

Wherever the Christian religion goes, it carries with it a book, in the first part of which there is a picture of a bonfire in which the paraphernalia of war is being consumed, and in the second part of which there is a picture of a beautiful city coming down from God out of heaven. Christians are expected to pray without ceasing: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven"—and it is difficult to see how the city of God can come down and rest upon a world covered with howitzers and lyddite shells. The foundations of the city which the New Testament promises flash like gems, and it is inconceivable that for gems we are permitted to substitute instruments of slaughter. It seems to be absurd for nations to keep praying, Thy kingdom come, when they go on coining their treasure into swords and guns. The world a long time ago accepted the test suggested by Jesus: "By their fruits ye shall know them," and the present generation insists on judging the church by what it is able to do.

For many years the question has been uppermost in the minds of thoughtful men, is the Christian religion practicable, or is it only a dazzling dream? Are the principles of Christ workable, or are they only the brilliant suggestions of a beautiful mind? Are his commandments binding on diplomats and rulers, or are they only poetic sentences to be memorized by Sunday school boys and girls? Is the Golden Rule for empires as well as for individuals? Are nations to forgive, or men only? Has the great commandment binding force upon statesmen, or are they privileged to act under a different law?

Where the Church Has Failed

These questions were often in men's minds during the last two decades of armed peace, and since the opening of the present war the questions have become more importunate and piercing. The questions now uppermost are: What has the church done? What good has it accomplished? What truths has it succeeded in writing on the mind of the world? It has claimed to be a divinely inspired teacher—what has it taught? It has professed to be the representative of God on earth. Has it faithfully represented him? Where is its promised power? Does it not stand impotent in the hour of the world's greatest need? If it was dowered with heavenly authority, why could it not hold Europe back from plunging into this abyss of blood and tears?

What shall we say in reply to all this? Let us first of all say frankly that the Church of Christ has been in large measure recreant to its trust. The church in all lands has failed lamentably to do its full duty. It has everywhere put emphasis on anise and cummin, and neglected the weightier matters of the law. It has squandered too much time on sacrifice, and forgotten that God's chief demand is mercy. It has spent too much of its energies on questions of ritual and sacraments and church government, and not given the great principle of love the place which Christ gave it. The pulpit has in no Christian land been faithful in proclaiming the great fact that God has made of one all the nations of the earth. Nowhere has it taught with fidelity and passion the new commandment: "Love one another as I have loved you."

The principle of union of church and state has worked disastrously in Christian history from the day it was first adopted under Constantine down to the present hour. Wherever it has been tried it has worked havoc with religion. Whenever the ministers of Christ become the salaried officials of the state, they subject themselves to a pressure which is not wholesome. There is forced upon them a conservatism which is hostile to progress, and they are in danger of being brought into subjection to ideals which are contrary to the ideals of Christ. Strong men, in isolated instances, have been able to withstand these influences, but the mass of the clergy have always been prone to defer too much to the ruling sentiment and policy of the state. A false distinction has been made between the secular and the sacred, and the minister of Christ has contented himself with preparing souls for the next world, while the ministers of state have gone on unhindered to rule men after their own will in this world.

In our own country our churches have also been remiss. Our ministers have not been gagged by entanglements with the state, but we have been dominated by an individualist gospel. Men who are averse to taking an interest in civic conditions are still less inclined to devote themselves to international affairs, and so the clergy of the United States have, on the whole, allowed the international problem to lie outside their province. It has been left for a handful of naval experts and the Navy League, and a few congressional hotheads, and a small company of jingo editors to determine what our naval policy shall be. Although there are thirty-three millions of confessed Christians in our country, it is doubtful if we should have squandered more money on battleships than we have, if we had all been infidels or Mohammedans or Apache Indians. The Church of Christ exerts, directly, only a feeble and fluctuating influence on the spirit and policy of our government.

The World's Rebuke

If the attitude of the church toward armed peace was such as to provoke contempt among large numbers of forward-looking men, this contempt broke into open derision when, last August, the great war began. At once a fierce cry of condemnation of the church went up around the world. All the enemies of the church lifted up their voices together. The skeptic uttered his gibe and the infidel got in his jeer. Lukewarm friends of the church stood off at a greater distance, and all believers whose faith had been weak felt the foundations quivering beneath them. Men who had been on the edge of unbelief were pushed over, and men in whose minds the ferment of doubt had been at work suddenly reached final conclusions, and their decision was rendered against the church. There was no end to the sarcastic questions: "Is this Christianity? Is this the outcome of Christian teaching? Is this the best that the Church of Christ can do?" An English novelist expressed the feeling of many hearts when he wrote in an American magazine: "... God on the lips of each potentate, and under three hundred thousand spires prayer that twenty-two million servants of Christ may receive from God the blessed strength to tear and blow each other to pieces, to ravage and burn, to wrench husbands from wives, fathers from their children, to starve the poor, and everywhere destroy the works of the spirit. No creed—in these days when two and two are put together—can stand against such reeling subversion of the foundation."

Wholesale condemnations are always wrong. Extreme declarations have to be retracted. The church is by no means perfect, but we must deal with her fairly. She has not done everything, but we must give her credit for what she has done. She is without doubt a sinner, but we must, if truly Christian, be the friend of publicans and sinners. We are not to condone her sin, or try to cover up her sin, but we are not to gloat over her sin, and by our refusal to give sympathy or assistance push her down into still deeper sin. The church, like the home and the state, has never done all that she could, and for the same reason. All three institutions are heavily weighted with human nature. All three are made out of the dust of the earth, and when institutions are built out of imperfect human beings, you cannot expect that their conduct shall be ideal. They will fall short at a hundred points, but since God is patient with them, we must be patient too. We do not make things better by trampling on the home, or by abolishing the church. With all their defects and blunderings, we get on without them. Neither can we get on without the church.

When men ask what the church has done, they reply that it has so sensitized the heart that it cries out in horror at spectacles which centuries ago excited no comment. There are now nations of human beings who cannot think of war without a shudder, and every new tale of barbarism only deepens in them a spirit of indignant protest which will some day burn up the abomination.

It is this growing spirit of implacable opposition to war-makers and their trade which renders the abolition of war absolutely certain. The time is coming when men will not endure it. It is the shudder of the Christian heart which will by and by shatter the apparatus of war to pieces.

But while we may freely confess that our Christianity has not met its responsibilities, it deserves stern reprimand and censure, we must be careful how far we allow ourselves or others to go in passing condemnation on the Christian religion. The religion of Jesus must be distinguished from the organization which acts as its custodian. The Christian religion is a heavenly treasure which it is carried in an earthen vessel, and while the vessel develops flaws, it does not follow that the treasure itself is faulty. We must never identify Christianity with so-called Christian civilization. Because Christian nations go astray, it does not follow that Christ himself has failed us. There are no Christian nations. There is no Christian civilization. No civilization has ever been human in the sense that it has been dominated by the spirit of Christ. Christian civilization, therefore, may fail, while the religion of Jesus remains undiscredited. The so-called Christian nations are not built on Christian principles, nor are their policies worked out with an eye single to the commands of Christ.

The Church Still Looked to to Lead

The church is now going to lead in a war against war. Men are everywhere saying: "This is the last war." Men can make it the last war, they will. The church could have ended war long ago. She did not do it. Let us hope that she will put her hand to the plow, and never again look back. This is the opportunity which God gives the church to prove that she possesses a mission from heaven. There have been three historic scourges: famine, pestilence and war. The first two have been slain by science. The last one science cannot kill. War can be abolished only by love. Science has no control of the heart. To create and nourish the spirit of love is the church's distinctive mission. Other demons have been cast out by lower methods, but war, the chief of the world's devils, can be exorcised only by love. In the name of Christ, the church is going to set the world free.

In this work the church has the assistance of numerous agencies and forces which it has created to hasten the accomplishment of its great task. Many hearts are appalled by the enormity and the number of forces arrayed against it. When they see the racial antagonisms, and the national hatreds, and the commercial rivalries, and the mighty hierarchy of army and naval officials, proud of their titles and eager to enhance the glory of the great establishment they serve, and the vast company of war traders, whose profits depend on swollen budgets for the paraphernalia of war, and the vociferous and unscrupulous host of editors and statesmen, and the great crowd of narrow-minded and selfish-hearted citizens who patriotism is perverted and whose ideals of war are barbaric, their heart faints within them, and they cry out in discouragement: Who is to lead for these things?

But the forces which are with us are more than those which are against us. We have the aid of all hundreds of thousands of Christian men, well educated and set apart as leaders in their congregations. These men have access to the hearts of millions of boys and girls, and by them be trained to abhor war. They have, in their possession, the ideals of the perfect man, the matchless words of One who spake as man spake, and every word is a form of power.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

Fainting

SUNDAY, July 11. Luke 18: 1. "Men ought always to pray, and not to faint." Suppose we turn the counsel into a promise: "Men ought always to pray, and they will not faint." When a man faints in the day of adversity it is because a line of communication has somehow been cut, and he is lost touch with his base of supplies. He has become separated from his spiritual resources, and in the heavy demands of the campaign he has begun to lose heart. The heart retains its hope and courage as long as new forces and new supplies arrive. It is not the growing strength of the enemy, nor the increasing exactions of duty which make the heart succumb; it is the lessening of its supplies. When the spiritual lines of communication are kept open the strenuousness of our engagements does not matter: "though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear." That open line always means a defeated foe. The heart sings in the battle, for it is always more than even with the most tremendous task.

Not it is prayer which keeps open the road between the soul and its resources. That great line of communication is kept clear like a splendid highway, and the sacred transports are arriving every moment in an all-availing sufficiency. The supplies are coming; prayer opens the way and receives them. It is not left to our judgment to determine what we need. God's loving wisdom interprets the need. It is our part to open our souls to the grace and bounty of an infinite God, and the necessities are supplied. Prayer is a minister of the open road, and prayer is a minister of reception.

When we cease to pray the open highway is locked and closed. The waiting supplies cannot reach us; they cannot get past our spiritual forgetfulness and indifference. And so the big duty awaits us; the strong enemy affrights us. We become faint, and the battle goes against us. And all the while the resource which would meet our necessity is awaiting our honest call! Let us restore communication by recovering our communion. Let us pray without ceasing! Let us keep the roads open, and our gracious God will see to the transports.

Our Mission to Comfort the Afflicted

TODAY, July 12. Isaiah 40: 1-11. "Comfort ye, ye who comfort ye, my people." The prophet was not on a mission of comfort. But he had to relieve before he could impart. The apostle put this simply when he said: "God comforteth in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith ourselves are comforted of God."

The world is full of comfortless hearts. Orphan children are crying in the night. God pities infinitely but he cannot stay the progress of these fearful years, until the mystery of iniquity is finished. In the meanwhile he desires to assuage the grief of the world by his children who are being trained for this holy duty. Our own experiences in some of the hospital wards where we are being taught the divine art of comfort.

Is not this a clue to the inexplicable mysteries of our disappointments, our unanswered prayers, our trials and persecutions? Do you wonder why we should be called to pass through this special sorrow? Wait till ten years have passed, and you will find that during those years some will need help and consolation, whose experiences will be precisely similar to what yours are. When you will unfold your tale, produce your assertions and anodynes, and show the way by which you were led from the dark cellar up into the sunny air. Above all, bring men into the presence of the divine Comforter—the Holy Spirit!

The Danger of Hesitation

TUESDAY, July 13. Obadiah 1-11. "In the day that the strangers carried away captive his vessels, and foreigners entered into his gates, and he stood upon Jerusalem, even thou wast as one of them." The children of Edom, who had with Israel common ancestry, receive from the old prophet scathing rebuke for not standing with Jacob against the foes of Jerusalem. By standing on the other side, Obadiah would say, even though you took no active part against Jacob, you were really on the side of the enemy. It is a temptation to be a neutral religion, to stand on the other side and see what which is going to do; to remain silent when we ought to speak to defend a friend or some one who you know is being wronged; these are the sins of silence, they place us on the "other side." There are times in such great international conflicts as the world has known of late when neutrality is a desirable trait; but there are other moments, in our personal lives especially, when a neutral position means being with the enemy.

Religious neutrality is often a more dangerous enemy to religion and the church than out-and-out positive evil. An open enemy is often preferable to a negative friend. The wrecks of men that we sometimes see floating down the side streets of a great city are the marks of indecision, of the failure often to line up strongly with good causes and good people; they began by being religious neutrals, standing on "the other side."

Robert Browning tells in one of his poems of two persons who were kept from committing a sin simply because of the inability to take a decided step, and these represented a most pitiable pair, like the "unlit lamp and the ungirt loin"—persons lost in irresolution.

Today there comes to all of us, in some question, small or great, the day of decision. Which side shall we take? "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve!"

When Jesus Comes to Our Side

WEDNESDAY, July 14. John 9: 26-41. "Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and finding him." Finding him! Then there was a distinct effort to find. Notice the individual interest our Saviour took in cases like this. Beneath the unpromising exterior of this blind beggar, he had recognized the elements of a noble character. He knew that the whole manhood within, like the enchanted palace of fairy-story, was only waiting for the challenge of one worthy to claim its loyalty; and because he was worth saving, Jesus found him. He prized not what he was, but what he was capable of becoming.

His parents had disowned him, and the Pharisees had cast him out of their synagogue, depriving him of a highly prized privilege; but Jesus found him. He had been cast out himself, and knew the weariness of suspense, the pain of excommunication. The clue to the discovery of this man was supplied from his own heart, and so he found him. He knew just where he was, and how he got there, and how he needed sympathy and love; and so with unerring accuracy he came just to the spot and at the moment. So it is with you! You have been misunderstood, criticized, and excommunicated; your kith and kin have turned against you; but Jesus steals to your side. He is never so near us as when we feel most lonely. Reach out your hand; he is there, close beside and bending over you. His eyes behold your possibilities, and his hand will enable you to realize them all.

THURSDAY, July 15. I Corinthians 10: 13. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." This text assures us that we are not fighting alone against our special weakness of character, and that there will be furnished by God, who loves us, victory over our most troublesome and besetting sin. Temptation reveals us to ourselves; it shows us what we are, what strength we have, what hold we possess on God. It is not a sin to be tempted; but sin begins immediately when we fail to resist it. It is in the first intimation of our temptation that victory or defeat is registered. A wrong suggestion, like a small leak in a boat, must be stopped at once. There is no safety in compromise, no security if we delay. We must meet our temptation at the door; let it not get into the house.

We know a man who, when tempted with his special form of temptation, immediately arouses himself and begins action along some other line. Once we met him almost on the run coming down the street to get into the company of a friend. He knew that his only chance was prompt, immediate action and decision in another direction from that of his wrong inclination. To hesitate is to lose, morally as well as in other matters—

Check the beginnings; once thou mightst have cured;
But now it is past thy skill, too long hath it endured.

It is wonderful how, especially in the early moments of our fight against our sin, God helps us by showing a way of escape. We do not have to fight alone. The words of the old prophet are made true to us: "The battle is not yours, but God's."

The Clean White Garments of Purity

FRIDAY, July 16. Colossians 3: 12; 4: 1. "Put on therefore, as God's elect." Throughout these paragraphs the apostle is pursuing the suggestions of a noble comparison. He has been considering the implications of baptism, administered as burial in water, according to 2: 12. For this rite, it was necessary for the candidate to divest himself of his clothes, and according to the ancient rubric, other clothes would be awaiting him at its close. Indeed, the word candidate is derived from a Latin word, reminiscent of the white in which the disciple was arrayed.

The apostle prosecutes that figure. He says that if a man is united with the living Christ, it is as though he were buried with him in the garden tomb. He is interred not in water, nor in earth, but in a conformity of spirit and taste to Christ's, so that he has passed out of the kingdom of Satan and worldly lust and self-indulgence, and has arisen with Christ into a new Easter. There are many garments, which he lays aside. These discarded clothes, which are piled up in a forbidding heap, and left forever, are held up and enumerated one by one in verse 8. These are forever put off, but others must be put on; and these are enumerated here, whilst the girdle round them all is mentioned in 14.

We are God's elect. We must walk worthy of God, and as we are careful not to leave our room in the morning if one article is missing, so we must not forego one Christian grace.

A Call to Trial and Suffering

SATURDAY, July 17. John 14: 31. "Arise; let us go hence." The disciples had left all and followed Jesus through the three years of his ministry. With delight even to ecstasy they listened to his wonderful words in the upper room, before the Holy Communion supper. Christ, seeing that the hour of all history was drawing near, when he was to grapple with sin, hell, death and the grave, gives his command to his disciples, saying, "Arise, let us go hence." How did the twelve meet that call? Poor, weak humanity fell asleep during the Master's agony in Gethsemane. He aroused them with the pitiful, plaintive cry of aloneness, saying, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?"

The next going was to the midnight trial, when they followed him afar off, and then, up Calvary's summit, they forsook him and fled. Do we do better than Christ's apostles, when he calls us to suffer with him in the garden of trial, or to be crucified with him in the full surrender and death of sin? Do we, his volunteers, obey his marching orders when the battles of peace are to be fought and the prisoners of hope to be taken?

The disciples rallied at Pentecost, put on the whole armor, went forth empowered by the divine baptism to win the world for their King. Shall we not arise and follow our Leader to victory?

They have an opportunity given to no other class of men to mold the spirit of the coming generation, and they are going to do it. But other organizations are on our side, and other men, not Christians, are with us. The Jews are with us. Philanthropists of all kinds are with us, and so are the artists, and the scholars, and so are the mighty forces of education and commerce and finance and industry. The wage earners of the world are with us. Fatherhood and motherhood are with us. Womanhood is with us. All the noblest instincts of the human heart cry out, trumpet-tongued, against the settlement of international disputes by human slaughter. All the best men are with us, in every land, and all the best women, and all the little children. With such cohorts on our side, how is it possible to suffer defeat? All that is needed is that the church shall lead. And the best of all is that God is with us. His Spirit is on our side. The universe is fighting against the men who believe in and produce war. The stars in their courses fight for us. If the God of the New Testament is the God who rules this world, then every sword shall some day be sheathed, and nations shall make war no more.

The Jews and Palestine

UNUSUAL interest attaches to the Zionist Congress which assembled in Boston on June 27. Within a decade Zionism has taken on new life, and the problem of the future control of the Holy Land is one which attracts increasing attention as the great war progresses. Once a movement which was regarded as largely sentimental, Zionism has now enlisted the practical interest and support of Jews throughout the world, and nowhere more than in the United States. Through all the centuries since the dispersion the Hebrew race has looked forward to the time when they would again become masters of the ancient soil, and create a Jewish state with the City of David as its capital. Now the time has apparently arrived when the dream may take on the form of reality, and when plans may be discussed looking to the establishment of a Jewish political and religious state. It is significant that the first step toward world organization of the race for this purpose should be taken in America. Indeed, the sinews of the movement are largely American. Many American Jews are already owners of extensive tracts of territory in Palestine, which they have redeemed from aridity and so developed that what was a few years ago almost a treeless desert is now a region of thrifty orchards and waving grain fields. From the Mediterranean to the Euphrates there has been development in transportation lines, banks and a variety of productive industries and business concerns. American Jews, co-operating with their brethren elsewhere, have carried their enterprises from the shores of the Mediterranean far inland, looking in faith to the coming of a time when the land would be the permanent possession of their race.

Of the more than thirteen million Hebrews now scattered throughout the world, comparatively few are wealthy; yet there is probably no other race in existence that can command such vast resources in the aggregate. Every nation has its wealthy Jews, our own probably most of all. Even should their hopes regarding the Holy Land be realized, there will be no formidable exodus from the United States to Palestine, which is but a small country and one that could not support half of the Jewish race now living. But there are thousands of the race in Russia and scattered throughout Europe and Asia who could be colonized there to advantage, the work being supported by compatriots here and elsewhere until it reached the self-sustaining point. But the dream of the Jew goes much farther. He looks forward to the time when the ancient glories of Jerusalem are to be restored—when it will become a world-center of religion, statesmanship and influence, enjoying the friendship and co-operation of all the races. To the Jew, therefore, there is a colossal stake at issue. It may mean to him the actual fulfillment of the prophecy for which the race has prayed and which it has never forgotten; the hope that inspired the exiles in Babylon to sing the strain that is on the lips of every Jewish wanderer: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."

Back Again in the Fold

TWENTY years ago Benjamin Fay Mills was one of the best known and most successful evangelists in America. Under his ministrations many were drawn into the church; his sincerity and activity were something remarkable and the genuineness of his work was unquestioned. The son of a well-known pastor, he was carefully trained and in due time was ordained to the ministry. For ten years he was a successful pastor. He spent twelve years in interdenominational evangelism; then, to the surprise of all who knew him, it was announced that he had quitted the orthodox church forever. Now he has returned to the old fold and the old faith, and in a public statement, which has been sent to the Christian Herald, he gives his experience and the reasons of his return.

His story carries a lesson as illustrating how a sincere man of high intellectuality and possessed with the earnest desire to do service in his day and generation, took the wrong road at a critical time and found himself headed for the spiritual wilderness. "I devoted myself to study, meditation and prayer," he writes, "that I might discover an essential, simple, practical and universal rule of life, which, if obeyed, would solve all men's individual and social problems." He sought to realize absolute trust as the fixed attitude of mind, and perfect love as the unvarying practice of life. His motto was, "What is the loving thing to do?" His definition of religion was, "That fine sense of soul which connects the individual with universal purpose." His idea was to preach "the Gospel for an age of unrest." He sought his illustrations in the ancient and modern sages and the Scriptures. He found willing audiences. But there came a time when he perceived that there was something lacking in his ministry—something very vital, without which there could not be a genuine Gospel. All that he aimed to teach, he now began to understand, could be perfectly and inspiringly stated in the Christian phraseology. Without Christ his new gospel was incomplete. In a word, a Christless Christianity was an impossibility!

He had been traveling in a circle all these years, and now he writes: "In a most remarkable fashion we have been led to a full acceptance of the essential and complete revelation of God, only in Christ." He saw the world shaken as if by earthquake, and Christendom trembling in the balance. He saw society honeycombed by greed, selfishness, corruption; he saw the increase of crime and vice, the laxity of the marriage tie, the moral wreckage of homes, the growing disregard of religion. He felt, more than he had ever felt, the need of a real Gospel, a real Saviour and a real salvation, to be proclaimed to a sinful world. To this work he now devotes the rest of his life. The veil has been removed from his vision and, like Paul on the road to Damascus, he has seen the light and heard the voice that points to the path of duty.

Those who remember the power and eloquence of Mr. Mills in the old days will be gratified to learn of his restoration. "To err is human; to forgive, divine." May his experience be the means of leading many others out of the wilderness into the clear light of the Gospel. And may the last years of his labors be soul-satisfying and abundantly fruitful.

A Matter of Conscience

THE state of Georgia has just passed through an exciting experience. Following the commutation by Governor Slaton of the death sentence of Leo Frank, accused of murder, the governor's country estate near Atlanta was for several days under a strong military guard to protect him from the mob. Now, however, the tumult has died down and the people of the state have begun to see that their executive acted in accordance with his sense of justice in doing what he did. In his farewell address to the Georgia legislature at Atlanta on June 23, there is a passage which, while the governor did not refer directly to the Frank case, must be construed as spoken in justification of the course he pursued. "While many of the duties have been arduous and unpleasant," he said, "especially so because their performance involves misunderstandings, I have acted according to my conscience and solely with the view of complying with the mandates of the constitution of the state." One of the leading papers, the Atlanta Georgian, sheds this light on the case: "The governor studied painstakingly, carefully and exhaustingly, the records in this case. In his remarkable statement setting forth his reason for extending clemency to Leo Frank, the governor enters minutely into details. He admits that suspicion did fall on Frank, but he found, nevertheless, that there was, as he viewed matters, a sufficient doubt of Frank's guilt to warrant modification of the death sentence. Had he desired to proceed along the line of least resistance and to do the easy thing rather than the big and manly thing, he might have resisted his conscience and let the defendant go to his death upon the scaffold; but the governor could not in good conscience do that. He believed that Frank was entitled to the doubt which the executive mind honestly entertained, and he gave it to him. He ought to have done this, and the people of Georgia ought to sustain him for doing so courageous a thing."

Sober second thought will probably bring the great majority of Georgians to the same conclusion. Had Governor Slaton done otherwise, he would have been unfit to wield the power entrusted to him. He did his duty as he saw it, without weighing the political consequences. Georgians themselves are now recalling the fact that the principal point of the evidence against Frank rested upon an identification which was afterward admitted to have been a mistake, and it was this discredited evidence which was at the bottom of all the public feeling against the governor. Now, however, after due reflection it is coming to be admitted even by his severest critics that Governor Slaton could not have acted with a clear conscience and performed his duty faithfully as he saw it under the constitution of the state, if he had acted otherwise than as he did.

The Right Note in Advertising Reform

THERE was sound common sense as well as a practical business philosophy in the addresses that were delivered at the Convention of Associated Advertising Clubs in Chicago lately. For a long time past the opposition to dishonest advertising has been steadily rising. Strong and able journals have begun to create a new and healthier attitude between advertisers and the public, by excluding from their columns all that savored of doubt, exaggeration or misrepresentation. Others joined them in the effort to promote honesty and efficiency in advertising and by degrees the public, awakening to the importance of the campaign, began to see the advantages of a system that would tolerate no humbug, fraud or fake either in the advertising or in the pages, and which gave to its patrons the assurance of clean, honest business. The Chicago convention, the eleventh of its kind, has done well in formulating a platform suited to the spirit of the time, and in going squarely before the American public as the uncompromising foe of advertising frauds and humbugs.

Advertising is no longer regarded as a mercenary calling, in which craft and skill combined, to often unscrupulously, to bring results. It has risen to the dignity of a profession that calls for the exercise not only of the best literary talents but of rare judgment, and a conscientious desire to reach the highest attainable point in performance, all with a strict regard to absolute truth and honesty. The time is coming, if indeed it is not already come, when broad-gauge, vulgar distortions loaded with superlatives and designed solely to humbug the public, must be cast into the discard with other obsolete souvenirs of the same class. The Christian Herald, which has long been in the fighting line for clean journalism and honest advertising, congratulates the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World on their splendid campaign. It will be equally good for morals and for business. Their club motto is "Truth," which includes everything. They have struck the right note at a given character and impulse to a reform that cannot fail to command popular support and approval.

The Soul-Winner's Joy

ONE of the most wonderful and enlightening experiences of the Christian life is that which comes to the believer when he discovers that he has reached the point where he can say with Paul that "none of us liveth by himself." He begins to comprehend the true meaning of service and to seek for opportunities to spend himself for others. To some the desire for soul-winning comes early, to others later in life, but all who have the love of Christ in their hearts come soon or late. "Heaven's gates open with reluctance to him who comes alone," says a writer; "but whoso bringeth another with him whom he hath won from sin and brought to the Cross for forgiveness, finds the portals wide open with a welcome entrance." What glorious encouragement there is here for Christian workers! What joy to know that you have been the means of leading a soul to Christ! By kind words, sympathy, by the influence of example and by direct appeal, we should endeavor to reach the hearts of those whom we meet in our daily lives and lead them to the Saviour. There are opportunities calling us upon every side; all around are souls that need to be led into the light. This is a spiritual work for each of us, even the humblest. And if we do our duty with the earnestness of love and simple devotion to our Master, he will reward our faith with all the power needed for accomplishment. Every new soul will increase the power and multiply the efficiency. There are many blessings such as the work of the Holy Spirit, the peace of God, the joy that attend the Christian life, but the highest, richest of them all is that which comes to the soul-winner. "And they that turn to righteousness shall shine as the stars in heaven."

Rescues Child; Pockets Picked

RESCUING a small boy from drowning in Harlem Lake, Central Park, New York, the other evening, Maurice Mazur, of Malden, Mass., hit his head on the bottom and cut his scalp. He was not so badly injured, however, as to prevent his bringing the boy alive to the shore. To leave his arms free to swim he had thrown his coat off on the bank. On his return to the shore with the boy he found that some one had rifled his pockets and taken every penny he had and he found himself in a strange city without a cent. While sin is sin, and theft is theft, there are sins and pilferings that, humanly speaking, are meaner in their degree than the rest. To pick the pockets of a man while he is saving the life of a child is well nigh the limit of meanness. There is too often ingratitude and injustice to the rescuer and hero, the savior of the bodies of men and also too often is recognition withheld from the men and women who devote their lives to the rescue of perishing souls. Unjust criticism and harsh treatment, the piling of burdens upon her which are grievous, are all aggravated by the taking of money from the clothes of the hero. The average starvation salary of ministers of all denominations, less than $700 a year, and of other men and women engaged in spiritual work, is an injustice not much lighter than that of going through the pockets of the hero in the act of rescuing life. The injustice may not be intentional, but it is about as cruel as though we mean as it is to rob a rescuer or hero, risking life to save others, there is an act which is meaner still, and through the sin of the prophet we have his question and its answer: Who can rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. (Mal. 3: 8.)

$50 Gold Piece

THE first $50 gold piece ever authorized by Congress was struck by the mint at San Francisco the other day, and bought by present Charles C. Moore of the Panama-Pacific Exposition for $100. The new coin commemorates the exposition. On its obverse is stamped the head of a lion and on the reverse two eagles, emblematic of the meeting of two oceans through the Panama Canal. Twenty-five thousand of the so-called "exposition dollars" ranging down to half-dollars, will be struck off and offered for sale at double their value in the history of the world. Precious substances were used as medium of exchange in commercial transactions, such as leather, stone or metal of one kind or another. Hence this mention of one of the metal coins: Whose image and superscription thou? They answered and said, Caesar's. And he said unto them, Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. (Luke 20: 24, 25.)

A Fortunate Nationalism

THERE is no Swiss race. There is no Swiss language. The people of Switzerland are German, French or Italian in race and language. But patriotism they are all Swiss. Of the twenty-two cantons, fifteen are German, five are French and two are Italian. Yet there is absolute national unity. Switzerland stands solidly and harmoniously. The German Swiss of Schaffhausen are not for Germany; the French Swiss of Geneva are not for France; the Italian Swiss of Ticino are not for Italy; and this in spite of the fact that these outlying cantons are almost surrounded by Germany, France and Italy, respectively. Racial ties and ties of language are very strong but the ties of patriotism are stronger. Everywhere in the United States English, Irish, Scotch Welsh, Italian, French, Russian, German,

Scandinavian people. They love their fatherland, and are to be honored for doing so, but they are all Americans, genuine Americans, with means and life ready to support their adopted country. It is this superb American nationalism that is our pride and hope. It will make war at this time well-nigh an impossibility. Because these true men love their fatherland so much and the land of their adoption still more, they demand and seek to maintain peace and justice. This patriotism is thus expressed: "For he loveth our nation." (Luke 7: 5.)

Plan Episcopal Religious Revivals

THE Protestant Episcopalians are planning to enter the revival field. Upon the authority of their general convention a committee has just issued a call for what is called a "preaching mission." This mission is to start at once and to culminate

CHILDREN'S GO-TO-CHURCH BAND AT WORCESTER, MASS.

THE systematic, constant attendance upon church services on Sunday on the part of the children is the object of the Go-to-Church Bands. There are 238 such bands scattered through thirty-one states, in seven denominations, with over eighteen thousand members, who are learning regular church-going. One of the most successful of these bands is connected with the Central Church of Worcester, Mass. That band has been in active existence for five and one-half years, and for two terms of four months each year its members strive to be present at preaching service at least once each Sunday. There is a sad and vital failure in our day among many to magnify the essential fact that children must be related vitally to the church, the divinely ordained institution for salvation, and that the attendance of the children at church on Sunday is as necessary to the life and growth of society as it is to the spiritual life and growth of the children themselves. No word has been coined strong enough to express the glorious work the Sunday school has done in training and saving the children, and in building up the church, and yet wherever it is allowed to become the rival or substitute for the Sunday church worship, it is not only not a blessing, but a positive damage to the Lord's cause. If the Sunday school be in the morning, for the children to line out of the Sunday schoolroom and go home, almost none staying to preaching service; or if the hour be noon, for the children to cut the church worship and hang around the Sunday school door at twelve for its services to begin is a parody and mockery on the mission and work of the true church. For the young people of the Christian Endeavor, Epworth League or other societies to have their meeting an hour before preaching service at night and then scatter from the church, deserting the regular service, will blight rather than bless any society. There are some exceptions where the dear children attend Sunday worship and the pastors pay especial attention to them. But the lack of the children in the majority of churches on Sunday morning is appalling, and must be remedied or enormous damage will be done to the Lord's kingdom. The children and the older people of the church should take up this exclamation: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord." (Ps. 122: 1.)

in the fortnight beginning November 28 next. The call urges the formation of committees in all large cities to perfect details. Those behind the plan include Bishops Greer of Norfolk, Burton of Lexington and Weller of Fond-du-Lac, the Rev. Doctors Ernest M. Stires of St. Thomas's Church, New York; Floyd W. Tomkins of Philadelphia, and E. F. Miel of Hartford. This plan of revival services is in keeping with the deep spiritual awakening which seems to be stirring the whole nation. The Episcopal Church has wealth and social station, and yet in a number of cities it is truly democratic and thoroughly evangelical in its mission and settlement work. All will join with the Episcopalians and other churches in this prayer: "O Lord, revive thy work!" (Hab. 3: 2.)

Commencement at Y. M. C. A. College

COMMENCEMENT WEEK at the Young Men's Christian Association College at Springfield, Mass., closed in June with graduating exercises at which fifty-two young men were awarded degrees and sent out to become association secretaries, physical directors and boys' workers in widely scattered parts of the world. The final day was marked by another event of the greatest importance to the college—the launching of the five-year program, drawn up by the president, L. L. Doggett. This includes the extension of the course from three to four years, with a corresponding increase in faculty and equipment and a campaign for raising $1,000,000 with which to buy the equipment and increase the endowment of the college. During the graduating exercises Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick of Montclair, N. J., urged the men to regard their Christian service never as a burden of duty, but a privilege. The final event was the commencement dinner in the evening, at which Dean Frank Newell Seeley was honored for his twenty-five years' service at the college. An address was given at the dinner by one of the alumni, J. Henry Gray, '06, on his important work as physical director for the Young Men's Christian Association and the government in India. The secretaries of the Young Men's Christian Association and the workers with them are a splendid class of men, with intellectual ability, moral stamina and spiritual power. Such an institution as the college at Springfield is a wise provision for technical training in a work so important to young men and the Lord's kingdom. The wonderful success of the Y. M. C. A. movement in the United States and the world verifies the words of the wise man: "The glory of young men is their strength." (Prov. 20: 29.)

Trusted Prisoner Escapes

THE theory of prison reform by love for and faith in the criminal, so enthusiastically advocated and earnestly practiced by the warden of Sing Sing Penitentiary in New York, received quite a setback the other night when Frederick Spence, a long-term man, imprisoned for complicity in murder, took advantage of the trust reposed in him and made his escape. As yet he has not been captured. Spence occupied a position of honor and trust in the Mutual Welfare League of Prisoners. Left to clean up the hall after the nightly picture show, he pried apart some bars and left so suddenly he did not wait for his diploma for good behavior, which the new system of reform claimed would be as valuable as one from Harvard. Full credit should be given to Warden Osborne for the provisions made for the entertainment, comfort and education of the prisoners and for a wise trust which may aid in reform; but the love and faith side of the administration at Sing Sing erred when it trusted such an essentially bad man as Spence, although it doubtless did so in the belief that that trust would reform him. A wicked murderer, whom society had for its own protection shut up behind the bars, has been let out into society, probably to repeat his crime, as he swore vengeance against those responsible for his conviction. There is only one thing that can reform the criminal, inside or outside of the bars, and that is the love of the Infinite Father in the person of his crucified Son. The Sing Sing authorities have overlooked this one important fact: that "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." (Jer. 17: 9.)

Edison's New Searchlight

A SEARCHLIGHT, 3,000,000 candle-power, small and fed by storage batteries, said to be the most powerful searchlight in the world, is the latest invention of Thomas A. Edison. It was operated for the first time at the inventor's home in Llewellyn Park, N. J., the other night. The people in that region, surprised by such a bright light, telephoned to the Police Department to find out what it meant. It is designed for use in mine rescue work, at fires, in shops and aeroplanes. Christ is the searchlight covering every inch of our planet and penetrating its spiritual darkness. He is thus described: "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." (John 1: 9.)

against a common foe—which is the interpretation generally advanced—as that the appearance of a common foe has awakened the people individually, and at last collectively, to a sober realization of the relative importance of things and to a clearer vision of the truth.

Do not mistake me; I am not praising this war, nor war in the abstract. I am not saying that any country not now involved needs a similar awakening; I am even far from intimating that what has happened in England has not happened in France, for instance, or Germany; and I have seen enough of the actual fighting to understand whether or not the price is worth what it buys. I am simply setting down the facts as I observed them, and one of the most patent of these facts is the sudden intellectual sobriety of England, and especially of that class in England which, before the war, regarded the gathering clouds of internecine strife only to laugh at them. No man has a greater detestation of war than have I; my purpose is to show one of the results of this war upon the English temperament, and now to trace the reaction of that upon English affairs in the near future.

Nobody has felt, or should have felt, this result more than Mr. Bernard Shaw. The playwright of Adelphi Terrace had won his way against every natural prejudice of the British mind. At first generally regarded as "not quite respectable," he seemed to have slain the last remaining mid-Victorian. The middle class disapproved of his ideas, but was rather proud of his presence as a lasting denial of the ancient taunt that the Anglo-Saxon is, in wit and brilliance, a lesser creature than the Gaul. Then came the war, and Mr. Shaw proceeded to write about it in precisely the same terms in which he had for years been writing about everything that concerned England. The whole nation had but one voice in answer:

"This fellow does not belong here. The present is no time for cap and bells."

It is a literal fact that, read in the United States or not, as the case may be, Shaw's writings on the war are read in England only by the small group of journalists who are hired to answer them. One of the first effects of the war's end will be upon literature, and it will be the elimination of Mr. Shaw from the list of then contemporary writers of influence.

That, however, is a minor matter, and another matter that has been greatly exaggerated is that of the so-called "war-babies." War always brings, among its thousand other evils, an increase in illegitimacy, and the rate of illegitimacy in England was never low. The war has raised the figures for England, but has not raised them out of the proportion that was to be expected by experience. What has happened is that the increase has forced upon the attention of the nation a condition to which the nation has been too long and too wilfully blind. Provision will be made before the war is ended, and when the war is ended, legislation will follow, based on the practical knowledge thus gained.

FAR more spectacular will be the war's effect on the aristocracy—a change that at first seems merely one in Society, but that, on examination, is speedily seen to be a change in society, the big "S" giving place to the little. The heirs to the most important titles in England held commissions in the army; so did many of the "younger sons." After the war began it was considered the "proper thing" to get a commission for the second son as soon as the first son was killed in battle: that is English pluck, and very fine; if perhaps unselfishly short-sighted, pluck it is. But since the day of Mons it has been shown by undeniable figures that the average life of an English officer on the firing line is exactly twenty-three days. This means that already many famous old English titles are without heirs, even collateral. If it continues, it will mean the passing of the old English aristocracy, and those who know the present trend of English feeling—those who remember the systematic heavy taxation of large estates begun by Lloyd-George before the war and consistently continued up to the present time—will tell you that it is very doubtful if, after the war, new titles will be created to take the place of the old ones—will tell you that it is more doubtful if the old titles will be conferred on new families.

The English army learned something in the bitter school of the South African War. It has learned more during the first ten months of this war. But its officers have refused to learn one thing that has been mastered by the officers of the German, French, Russian, Italian, Serbian, Turkish and even Japanese armies engaged—I say Japanese, because they learned it in their fight with Russia. The English officers, in a word, are stubbornly determined, whatever than magnificent; it is oftentimes sublime; but it is a danger to their own cause, and it is "fytal" to the present social order of the United Kingdom. Continued, it will mean that, within a few years, the title will signify about as much in England, and be about as rare, as the title in France.

This has brought us back to affairs military, and before turning away from them again, let me say one word about Kitchener's new army—one word and perhaps two.

THE American newspapers have agreed that this army is now in the field, and Americans, in watching the march of events from day to day and in calculating the issue of the war therefrom, have figured entirely on that assumption. Nevertheless, Kitchener's new army is not in the field and will not be there before the end of the first week in July.

One friend of mine enlisted early in August of 1914; he would naturally be with the first large divisions to be sent to the front. He remained, instead, at Grantham, with the other men of his regiment, until early spring, when they were marched—not entrained—all the advice they receive from headquarters to the contrary, not to surrender the ancient tradition that an officer must set an example of bravery to his men by recklessly and needlessly exposing himself to the fire of the enemy.

"'E was jolly bryve, our capting," a wounded Tommy told me. "'E always syde doin' nothink but wyting was bad for us chaps' nerves. So when dyes was dull in the trenches, 'e up an' stand right out in front of us an' walk up an' down syde as if 'e was strollin' along Pall Mall. W'y, 'e did it five or six tymes before the Germans killed 'im."

I made no comment, but I did permit myself a question.

"Didn't he know it was dangerous?" I asked. The Tommy eyed me with supreme scorn.

"Know it was dyngerous?" he repeated. "'E knew it was fytal; that's what 'e knew."

A man close to the war office confirmed the impression that I have here tried to convey:

"We can't get them to give it up," he said. "It's killing them by the hundreds and hundreds. We'll feel the officer famine before we feel the ammunition famine. To see them at it, you would think they would rather die than not. We give orders, but they consider this sort of thing what some of you Americans consider as—eh, what is it? Ah, yes: the unwritten law, you know."

"It is magnificent," said Bonaparte upon a certain famous occasion, "but it is not war." This adherence of the British officers to an old tradition in the face of new conditions is more way from Lincolnshire to Surrey. Under date of June 4 he writes me:

"I am just back from my 'good-by leave' that they are giving us all before they send us out. When we go, we are to go all together—that is clear from the fact that we have so long been held together. Taking our numbers and then the numbers in which they are sending us out for those good-bys, it is easy to calculate that the last 'good-by leaves' won't be over before the end of this month. I don't care what the American papers say, the only bits of Kitchener's army that have been sent to the front were a batch of a hundred or so, now and again, to fill gaps in veteran regiments. We'll go, and all go together, in July. Then, as you say over there in New York, 'watch out!'"

What now concerns us, however, is not what Kitchener's army is going to do at the front, but what it is doing to the English character and how that will affect England's future. The boy that wrote the letter which I have just quoted was my secretary; he came to me a mere student; I could never make him take exercise, and, though he was physically fit, he was lacking in all energy save for reading and his secretarial work; whereas at Christmas-time he returned for a day's visit, an upstanding, pink-cheeked, clear-eyed young man with an active interest not in war alone, but in something that he had cared nothing about: I mean the social conditions of his country.

That is one point of view. Here is another as expressed in a letter from my groom, who has become a driver in the artillery. He writes from Canterbury; and his home is in the North Country:

DEAR SIR: I am just writing you a line hoping you are well as it leaves me at the moment. . . . It must be awful out in front. . . . I have some men here that have been in the front, and they say no one can realize what it is like until they get there, and then they are not finding out. Well we have come to do our duty and we must do. Well I can't sonally speaking I like the army and I think I ever shall. There is strong drink more so in this regiment. . . . I am fairly lucky, I have been an officer since right after Christmas, getting a week extra for it, but it costs to get home—twenty shillings from home. I wish I could get a bit away, because if I live to get back after this war, I don't think I shall be long. . . . There is one thing I am pleased to say. I have not had a mark against my character. Which I own is a difficult task. But will do my best to keep that clear. . . . Most of the men like the army better than I do. They say they want to stay in it after the war.

That, it seems to me, is the bad, significant phrase of this letter. The way they want to stay in it after the war." At the same instant, the Englishman is saying: "If we had had a big army, we should never have been in this war at all—there would have been no war." One of the things at issue in the present conflict has ended is the creation and maintenance of a large standing army; a great many Englishmen of wide knowledge have expressed to me the fear that, far from ending international conflicts, this war will but put upon England the burden and threat of militarism.

LESS doubtful is the effect of the war on the drink problem. Drink as England has long freely admitted has been England's curse. The ancient are heavily against its remaining. England's curse much longer. It has been well said that Parliament never passes a law until it has found out what the people want it passed: legislation as in the case of illegitimacy, will be tardy; it will follow on the feet of accomplishment. The politicians of the national pulse and found that in establishing prohibition might mean the fall of their party; but so, too, very like prohibition was necessary in times of peace, necessary, from their viewpoint, in times of war. It was necessary for the increasing of the workers' efficiency, and that efficiency must be increased in England was to hold her own.

What happened? The cost of living had risen, and the workers were demanding higher wages to meet it. Apparently, openly, the politicians did nothing. But they went to the employers, and the employers did. They have not yet finished doing it alone; they will never finish; but they have made the beginning; they have established a precedent; they have sown a seed of public sentiment. Briefly, they have let it be known that the worker who does not drink will earn more money from them than the drinking worker. Some of the large firms are treating this question among their employees just as most of the roads over here are treating among their employees: the man that drinks is not hired, or, having been hired, is not retained. Sobriety is rewarded. The men's wives have noted this, and men as have reformed have noted its value. The thing has been started when it has grown sufficiently public sentiment will enact the sentiment.

But this has had one effect at once unlooked for—save perhaps among the most sagacious employers. When the politicians quietly said: "Stop you men from drinking," the employers answered: "We shall, if you will back us up in certain other way." The politicians agreed. The continuing conduct of the war required an increased output by the workers—an increase which the lessening of drink would alone bring to pass. Short of that could not be allowed: battle would not for the worker! More

CHRISTIAN HOSTS AT NORTHFIELD

NO MATTER how familiar one may be with the life at Northfield and its manifold activities, one finds some new features and gains some new impressions at each recurring visit. Certain things, however, remain unchanged. Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite charm of the peaceful meadows, the winding river, the splendor of sunsets behind the circling hills. But each season there is a denser shade on the walk from the Hotel to the Auditorium, a decrease of dust on the well-oiled streets, and a marked increase in the number of automobiles. Motor busses and trucks have largely displaced the primitive vehicles of a generation ago. Lovely bits of landscape gardening appear in unexpected places.

New buildings arise here and there on the campus, satisfying the esthetic sense with noble forms of architecture. The latest addition is Kenarden Hall, the gift of Mrs. John S. Kennedy and named for her summer home. It is used as an administration building and is admirably equipped for that purpose. The style is Spanish and the roof of the loggia is supported by six columns of polished iris pophyry. It stands near the Sage Chapel, a beautiful stone edifice, which dominates the landscape like an English parish church, and here on Sunday afternoons a vested choir of seminary students assists in vesper service. Among the other external changes, one notes the installation of a new sewage plant, increased garage facilities, new tennis courts, and improvement in the golf course, located in the natural amphitheater where the Hotel stands. A distinctive feature of this famous hostelry, and one which the traveling public appreciates more and more, is the service rendered by the young women students from the seminary and the young men from Mount Hermon. As soon as these schools close in the summer, more than a hundred take positions as matrons, housekeepers, cooks, chambermaids, waiters and helpers in various capacities. It makes vast difference in one's comfort of mind as well as body to be served by such a corps of intelligent, honest, faithful, courteous and capable young persons.

But the secret of Northfield's drawing power is not in externals. It is true, its natural beauties are exceptional. A group of travelers returning from an extensive tour through Europe some years ago had occasion to pass through this region, and one of them remarked: "We have seen quite a title of this planet in the last few months, and to my mind this Connecticut Valley is the fairest spot on God's earth on which our eyes have rested." It is the spirit breathed into the place and its institutions by D. L. Moody which has given significance on two continents and still continues to attract hundreds to the conferences held during the summer. In countless ways one sees how much emphasis he laid upon the power of God's Word. One of the first things to attract the eye on entering Kenarden Hall is this verse from Isaiah: "I the Lord will keep it; I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it I will water it night and day." The same words are inscribed in Stone Hall. The whole place seems surcharged with Bible truths. And surely no one can stand on Round Top and read the verse which marks Mr. Moody's grave—"He that doeth the will of God shall abide forever"—without being profoundly stirred by a sense of spiritual values. So it has come to pass that this little "rustic town, set in a gleaming river's crescent curve," on the border-line of three states among the Franklin County hills, has become a great spiritual power plant, sending its forces to the ends of the earth. More than fifty graduates from the two schools are missionaries in foreign lands, and a multitude whom no man can number are following the gleam in other ways and places.

DURING THE ANNUAL PAGEANT ON NORTHFIELD'S BEAUTIFUL LAWN

It is a most inspiring experience to attend one of the young people's conferences and see how readily they respond to the influence radiating from this center where Christianity is decidedly not a failure. This year the initial gathering was that of five hundred young women. Smith College was represented, also Abbott Academy, and such famous preparatory schools as Farmington and Westover in Connecticut, Dana Hall in Wellesley, the Cathedral School in Washington, the Wright School in Philadelphia, and Dobbs Ferry, which carried off the honors as to numbers. Many of the girls are lodged in the one hundred tents which dot the campus; and twenty occupy the Louise Andrews Camp, designed for young women of limited means. This conference closed June 23, and is followed immediately by one for young men, under the leadership of Dr. John R. Mott. Looking upon a similar mass meeting of boys and girls some years ago, the late Dr. De Forest of Japan said to the writer: "Well, my friend, we older ones may now safely withdraw and commit the conduct of affairs of the Kingdom to these young people. Their faces are turned in the right direction." The other gatherings to follow the students' are:

Summer School for Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies	July 8-15
Woman's Summer School of Home Missions for the East	July 16-23
Summer School for Sunday School Workers with an Extension Course	July 17-30
General Conference of Christian Workers	July 30-Aug. 15
Bible Studies and Special Addresses at the Northfield Schools and Conferences	May 1-Sept. 27

Mr. W. R. Moody, son of the founder, the late D. L. Moody, now president of the Northfield Schools and Conferences, has extended a cordial invitation to the Christian public to meet here at the General Conference in August. In his invitation, he writes:

"The present hour marks one of the world's greatest crises. Social order is, in many places, being displaced, for the time, by chaos, and theories recently held to have been demonstrated are now being proved untenable. Visions of the brotherhood of nations have been dissipated by the rude awakening of elemental passion. Idealism is being tested in the crucible of sacrifice, and even the standards of ancient faith are being challenged.

"One result of all this has been the turning of men's minds to spiritual things. Now is a unique opportunity for the church to proclaim the evangel of the risen Lord. History reveals the fact that great epoch-marking conflicts have been attended or immediately followed by times of spiritual awakening, and evidences of a recurrence of this experience are not lacking. As a readiness for meeting the call of the times, we would extend a call to the General Conference of Christian Workers to convene at East Northfield, Mass., July 30 to August 15, 1915."

Among those who are to be present and take part in the conference are: Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D.D., Rev. J. Stuart Holden, M.A., and Rev. Charles Inglis, of London; Rev. A. T. Robertson, M.A. D.D., LL.D., of Louisville, Ky.; Rev. Professor G. A. Johnston Ross, M.A., and Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, of New York City; Rev. John R. Davies, of Philadelphia; Rev. Russell Cecil, D.D., and Bishop Denny, of Richmond, Va.; Rev. C. E. Scott, Rev. L. G. Broughton, formerly of Atlanta, Ga.; Rev. William Evans, formerly of Chicago; Rev. Arthur J. Smith, Rev. George T. Berry, and Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, of New York City; and Mr. Melvin Trotter, Grand Rapids, Mich.

There was not enough. The politicians stepped in and told the workers that these things had ceased to be private and had become public matters. Duty to one's country was involved. They had the choice, not to mince matters, going to work in the old way or going to jail in the old way. They could not rebel: there was Kitchener's army to quell them. They went to work in the old way.

This means just one thing: it means that the cause of the labor unions, once stronger in England than anywhere else in the world, has been put back a quarter of a century. And it may mean more: two years ago, Lloyd George was playing with the idea of government ownership of many public utilities, even of the coal mines. The tendency may well end in widespread government ownership; it may all end in state socialism.

Before that, however, party politics will be profoundly affected, as, indeed, they have already begun to be. The coalition cabinet is but the beginning. At the present time, the Independent Labor Party is dead; nor is there any reason to suppose that it will be revived, since it will suffer with the labor unions. As for what called itself the British Socialist Party—an amazing endeavor to combine militaristic nationalism with Marxism—it was never, properly speaking, born. Now Conservatives and Liberals have united on the supreme issue: on the war. The end of the war will see them divide into forms that are new, and once Ireland has been given home rule (which, of course, will be done immediately peace is assured), what is now the Conservative Party will return to power, and the Church of England, so recently in danger of disestablishment, will, for a time, be saved from that fate.

ONE more change can be prophesied with certainty, and that a great one: the women will be given the ballot. What they could not gain by violence, by years of propaganda, by peaceful politics, they have gained by their conduct in this war—the various woman suffrage organizations of England.

There can be no doubt upon this subject. I have talked with Englishmen of influence among constituents of every shade of political belief, and the verdict is everywhere the same. I was told it by a leading Conservative, who headed several fights against woman suffrage in the House; by another who has long been an especial target for the attacks of Mrs. Pankhurst's organization; by Liberals and Labor members; by newspaper owners and newspaper editors. Finally I was told it by that barrister who conducted the last prosecution that sent Mrs. Pankhurst to jail.

"They will get it," said he, "because they have proved that they deserve it. They have demonstrated what we always doubted that they had: an organization in the real sense of that word. They have shown that they, as women, possessed what we always doubted that, as women, they could possess: efficiency and executive ability. The war came; there was crying need of relief and hospital work, adequately organized and efficiently administered. These woman suffragists merely diverted the direction of the organizations that they had at hand—that they themselves had perfected. The nation owes them more than it can pay, but it will try to pay just the same."

These things, then, are relatively certain, whoever wins the war or loses it, for England has awakened to her own true internal condition. There will be new legislation upon the subject of illegitimacy; there will be sweeping changes in class distinctions; there will be a larger standing army—perhaps even militarism—there will be a strong tendency toward prohibition; there will be an at least temporary decline of the power of the trades unions and a definite movement toward government ownership and state socialism; there will be the admission of woman to the use of the ballot. How much of this is good and how much bad, I am not here trying to determine; but I have shown, I think, that so much as is sure to occur inside of England is of considerably more importance to her, and perhaps inferentially to the world at large, than any changes of the map of Europe.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

WHAT FRIENDS THOU HAST AND THEIR AFFECTION TRIED, GRAPPLE TO THY HEART WITH HOOKS OF STEEL! Victoriano Huerta, who was refused recognition as President of Mexico by the United States Government because of the murderous events which placed him in office; and whose defiant refusal, as commander of factional troops in control of Mexico at the time, to salute the Stars and Stripes and make other amends demanded by the United States for the action of his troops in firing upon an American naval launch caused the despatching of a fleet and troops to Vera Cruz with the resultant death of several American marines and many Mexicans; and who later fled from his country in defeat and by repute extremely wealthy with spoils; and who a short time ago landed upon American soil, set up a domestic establishment on Long Island, and entertained numerous Mexican military friends; was arrested on the frontier of the United States at the small station of Newman, N. M., on June 27 by a United States deputy marshal on the charge of violating our neutrality by plotting here a military uprising in his native country. Huerta was met in a high-power automobile by "General" Orozco, a former military opponent, presumably to make a quick "get-away" across the border. Both Mexicans were taken into temporary custody, and released under bonds, $15,000 for Huerta and $7,500 for Orozco; and they are now under strict surveillance lest they jump their bail before a hearing. Huerta declared that he was on his way to the Los Angeles and San Francisco Expositions; he stated that he lived in Oakland, Calif., about twenty years ago and wished to renew his associations. He had originally denied all intention to return to Mexico, and now denies a revolutionary plot, but it is stoutly alleged that officials of the administration are aware of such a plot on an extensive scale, and that operations were to have begun with the seizure of Juarez and the defection of Mexican federal troops to Huerta's standard.

SYMPATHETIC EARTH PAINS. On June 22 earthquake partially wrecked several border towns in Imperial Valley, California, killed four Americans and four Mexicans and ruined a million dollars' worth of property, besides putting the extensive irrigation system that supplies 400,000 acres of that region in peril. Martial law was declared at Calexico and Mexicali, American cavalry patrolling Calexico and Villa's troops Mexicali. The shock was felt in Arizona. Slight additional shocks kept the population in terror for nearly two days. The escape of the irrigation system was most fortunate; engineers insist that a new, violent shock now will be disastrous. Scientists attribute the disturbance to an extinct volcano, Black Butte, at the head of Volcano Lake. June 19 a terrific volcanic eruption took place near an island 150 miles south of Yokohama, causing a severe earthquake shock in Central Japan June 20.

MASSACHUSETTS "PREPARES FOR WAR." So the Boston Transcript states under date of June 23. The annual tours of the state militia began June 26, that organization being stronger and better equipped than ever in its history. Two extra days of rifle practice by the men will be paid for by the Federal Government, and five companies armed with the latest type United States army machine guns have been added to the state's forces.

THE FATHERS OF A PAN-AMERICAN CONSTITUTION. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo has appointed the men named below on an international high commission to draw up uniform laws for closer commercial relations between the nations of the Western Hemisphere and to devise ways and means for increasing the interchange of business. Each South and Central American country will appoint nine members to the commission. The American representatives are: Secretary McAdoo, chairman; John Bassett Moore, Columbia University, vice-chairman; John H. Fahey, United States Chamber of Commerce; David R. Francis; E. H. Gary, chairman of the Board of United States Steel Corporation; A. Barton Hepburn, Chase National Bank, New York; George M. Reynolds, Continental and Commercial National Bank, Chicago; Henry P. Davison, J. P. Morgan & Co.; Samuel Untermyer, and Dr. Leo S. Rowe, secretary-general of the recent conference.

FRANCE ACCIDENTALLY STEPS ON THE MONROE DOCTRINE. Rear-Admiral Caperton has been ordered to proceed with his flagship, the armored cruiser Washington, from Vera Cruz to Cape Haitien, Haiti, and land marines to protect foreign interests and incidentally to relieve from that duty marines who were sent ashore from the French cruiser Descartes. The latter are expected to retire in good order upon the arrival of the Washington. Haiti has had three presidents in the past year, all of them equally unable to straighten out the Black Republic's finances, yet one Bobo insists upon opposing American efforts to lend a helping hand, and in consequence there is constant friction with European countries.

PHILIPPIANS 4: 19. The Associated Press has sent out a story about the Billy Sunday of Japan, Kimura, a native evangelist who is making Japanese cities sit up and notice Christ—to speak in character. His methods closely resemble Sunday's, as do his results. He dresses in European clothes and is assisted by an evangelistic party. Pretty kimonos and collegiate pride both arouse Kimura's scorn. He believes in sudden conversions and in hitting the trail. In his Tokyo campaign his slogan is "Christ for the citizens of Tokyo! The citizens of Tokyo for Christ!" Sakai, or, as we would call him, Sankey, leads in the music. Kimura's full name is Seimatsu Kimura, corrupted by American friends into Henry Kimura; he is forty years old. His father was a wine-seller who kicked him out of the house at the impressionable age of 16, whereupon he became converted to Christianity, came to America at the age of 19 and sought out Dwight L. Moody. He found the great evangelist at work in the South and told him he wished to study at the Moody Institute in Chicago. "How much money have you?" asked Moody. "Mr. Moody, I have got 35 cents." "How do you ever expect to study two years in Chicago on 35 cents?" asked Moody. "And I said quickly," explains Kimura, "Mr. Moody—Philippians 4: 19." And now Kimura is the Billy Sunday of Japan. He met Sunday at Denver and "wept six times in one hour on hearing him." In three weeks he attended fifty Billy Sunday meetings, and now, he says, "I think nobody ever goes to sleep when I'm preaching. Especially I'm after the backsliders."

TITANIC'S DAMAGE SUITS. Practically all claims growing out of the Titanic tragedy in April, 1912, amounting to $18,000,000, have been filed, and on June 22 the Federal District Court began the hearing to determine if these claims may be brought by suit against the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company, Ltd., the White Star Line. The company seeks to limit the liability to under $100,000. Relatives of the more than 1,600 persons who perished, and survivors who lost their baggage and sustained personal injuries, are the claimants.

GEORGIA STATE MILITIA GUARDS EX-GOVERNOR SLATON'S HOME

BOER GENERAL IN DISGRACE. General Christian DeWet, who won fame as commander-in-chief of the Free State forces in the Boer war, has been convicted of high treason in having headed a rebellion against the British Government in the Orange Free State and the Transvaal last October, and sentenced to six years' imprisonment and to pay a fine of $10,000.

MILLIONS HOPE FOR HIS RECOVERY. Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D., founder and president of Christian Endeavor, is ill from typhoid fever at his summer home at Sagamore Beach. His uniformly comfortable condition gives the watchers encouragement to believe that he will recover, and all the Christian world is interested in the bulletins from the sick-room.

THE SILVER SIDE OF THE WAR CLOUD? News item from Washington June 22: Secretary Redfield reported today at the cabinet meeting that the total trade balance in favor of the United States on June 19 was $976,000,000. He predicted that the balance for the fiscal year ending July 1 would be in excess of a billion dollars.

CHICAGO FACES GREAT LABOR WAR. The strike in the building industry, Chicago, which seemed in the way of settlement, has now resulted in a general shut-down by the allied building and material interests, involving over 200,000 workmen. The action was taken June 25 in answer to the carpenters' refusal to arbitrate the questions in dispute, one of which is an increase of from sixty-five cents to seventy cents an hour in pay. The strike began April 30.

NEWS OF THE CABINET. Mr. Robert Lansing is now secretary of state, by appointment of President Wilson just before the President left Washington for a vacation in New Hampshire. In the President's absence Secretary Lansing will be the senior officer on duty at the capital. The cabinet met in "mysterious session" at the State Department on June 23, on the eve of the President's departure, and in the absence of any information speculation was rife as to the purport of the meeting, which is still a Washington mystery.

EUROPE'S INVESTMENT IN AMERICA. A searching investigation by the president of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad, of foreign holdings of American railroad securities, shows a total of over $2,500,000,000 par value of stocks and bonds held abroad, the market value of which at present is estimated at very much below that figure. The par value of American industrial securities other than the above, held in Europe, is estimated at about $2,000,000,000.

NOT BEING AT WAR SPAIN CAN'T BORROW MONEY. Only one-sixteenth of the proposed Spanish loan of $150,000,000 having been subscribed, the cabinet resigned on June 22, a holding office under Premier Dato since October, 1913. Spain is said to owe at home and abroad only $1,814,270,000.

NEWFOUNDLAND BLOCKADED. Germany—supposedly has closed all the ports of Newfoundland and Labrador with floes of ice. The steamer Fogota ran the blockade and escaped down the coast, bringing word that 500 fishing vessels, latter part of June, were ice-bound and unable to get out Newfoundland inlets to put to sea. The industry is badly hit by this aftermath of winter.

FLANKING MOVEMENT ON THE CONSTITUTION FAILS. The Supreme Court on June 21 defeated the attack by Oklahoma and Maryland to restrict the negro vote, by declaring void the so-called grandfather clause which had been embodied in the Oklahoma constitution and added to the election laws of Maryland, providing that no person should be allowed to vote unless able to read and write, except persons who were entitled to vote on or before January 1, 1866, or who at any time resided some foreign nation, and the lineal descendant of such persons; in other words, removing the literacy test in the case of practically all whites, but enforcing it in the case of negroes. The grandfather clause, which now is declared unconstitutional, came into existence some fifteen years ago, and has been more or less on trial in several Southern states since.

GOVERNOR UNDER SIEGE. The state of Georgia is witnessing a remarkable demonstration against its former executive, mob resentment against Governor John M. Slaton's action in commuting the Frank death sentence to life imprisonment, the murder of Mary Phagan having taken on June 26, when Mr. Slaton retired from office and the newly elected governor, Judge N. E. Harris was inaugurated. Angry crowds surrounded the capitol, and made serious efforts to do the reigning governor bodily harm, and he was saved only by the presence of police and state troops in force.

It was necessary to close the saloons of Atlanta and take other drastic measures to preserve the peace; the militia were kept under arms. Mr. Slaton was escorted to the ceremonies afterwards to his train by troops, the more violent of the mob even searching the trains to seize him, and also trying to dynamite his home, where Mr. Slaton now remains guarded by troops. An organization of men hostile to the decision have sworn "get" the murderer of Mary Phagan. On the other hand heavy mail is said to be almost unanimous in commendation of Governor Slaton's action.

GIVE REAL LEGS FOR ARTIFICIAL ONES—AND THEY DON'T GET THEM. Makers of artificial limbs are completely unable to meet the fearful demand created by the war in Europe. In the language of the manufacturers "There is a tremendous opening in the European markets for legs; arms made here." (!) Fully 50,000 soldiers have already suffered amputation of limbs. The hospital authorities abroad are urging American artificial limb factories to meet the terrible need. (But will it be wise to let our supply of wooden legs go out of the country, in view of other measures toward "preparedness"?)

IMPORTERS DEMAND FREE SEA ROUTES. A large delegation of leading importers, representing more than a thousand firms in the United States, recently appointed to request the government to obtain the release of foreign merchandise detained by Great Britain's blockade of German and Austrian ports, met with Secretary of State Lansing June 21 and demanded that the administration secure to the importers their constitutional and international rights to import into the United States non-contraband merchandise from neutral ports irrespective of its origin, without restrictions of any kind. The secretary of state went deeply into the subject, and declared that the President and he are determined to aid the importers in securing such rights.

GOLD MEDAL FOR BIBLE SOCIETY. Two gold medals, four silver medals and nineteen bronze medals have been awarded to the various mission boards in the united exhibit of Churches and Missionary Societies at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The American Bible Society was awarded one of the gold medals. The location of the exhibit is one of the best, the Palace of Education. It occupies the center of the exposition, opposite the lecture hall of the Federal Council.

SPENDING BEGINS AT HOME. According to Franklin Lane, secretary of the interior, Americans are this year spending $100,000,000 at home which ordinarily would have been carried over to Europe and left there.

NEW YORK'S BIRTHDAY. On the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the beginning of a charter government for New York City, June 25, 1915, Consul General of the Netherlands A. Van de Sande Bakhuyzen presented the city with an official flag from the city of Amsterdam, Holland, and a great-granddaughter of James Duane, who was mayor in 1784, Marie Duane Bleeker Cox, raised the flag to its staff. Miniature copies of the emblem decorated vehicles throughout the city in larger size were displayed from a great many buildings. The city celebrated the event in splendid manner with speech banquets and parades.

UNEXPLAINED ATTACK ON CARNEGIE. Attempt was made to explode a dynamite bomb near the entrance to the New York home of Andrew Carnegie, on Fifth Avenue, June 24, but a patrolman saw the splutter of the fuse and extinguished it. Mr. Carnegie is at Bar Harbor.

SOLOMON CHOOSES WISDOM

INTERNATIONAL LESSON FOR JULY 18. 1 KINGS 3: 4-15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom." Prov. 9: 10.

You may be clever, and able to win all the scholarships and prizes, and yet not be wise. You may be prudent, and so careful with your investments and speculations that all your touch turns to gold, and yet not be wise. You may be endowed with political foresight, and understand the signs of the times, and yet not be wise. There are plenty of sharp, bright, clever people in the world to whom you would never turn in the hour of heart-break and the floods of great waters. They are not stable, or morally strong, or able to disentangle the right from the wrong in questions of character and comfort. All these qualities without religion, here described as "the fear of God," are like colors apart from sunlight. On the other hand, when the soul fears God, not with the dread of a slave, but with the reverence of love, it begins to see into the heart of things, and to be wise with the intuitions of the soul. After all, true wisdom is not in what the eye sees, or the ear hears, or the heart of man conceives, but in what the Spirit of Truth reveals to the obedient and pure soul. We know, when we follow on to know God. In his light, we see light. Put the sun in the center, and the cycles of the planets are perfectly symmetrical.

Solomon's Wise Choice

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

JUST before Queen Victoria came to the throne of England, Lord Melbourne was appointed to notify her of the coming event and read to her the story of Solomon's dream at Gibeon. Instead of manifesting great delight or exultation, she clasped her hands, lifted up her eyes to heaven and exclaimed, with tears, "O help me to be good!" That prayer was remarkably answered in more than sixty years of reign. She came to her crowning at about the same age as Solomon—eighteen years. It was agreed that she was the greatest queen in the history of kingdoms.

One day Mr. Murdock, passing President Lincoln's room in the White House, heard him at prayer. He gently pushed the door ajar and saw the President on his knees with the Bible open and his hands clasped, crying "O God of Solomon, help me in my great trial!" Murdock went in and threw his arms around the great suppliant and joined him in the petition.

Solomon's wise choice of divine wisdom, that he might discern between good and evil and rule justly, loving mercy and walking humbly, has influenced monarchs and men in all succeeding ages. Solomon did not ask for the fading wreaths of fame; the uncertain riches of gold; the plaudits of the multitude; nor for the power and glory of a great empire, nor for the vicissitudes of war. But he did ask for heavenly understanding, that his heart might be right with God, his mind clear and true and inspired.

Solomon realized that prayer was something more than a reflex influence upon his soul; he knew that his prayer touched the heart of the divine Fatherhood, moved the arm that moves the world, unlocked the treasure house of wisdom, love and grace.

Solomon did not instantly make his request. He pleaded with the divine presence, saying, "Thou hast showed mercy to David my father in his long and wonderful reign." How tender and gentle the next sentiment—"Thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne." Solomon's prayer went on: "As you have helped my father, help me." Then he added, "Thy servant is in the midst of thy people, which thou hast chosen." Blessing me, O God, bless thy people." "As thou hast made me king over thy kingdom, give me a wise and understanding heart to judge thy people."

Solomon acknowledged his own weakness in saying: "I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or to come in." How those words must have reached the heart of the heavenly Father! He knows our weakness, is touched with the feelings of our infirmities, remembers we are dust.

Jeremiah, when called to the office of prophet, spoke similar words: "Behold, I cannot speak, for I am but a child." But the Lord said, "Say not, I am a child, for thou shalt go to all that I send thee; be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to deliver thee. I have put my words in thy mouth." Humility is a virtue that opens the heart to almightiness. When we feel our helplessness, we are ready to lean on the divine arm. When we are weak, we are strong. Solomon and Jeremiah wrote words that have moved the minds and quickened the hearts of millions for centuries.

Great artists have portrayed the scene of Solomon's choice of wisdom. Alphonse Lamartine pictured the story of King Nimrod and his three sons. He offered to them three vases: one of gold, the second of amber, the third of clay. The gold represented empire; the amber, glory or fame; the third represented wisdom from God. "Choose!" cried King Nimrod. And when the youngest son chose the vase of clay, King Nimrod said, "Thou hast chosen well. Thou hast chosen best of all, for the man who chooses wisdom shall wave the scepter as well as mount the throne of fame."

The Sunday school every Sunday is like that great gathering of national leaders which Solomon called to meet him at Gibeon. Every session of the school should be a decision day, for God is really calling to every scholar, saying, "What shall I give thee?" When the writer was a Sunday school scholar of fourteen years of age, he heard the divine call during the opening hymn, which was

There is a happy land,
Far, far away,
Where saints and angels stand,
Bright, bright a day.

He said "Yes" to that call, exclaiming, "Lord, I will be thine." The remainder of the verses he sang with tears of joy. Ever since that hour, the heavenly land has been his hope, his home and his haven of rest.

The devotional exercises of the Sunday school should be more evangelistic. Solomon's great meeting resulted well for his soul because he responded quickly to the divine voice.

When the ship Central America sprang a leak in midocean, a steamer, seeing her signal, drew near and asked, "What is amiss?" "We are in bad repair; lie by till morning," was the answer. "Better let me take your passengers on board now." "No," said the captain, "lie by till morning." In an hour the lights of the ill-fated steamer were not visible; she had gone down and all had perished. Mr. Moody once closed a meeting in Chicago saying, "Think this matter over till next Sunday." On their way home from church that evening, a light suddenly flashed against the sky. It was the beginning of the great Chicago fire. That congregation never assembled again.

Every person has visits or visions from the Spirit of God. If not like Solomon's or Isaiah's or Paul's, it may be the still, small voice, ever whispering, "Come unto me and live. This is the way, walk ye in it." "Why will ye die?" "O Ephraim, how can I give thee up?" If we choose Christ as our ideal and Saviour, he will with himself supply all our needs in this life, with life everlasting beyond.

Have you been disobedient unto the heavenly vision? This is the moment for you to say "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." The greater than Solomon is here, saying "Follow me."

A king once said to a particular favorite, "Ask what thou wilt and I will give it thee." He thought, "If I ask to be made general, I shall readily obtain it; if for half the kingdom, he will give it to me. I will ask him for something to which all these things shall be added." So he said to the king, "Give me thy daughter to wife." This made him heir to all the honors and wealth of the kingdom. So he who chooses Christ becomes joint heir with him to an inheritance of unsearchable riches. He will sit with him on the throne of his glory, crowned with a coronet of unfading beauty, for all things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side.

Echoes from the Holy Land

"HIGH PLACES." When the children of Israel entered the land of Canaan the mountain tops were dotted with "high places" or local sanctuaries, places of worship belonging to the older Canaanites and other dwellers in the land. The two Mizpahs, Dan, Bethel, Ramah, Gilgal, Noh, Bethlechem, Beersheba and Gibeon were certainly "high places." The Israelite conquerors appropriated these commanding situations and revered them as sacred.

There is abundant evidence that up to the seventh century B. C. they were the legitimate and customary places of worship by the Israelites. The earlier prophets lamented the neglect and destruction of these local sanctuaries, while condemning sin in connection with them. In the course of time the worship became so abominably corrupt by reason of the revival of ancient heathen practices that "high places" were the theme and object of the fiercest denunciation of the later prophets and reforming kings.

Before the erection of Solomon's temple the worship at certain "high places" was lawful, but after the building of that structure it was inexorable. Then for centuries some wicked kings favored and continued it, while others waged bitter war against it. Ultimately the whole country west of the Jordan was swept clean, and no specimen of a "high place" remained above the surface of the ground. Modern excavations are revealing the well-defined accessories of high places under the ruins of ancient cities. This also shows how one generation after another has recognized the fitness of exalted and commanding locations for worship.

East of the Jordan in Moab and especially in Edom these ancient "high places" escaped the hands of the reforming prophets and kings and have remained almost intact to the present day. The search for and discovery of these ancient rock-hewn sanctuaries has been one of the most interesting departments of Biblical archaeology during the past twenty years. I have had the privilege, after Dr. S. L. Curtis and Professor G. H. Robinson, of photographing and describing the most perfect specimen in existence among the ruins of Petra. With Professor William Libbey of Princeton and again with Professor Myers of Cincinnati I have had the privilege of discovering at least three other "high places" on the mountains of Edom. Those who wish to look further into this subject can consult "The Jordan Valley and Petra."

Two interesting traces of the worship at ancient "high places" remain until today, the one in language and the other in architecture. The Jews always spoke of "going up" to worship at Jerusalem, no matter what direction they came from. Pious Moslems still speak of "going up" to Mecca. The original sign locating the "high places" was a pillar of stone, a mazzebah, and later the "asherim"—tall masts or living trees. Islam builds minarets and Christian churches build steeples; both minaret and steeple are a development from the original stone marking the place of worship.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

THE following letter was received from Mrs. J. E. W., Spencer, W. Va., who says: "When the column of Answered Prayers first appeared in the Herald I promised God that I would write the good news to the Christian Herald whenever my father accepted Christ. I have been praying for him ever since I became a Christian myself and during a recent revival in his home town he was splendidly converted and is now working hard for his Saviour. I praise God for his answer to my prayer and I have consecrated my life anew to his service." A letter comes from an "Anxious Mother," Dallas, Texas, who says: "I write to tell you that our prayers have been answered in regard to my son, who was employed in a saloon. Now he is in a better business. God be praised for his goodness and mercy." "I wish to return thanks," writes Mrs. M. J. from Michigan, "for answered prayers. Among the many for whom I have sent in petitions are a young married woman and husband. They never pretended to go to church or take any interest in matters of a religious nature. She now writes me she is attending church and singing in the choir. She is located in a Catholic community and the church is a little mission one." Miss T., Richmond, Va., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer, when all human aid seemed to fail. I can trust him."

OLIVER, of Kansas City, Mo., evangelist, closed a five weeks' meeting at Harrisonville, Mo., lately, at which meeting nearly eight hundred went forward, making a complete surrender to Christ. Judge W. S. Byram reports that of this number 203 declared their choice for the Baptist Church, 191 for the Methodist Church, 189 for the Christian Church, and 30 for the Presbyterian Church. It was a union meeting, held in a tabernacle built especially for the purpose, and was the most successful ever held in that part of the country.

—JOHN L. DUBE, the well known native African missionary and principal of the Zulu Industrial School at Ohlange, Natal, is conducting a remarkable work. In connection with the school there is a large productive farm which aids materially in its support. Many of the pupils have developed strong Christian characters, and a band of them goes out preaching among the heathen every Sunday. Mr. Dube has many American friends who will be glad to know of the gratifying progress of his industrial mission work. Since the beginning of the European war, which now reaches to almost every part of the globe, the price of foodstuffs in Natal and other parts of Africa has gone up considerably, taxing the resources of the mission workers severely.

—TERRE HAUTE, IND., has for years been a synonym for political vice. Some months ago the pastors, in a moment born perhaps not so much from inspiration as from desperation, decided to launch a union evangelistic campaign. The committee invited Rev. Milford H. Lyon for the task. A large tabernacle was erected, and on April 16 Rev. Arthur J. Folsom of Fort Wayne gave the dedication address. On the following Sunday the evangelist and his party held their first meeting. As the result of the campaign nearly 2,500 people signified their purpose to begin the Christian life or to renew their covenant vows with Christ. Liquor sales have fallen off nearly one-half. Lukewarm and indifferent church members have been awakened to new life, and every church in the union will receive a large accession to its membership. The evangelist will spend the summer at his home in Winona Lake, Ind., and will open the coming season at Lansing, Mich., September 5.

Evangelists and their Critics

Just a word of appreciation for your valuable periodical. The Christian Herald comes next to the Bible in my home, as a help to living the Christian life. I like your attitude toward the evangelistic work going on in the country at the present time, and which is so much needed. I once heard the remark made, that the two greatest enemies that evangelists had to contend with were "saloonkeepers and some ministers of the Gospel." It is deplorable indeed to hear some so-called Christians denounce revivals. The sermons which appear every week in the Christian Herald are alone worth the price.

FRIENDSHIP'S GOLDEN KNOT

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN the Norwegian-American liner Bergensfjord drifted slowly past the Statue of Liberty and Ellis and on its way into New York harbor, a golden-haired girl with smiling eyes leaned against the railing and eagerly scanned the approaching shoreline. She was Miss Hanna Heinen, daughter of the former Norwegian consul-general in Paris, and she was on her way to Philadelphia, where she was to act as maid of honor at the wedding of her dearest friend.

A voyage at sea is usually a pleasure to any young girl, for an ocean trip is a perfect story-book of adventures. There are the delightful friendships that grow up out of nothing, and there is the ever-present excitement of porpoises and occasionally of whales that may appear in the water ahead. There is the grandeur of the sun setting far off between the sky and sea, and the solemn beauty of moonlight on the waves. Perhaps you wonder why a voyage at sea should be a test of friendship.

SHE CROSSED THE SEA TO BE HER FRIEND'S BRIDESMAID

All these things were true a year ago; all of these things are true now, with a difference; for a year ago there were only natural dangers to arise while out on the open ocean—any storms that might sweep the sea aside, icebergs that might dash its pieces. Now all who dare cross the sea have another danger lying in wait for them, the unnatural, horrible, man-devised danger of mines and torpedoes and dropping bombs. One would rather forego the pleasures of ocean travel than risk a chance in the game at Death is playing with Life out there between the water and the far-off heaven. Think it over, and see whether you would care to cross the sea today to be a chum's bridesmaid.

ONCE, long ago, I read a verse in a time-yellowed autograph album. It was a verse that smiled crookedly from a blurred little page, a verse written by chubby, careful fingers that guided a pen dipped in lavender ink. The small fingers that had fashioned it were old when I first read the words: True friendship is a golden knot that angels' hands have tied." Though the age in the book was worn and old, the words were still true.

I read a pathetic little story in a newspaper one day—a story sandwiched between a big article and a vivid editorial. It told about two soldiers, who as boys had gone to school and college together, and who later were put in the same military company; who fought side by side for the honor of their land. They shared food, munition and clothing, even sleeping under the same blanket for warmth. It was somehow significant that the two boys, so long chums, should have been wounded by the same bomb that exploded above them.

Folk were busy in that section of the line, and wounded soldiers had grown to be commonplace things. One boy was unconscious, mercifully unconscious, with a great hole torn in his side; the other boy stared wide-eyed up at the sky and wondered, through aspects of agony, how soon death would come to set him free. It was dusk when a hurrying Red Cross surgeon picked them lying there. Tenderly he knelt down between their bleeding bodies. The boy who was conscious tried feebly to raise his head. "I guess," he gasped, "that—I'm—all—in." The Red Cross surgeon laid a practiced hand on his pulse. "I'm not so sure of that," he said; "if we can get you right to the hospital you may be saved. There's room in the wagon for one more."

They say that when a person is drowning, or being burned to death, the whole of his life story flashes like a panorama before his eyes, and that he can live through years in a few ticks of the clock. I think that maybe the boy, lying immovable on the ground, saw a brightly-colored picture of his happy childhood, a wonderfully-hued vision of a future that might be. Perhaps in that vision he saw a little mother with outstretched arms. Perhaps he saw a girl with a smile on her lips, and the sunlight playing in her hair. All of this he saw in a minute, and then with a blinding, sickening flash the present came back to him, and he saw himself lying on the ground with the dusk creeping up darkly over the trenches, and a faint star far above the powder smoke—and his comrade lying unconscious beside him. It took only a second to make up his mind.

Weakly he moved his head in the direction of the boy who had shared his life.

"Take him, doc," he said, although his voice faltered with the words. "Take him. He's—my—friend!"

There was only one place in the wagon.

ALL tales of friendship do not deal with great sacrifices and great bravery. One day I went to a little afternoon tea. There was much talk on the line of dresses and hats and shoes. There was polite laughter over personal little jokes. Finally, the speech crept around to the subject of a girl who had not been invited.

It's remarkable how a few well-directed sentences will put black marks on a person's character. The girls were all nice girls from good families, and yet the well-directed remarks were in evidence. I, a stranger, formed an opinion—not a very flattering opinion—of the girl who had not been invited. I found myself wondering about her as the talk went on.

Suddenly, from one corner of the room, I heard a faint thud. I turned quickly and saw a young lady standing up, a young lady who had left her seat so suddenly that her pretty work-bag with its bright scissors and thimble tumbled to the floor. As I looked, I saw that she was one of the commonplace type, blond, pale, indefinite looking; and then all at once she spoke.

"Girls," she said, and her voice was very stern, although trembling a little, while the color in her cheeks faded to a dull embarrassed white. "Girls, I've had enough of this. She isn't here—and she's a friend of mine!" She sat down and the talk turned abruptly to summer vacations.

UNDER cover of the conversation I glanced furtively at the young lady sitting in her chair. She had picked up her work-bag, and her fingers were playing nervously with the contents, while tears fluttered on her eyelashes. It had taken courage, downright courage, to speak up as she had spoken.

Oh, friendship—true friendship—is not a milk-and-water sentiment that means only the giving of gifts and caresses and smiles when one is near. Friendship is a wonderful golden knot that will draw you to cross the seas or to give up your life. True friendship is a golden knot that angels' hands have tied.

Friendship is giving oneself.

FIGHTING ALCOHOL IN MISSION LANDS

AMONG the many evils arising from the liquor traffic is the havoc that is wrought upon foreign missions. The complaints by missionaries of all Protestant denominations of the disastrous results that follow the importation of liquor into mission lands made it necessary that something should be done to check the evil. Accordingly, the missionary societies of practically all the European countries met in London and formed "The Native Races Liquor Traffic United Committee," the object of the organization being to check the traffic and so save their spiritual work. One direct and effective method of procedure has been to secure the active co-operation of European governments owning colonies in Africa and elsewhere in checking the traffic in strong drink among the native races. This committee has succeeded in doing excellent work in British, Belgian, French and Portuguese colonies. It secured the passage of prohibitory laws for the Belgian Congo territory and similar laws in many British colonies.

Some time ago a concession was arranged to be granted by the legislature of Liberia, West Africa, to open distilleries for the making of liquor in the Black Republic. The committee, on learning of this, at once decided to prevent the concession being granted, if possible. Not having any branch of the organization in the United States, the secretary, Mr. John Newton, wrote to the Rev. Hervey Wood, of New York City, asking him to submit the facts to our government at Washington, and to urge it to advise the Liberian legislature not to grant the concession.

Readers of the Christian Herald already know that at the close of the American Civil War, fifty years ago, many freedmen went to Africa to settle in the Liberian republic. Our government has always taken a paternal interest in the welfare of the freedmen. Accordingly, our secretary of state cabled from Washington to the American minister at Monrovia to use his moral influence with the Liberian legislature. The concession was not granted, and so that part of Africa will not be swamped with American-made rum. Recently, at the request of the secretary in London, Mr. Wood wrote the State Department to ascertain what had been done by the Liberian legislature in regard to the cabled request of December, 1913. He received the following:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
WASHINGTON, June 12, 1915.

Rev. Hervey Wood:

Sir: The department has received your letter of May 25 relative to the granting by the Government of Liberia of a concession for the distillation of alcoholic beverages. In reply to the department's cabled instructions to the American legation, to which you refer, a despatch was received stating that this government's opinion on the granting of the concession referred to would be brought to the attention of the Liberian legislature. The department has received no advices that the concession was granted.

ROBERT LANSING
Secretary of State and Inter-

AT THE present time, Holland sends more liquor to Africa than all the other countries combined. Over 5 per cent. of the liquor entering Africa goes from Boston, Mass. Recently a schooner sailed from Boston with 700,000 gallons of New England rum on board. Bottles of rum in crates were lashed on the deck. Every man was compelled to sign a total abstinence pledge before signing articles for the voyage. Boston, from which missionaries have been sent for over a hundred years, now in a year of grace is sending out with Lyman Beecher called "liquid damnation." This is the same city that sent out Adoniram Judson and his fellow missionaries to enlighten the heathen. The United States sends the four British colonies in Africa during the year 1912, 1,032,658 gallons of rum. In the same year, Germany sent 1,010,759 gallons of gin and 389,377 gallons of rum, and Holland sent 2,562,136 gallons of gin and 136,975 gallons of rum. In five years from 1907 to 1912, there were sent to those four colonies 35,680,078 gallons of intoxicating liquor. These figures do not include the Orange Free State, the Transvaal, Cape Colony, or the Portuguese, French and Spanish colonies. If to those countries already enumerated we add India, China, Japan, Ceylon, the New Hebrides and the Fiji Islands, we have the remarkable spectacle of the so-called Christian nations pouring something like 100,000,000 gallons of rum and other intoxicating liquors in five years to countries where Christian missionaries are preaching the Gospel and trying to save souls! What wonder that Mohammedans, Brahmans and Buddhists—all total abstainers—should cast an eye of suspicion and distrust upon a religion which winks at the debauchery of the people it is trying to save? Ceylon has recently been the scene of operations by the Native Races Liquor Traffic Committee. One thousand five hundred "toddy" shops, which had been opened by government consent, were closed, the committee having succeeded in enlisting the support of the British colonial office in its crusade for sobriety among the dependent races.

In order that Christian churches in the United States and Canada might co-operate with the Native Races Liquor Traffic Committee, Rev. Hervey Wood, one of the commissioners in temperance of the Federal Council of Churches, at the last annual meeting of the council proposed the appointment of a committee to align the foreign missionary societies in the United States and Canada with those in Europe. This was done and the committee is now actively at work.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS FOR JULY

What Christianity Has Done for the World

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for July 18. Matt. 13: 31-33

WHAT has Christianity done for the world? The atheist, the skeptic, the Mohammedan, the Jew might reply: "Christianity has deluged the world again and again with blood." They might say: "In what were supposed to be the best days of the church the professed followers of Christ are engaged in the ghastliest orgy of bloodshed history has so far recorded."

What can we say to these taunts? At least we might be frank enough to change the wording of our topic and consider tonight "What Christianity might have done for the world," or, "Why has Christianity not done more for the world?"

The causes of failure so far have been: (1) That the church has been too closely identified with commerce and gain. She has been too much interested in gold and not enough interested in humanity. (2) Not only her interest in humanity not been strong enough; it has not been very enough. Patriotism has been emphasized to the exclusion or lessening of the sense of responsibility to other nations. This is largely due to the influence of early Judaism. Wonderful as were the messages of the Old Testament, they needed the touch of Christ and the passion of his life to carry them over to the other nations of the world. Can we conceive his disappointment that after a thousand years of pretended effort to take that message to "all the world," the nations who nominally are his are engaged in an apparent effort to destroy one another? (3) Not only has the economic and international message of Christianity been forgotten; the actual spiritual message has been minimized and overlooked. Christianity has largely failed to keep the fire of Pentecost, that fire which burned out again in the life of Martin Luther, again in John Wesley, again in William Booth and Charles G. Finney. Not only have we forgotten to love other men intensely; we have forgotten to love God ardently. The fires of true devotion go out again and again upon the altars of the church.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

WE REGRET to disappoint the large number of readers who are following this interesting contest by delay in the July set of questions. The causes of this delay are sickness and death in the family of the editor in charge. We know our readers, who must feel almost personally acquainted with him because of this long-continued contest, will sympathize with him at this time. The Honor Roll and the answers to List No. 5 will be found below, and the new questions, List No. 6, we believe will appear in our next issue.

For a Better Endeavor

THE United Society of Christian Endeavor meets in convention in Chicago July 7 to 12, with Dr. Francis E. Clark presiding. If affairs of state permit his absence from the capital, President Wilson will address the convention at its opening session, Wednesday evening, in the Coliseum. Billy Sunday is to preach his sermon on "Destroying the Drink Demon," at a men's mass meeting in the Coliseum on Sunday afternoon. Homer Heddeaver will direct the music at his service and at a series of noon angelic meetings conducted by Billy Sunday.

Women's meetings will be addressed by Mrs. Francis E. Clark, Miss Anna Gordon, president of W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Mary Harris Armour of Georgia.

The plan of the convention this year is to have four simultaneous conferences, dealing with all the leading features of Christian Endeavor work, instead of a dozen small conferences of special topics, attended usually by those already interested.

An international field day is to be observed on Saturday, with Alonzo Agg, director of athletics in the University of Chicago, as superintendent of events.

A delegation of Christian Endeavorists from Greater New York is going to the Chicago convention to present to the trustees of the United Society an invitation to hold the next convention, meeting in 1917, in New York.

Resinol Soap

keeps the complexion healthy and beautiful

Many an otherwise attractive girl is a social failure because of a poor complexion. If your skin is not naturally fresh, smooth and glowing, if it has suffered from summer sun and dust, or an unwise use of cosmetics, Resinol Soap will clear it—or greatly help to do so—in a normal, healthy way. It is so easy too:

Just bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and hot water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the fingertips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of clear, cold water to close the pores.

Do this regularly once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the head, antiseptic Resinol balsams soothe and cleanse the pores, remove pimples and blackheads, and leave the complexion clear, fresh and velvety.

When the skin is in a very neglected condition, spread on just a little Resinol Ointment for ten or fifteen minutes before using Resinol Soap. Resinol Soap is sold by all druggists. For a trial size cake, write to Dept. 11-C, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Questions and Answers

F. W. C., Wheeler, Texas. "Belief" has been defined as "the assent of the mind to the truth of a proposition." In the spiritual sense, it means the "unreserved acceptance of God's plan of salvation, as expressed through the Gospel teaching, the life and atonement of his divine incarnate Son, Jesus Christ, and in the acceptance of Christ as a personal Saviour." This belief does not come through any intellectual operation, but is the result of faith, which enables us to lay hold of that which the mind itself cannot achieve by any of the ordinary intellectual processes. Yet it is not a blind and superstitious assent, but rather a "saving grace whereby we receive and rest upon Christ alone for salvation." As the child believes in his earthly parent, nothing doubting, so we are to look to our heavenly Father, who will give us this faith if we ask it in all sincerity. He will refuse it to none who come to him in this spirit and with an earnest desire to forsake sin. Our faith may be weak at first, like that of the man who cried out: "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief," but he will strengthen it until we can realize what it means to "walk by faith." Being quickened by the power of the Holy Spirit, we learn to trust wholly in God's love for us as expressed in the redemptive work of Christ "the Author and Finisher of faith," for the salvation of a fallen world. Throughout the whole experience of the earlier stages of the Christian life, we should remember that faith is God's gift, and that "whosoever receiveth not the kingdom of God as a little child shall in no wise enter therein."

Mrs. C. B. C., Honaker, Va. You ask if there can be such a thing as a friendship that destroys the best things of character. Such a friendship is conceivable. If one has a friend who possesses wealth and other advantages, while he himself is poor, it is possible to destroy self-respect by being the recipient of favors that cannot be returned. The best of friendships may be strained to the breaking point in this way. An irreligious or irascible man makes a doubtful friend, for, unconsciously, a man communicates his own character to the other in such a relation. An overbearing person can hardly be a true friend, and still more difficult is it for a vain or selfish man. There must be equality of feeling and mutuality of interest.

Mexico's Big Tree. "Having noticed in the Christian Herald some time ago an item about Mexico's famous big tree, I submit the following brief items from my personal observations: This tree was called a "tule" tree and was incorrectly said to be at Mitla. The tree is a species of cypress, 154 feet in circumference, and of quite irregular shape. It looks like a clump of shoots grown together. It is at a small village called Tule on the road from Oaxaca to Mitla. Among many strange sights on my way to Mitla, I saw a large hog harnessed like a horse. The ruins at Mitla are very remarkable. Their masonry is equal to any known anywhere. It seems probable that they were old when Nineveh and Babylon were new. There are chiseled patterns on the rocks, but no inscriptions, and in these designs all is angular."

WILLIAM A. WRIGHT.

Rev. Sylvester Weeks, Pensacola, Fla., writes: "I am and have been for years a reader of the Christian Herald. In the issue of May 19 is an article on 'New Light on the Prodigal Son.' I quote: 'The discovery of the ancient Sumerian laws . . . reveals the fact that our understanding of the parable of the Prodigal Son must be materially modified. . . . This legal aspect of the parable does not seem to have been even surmised by the commentators.' I have been preaching since 1856, and the trinity of parables in Luke 15 has been a favorite theme. 'The Gospel within the Gospel.' On the authority of Dr. Adam Clark (who died in 1832) I have presented the 'legal aspect' of the division of property. On verse 12 Dr. Clark says: 'It may seem strange that such a demand should be made and that the parent should have acceded to it, when he knew that it was to minister to his debauches that this prodigal son made the demand specified. But the matter will appear plain when it is considered that it has been an immemorial custom in the East for sons to demand and receive their portion of the inheritance during their father's lifetime; and the parent, however aware of the dissipated inclinations of the child, could not legally refuse to comply with the application. It appears that the spirit of this law was to provide for the child in case of ill treatment by the father: yet the demand must first be acceded to, before the matter could be legally inquired into,' and then 'if it was found that the father was irreproachable in his character, and had given no just cause for the son to separate from him, in that case the civil magistrate fined the son in two hundred puns of cowries.' See Code of Gentoo laws, pr. disc. p. 56; see also do. chap. 2, sec. 9, 82; 21, sec. 10, p. 301. Also the Comprehensive Commentary, in loc., says (12) Divided. 'It was not unusual for fathers to divide all their substance even in their lifetime. This custom is alluded to by Theophrastus.' Bloomfield. In your issue of May 26 I find on p. 546: Mrs. Charles Holmes . . . would be glad if any reader would tell her why Jericho was called 'the City of Moons.' Smith's Dictionary of the Bible says: 'Older commentators derive it from Jareach (I give the English equivalents of the Hebrew letters) 'the moon.' A foot-note says: 'In which case it would probably be a remnant of the old Canaanitish worship of the heavenly bodies.'"

Mr. H. M. Washburn, Topeka, Kan., writes: "In the Christian Herald of June 9 I was somewhat interested in the short article, 'Transit Revolution,' by T. L. Freeland. He does not seem to be quite clear as to the meaning of 'jitney.' 'Jitney' is Mexican for five cents, just as the word nickel is used, and should not apply to anything at all but the value of five cents. All through Texas and the Southwest 'jitney' has been for a long time applied to anything of the value of five cents. In the expression 'Let us go to a jitney this evening,' it means a five-cent picture show. When it comes to the matter of transportation 'jitney bus' is the proper term to use. Here in Topeka we have put up very patiently for so long a time with neglect in our street car service that the jitney bus became immediately very popular and we have several hundred now in commission. I presume this service has been of like benefit in other cities that have adopted the plan."

A "Veteran Letter-Carrier," Chicago, Ill., writes: "The carriers have for some time been working for a pension for the old men. They have not made much progress. We need the help of the Christian Herald. Twenty men were let out just before the holidays. They were heart-broken. The older men, if turned off, will become a public charge in a short time. Most corporations in this city are retaining their men, also the railways. Every civilized government pensions the carriers. Why not this rich country? There is a measure now before Congress, the Hamel Bill. If this is too liberal, give us less pay, with a contributory clause if necessary. Anything to relieve us in our necessity." These faithful workers, many of whom have spent the years of their strength and activity in the people's service, deserve consideration. They should not be cast aside helpless in their old age.

Subscriber, Des Moines, Iowa, writes: "Is it not a startling thought that at the close of this war we may find Japan the mistress of the seas by virtue of her great naval strength? The present navies will have dwindled to a point which will give the Asiatic power the supremacy." What you state may be among the results of the war if it should be prolonged.

R. S., Hartsburg, Ill. The passage in I Sam. 17: 40 is descriptive of the simple preparation of David for his encounter with the Philistine. The sling was doubtless a double cord with a thong of leather between to receive the stone. Usually the sling held a second stone in reserve in his left hand. But David, unwilling to lose any chance of success, had selected three more stones, making five in all. Shepherds in Palestine and other parts of the Orient, it is said, often carry a sling and stones for the defense of their flocks, and are very skilful in their use. We fail to note any special significance in the number of stones selected by David.

Reader, Des Moines, Iowa. The "great tribulation" referred to in Dan. 12: 1 ("there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation") is also implied in other prophecies, and in the utterances of the Saviour himself on various occasions. There is a remarkable concurrence in the view that the time of world salvation and regeneration is to be preceded by a period of phenomenal world trial and suffering. This is an essential part of the great drama—the Messianic hope, which, according to the Jewish prophets, is to find its climax in the complete restoration of the Palestinian kingdom to its ancient glory, while the Christian teaching is that it will culminate in world-wide Messianic dominion.

Prayer from the Soil.

Words by W. L. Larned
 Decoration by W. R. Lohse

God of unborn crops!

Peace broods over our pleasant land, and never a night's dew falls upon the scarlet stains of war. Stay that which might change the fertile furrows to narrow graves. So shape destiny's shrewd plan as to bring growing things from the warm earth, and garland our sunny hills with eternal bloom.

God of nurturing meadows!

We have fared forth into the hushed afternoon, and all was supremely beautiful. Thy blue sky hung from the very gates of heaven, and its trailing hem kissed my little boy's tanned face as he scampered homeward under the slender willows. This sky was smiling. . . . Thy benediction was in its mysterious blue; . . . and a holy, sweet calm, rippled by no ghost of cloud, held all the infinite space above. We call to thee, lest out of the restless maws of savagery shall blow a destroying breath. Be thou a Shepherd of wise peace. Clover is a more righteous red than man's blood.

God of the singing stream!

We sat upon the moss-gray banks this very hour, and the waters were playing hushed rhapsodies among a thousand swaying reeds and grasses. Life of a subtle, gentle, poetic sort stirred in the slender lily-pads. The green shores seemed nourished by this shiny, sunny thread of meadow silver as it sang its way to the sea. But a robin tilted on a swaying bough, as he preened his soft feathers, and the dull red of his breast brought back all the horror of this ghastly hour. He gave a quick cry and we saw the graceful wings flash among the leaves. But the memory of a scarlet splotch against the dark of the wind-stirred shrubbery remained. Let no omen of sinister intent brood along these aisles of prayer. For as we turn, and part the branches of the young birch, and gaze far into the sunlight, we can catch a glimpse of a man at his plow, and the perfume of freshly turned soil mingles with the soft breath of the violets at our feet.

God of the humble, productive clod!

Grant us a continuation of these calm afternoons of honest, hopeful, eager toil. This man at his plow is singing to his horses. His head is bare, and thy sunshine is tangled in his wind-blown locks. His face is brown with tan; the muscles stand forth on his hairy arms, and his feet are placed with firm sureness in the black, sweet loam, as he tills a straight line across the fields. His is the face of a happy man. The lips are smiling; the brow clear and even; the eyes brilliant with ambition. An infinite amount of horror overtakes us, as with half-closed lids we look into afternoons beyond the sad sea. The plow of his brother is prostrate; uniformed pomp sits clamorously astride his horse; and a little farther on, in the shadow of a dismantled home, a silent figure lies face downward in the sere grain.

God of the treasured plowshare!

Is it not more holy than men shall turn their steel to the brown earth's breast than to the breast of their brothers? Is it not more to thy will that this homely blade shall create life rather than destroy it? There is a little smithy shop down yonder elm-lined road; and as we passed, his anvil echoed to the sweet, ringing melody of progress. It was as clear and as spiritual as the ringing of Sabbath bells. Doves circled about the crumbling roof; and in the very heart of the doorway's dark, a spot of living fire danced. Thy voice was the voice of the industrious anvil; thy voice the voice of the wheeling doves as they brooded over the young; thy voice the voice of a plowshare being beaten into a steel hand which was destined to mark a fertile course along the eastern valley. And this was all very wonderful, very reposeful, very tender and dignified and good. Draw thine arms close about us, that the anvil shall sing no stern song of swords in the making; and kindle the smithy's fire for fresh crops and for planted things as yet unborn.

God of the deep furrows!

As we stand beside the broad furrow, a hill's bright crest hides the man and plow and horse from our view. The subdued sound of his clucking, sing-song chatter to his horses and their intermittent neighs come back to us on the summer air. And we can hear as well the straining creak of harness and plow, and wrens quarreling over a worm bared to view. Let the martial strains of war, however glorified, break in upon this medley of happiness.

God of the approaching twilight!

Our walk back through the little streets of the little village is bounded on all sides by bountiful evidences of thy guiding Spirit. We turn squarely away from the reeking infantry and the cannon and the stench of unholy murder; we turn from our sister-land's low sob of mortal agony; and the evening wind, blowing across miles of dogwood and wistaria and gardens of white roses, sweeps full into our faces, warm and sweet and tinged with the reposeful incense of woodland night. How good to be here—to peer in at patient housewives as they spread the red supper-cloths; to see small children with great yellow bowls of foaming milk; to hear gates clang melodiously as men return from the fields; to count, one by one, the yellow squares of lighted window; to hear the dull bleat of the calf and the deep-throated complaint of a sick Holstein at the white bars of the pasture fence; to hear, above your head, as you stop and listen reverently, the low, sleepy, twittering chatter of innumerable birds, as they draw the night about them and wait for dawn to lift the wet leaves from about their drowsy heads; to be in the heart of a wonderful silence and get to know that life is everywhere about you, its multitudinous tongue hushed to a shadowy monotone; to realize that another day will tap this well of peace and from it will pour forth sunshine and songs of women and birds, and the golden wine of dawn; and that peace is in the land.

At the front in the Good Fight

—PREACHING THE WORD BY TRACTS. The prodigious total of 317,830,428 tracts published and distributed by the American Tract Society in the ninety years of its existence represents only one phase of its beneficent activities. The society has been celebrating its ninetieth anniversary, which occurred May 12. As part of the exhibit of its work in that long period it gives the totals of its various publications; besides tracts the society issued 35,018,140 volumes—its aim is to overcome evil literature with good—and this huge output covers practically "the whole range of human experience"; and periodicals, pictorial wall-rolls, leaflets, cards and other publications brought the society's total product up to 791,142,050 copies in these active ninety years. The Tract Society's Exhibit at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, San Francisco, is attracting much attention through the distribution of tens of thousands of tracts gratuitously. It is truly an evangelistic campaign. The missionary colporteurs at Ellis Island state that the great need of all the immigrants is a largely increased supply of Christian literature in their native tongues. Sixty millions of our nearly 100,000,000 population are not attending either church or mission. Among the publications issued from the home office of the society are books in over a score of foreign languages, including German, French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Welsh, Dutch, Norwegian, Hungarian, Finnish, Danish, Polish, Armenian, Hebrew and Chinese. These publications are of inestimable service in the work among the immigrants, for whom scarcely any other Christian literature is provided, but thousands of whom are thus enabled to read "in their own tongue the wonderful works of God," and to whom the message of the Gospel is thus presented on the very threshold of the new land which they have chosen.

—A FIGHT WORTH WHILE. The shameful facts that are brought to light in the unending fight of the World's Purity Federation against social immorality prove the existence in this country of a tremendous peril to the welfare of young girls who leave home for "wider opportunities" in the cities and girls who come to this country unattended, from foreign lands. The ninth international congress of the Purity Federation takes place at the Panama-Pacific Exposition July 18-24. The white slave traffic, still a terrible blot upon our fair land, and all the various phases of the work to promote the highest standard of private and public morals (which is of course the standard set by Jesus Christ himself), will be discussed by world leaders in this heroic crusade. It is confidently expected that the congress will result in decidedly advanced steps, because of the number and influence of those who will participate. Every clergyman in the world is expected to refer to the subject in his pulpit on Sunday, July 18, which the federation has designated as Purity Sunday. Where this Sunday is inconvenient for the purpose, the one preceding or following may be observed. Special programs containing valuable information can be obtained by sending a two-cent stamp to the World's Purity Federation at La Crosse, Wis. The congress should certainly be attended by every Christian who is visiting the exposition at the time.

THIS IS A MONUMENT TO THE VICTORIES OF PEACE

SHALL WE NOW ERECT THESE OF WAR INSTEAD?

THE SHAME OF OUR NATION

BY EDWARD LYELL FOX

WE HAVE a new business in America. It is very profitable. Every day it is losing us friendships—individual friendships, national friendship. This business is making money out of killing men. It pays much better than making, say, ordinary tools. The profits are 100 per cent. and more. Of course, that over in Europe some poor soldier is bleeding his life away, makes not the slightest difference. Business is business.

I have tried to reduce this down. I have tried to find out how many men an American manufacturer can kill to make $100,000. That is a nice profit, $100,000. It means good business. Every time one of our manufacturers makes $100,000 selling ammunition to Europe, he kills more than 78,000 men. The cost of manufacture of a shrapnel shell is $9. That's the cost of manufacture, loaded and with fuses. It is sold for $18 to $21 per shell. That is the best quotation of the American manufacturer. The profit per shell is $9, sometimes more. A shrapnel shell contains 250 bullets about the size of your thumb nail. Carefully compiled military statistics of this war show that 3 per cent. of the bullets in a shrapnel shell are fatal. That is, seven men are killed by the bursting of a shrapnel. The profit to the American manufacturer on that shell is $9. That is getting down to seven dead men for $9.

Twenty-four hours after I complete this article, I shall see a steamer for Europe. I shall see again blood-soaked uniforms, mangled limbs, and all the ghastly records of war. But I shall see it this time from a new viewpoint. Each soldier whom I see torn apart with shell will mean that some business man has made some money. I wish I had time to run through the list of stockholders and officers of certain companies in this country. I can only guess that a few of them have been identified with humanitarian things. It is ever thus.

In Milwaukee there is a concern known as the Ellis Chalmers Manufacturing Company. They are now engaged in the manufacture of one and one-half million shells. They are now engaged in the manufacture, if all the shells are successfully made, of the murder of hundreds of thousands of men. There is the Harrisburg Pipe Bending Company. Its works are turning out shells. American Locomotive is making 3,000,000 shrapnels. American Tube & Stamping Company is busy filling shrapnel contracts. The Baldwin Locomotive people are making two million shells for Russia. The Bridgeport Brass Company is turning out small arms. The Bridgeport White Metal Company has a sub-contract from a Canadian concern. The Brill Company is making shells. So are Cramps Shipbuilding Company and The Crucible Steel Concern. Small arms ammunition is being turned out by the Severo Company of Chicago. The Fore River Ship Yards are making shells. Small arms ammunition is being turned out by the Hartford Brass Company. The Industrial Works of Bay City is making shrapnel. So is the New York Air Brake Company. Heavy shells and fuses are being manufactured in the plant of the Scoville Company. The Lenox Steel Company is busy with bayonets. The Toledo Machine Tool Company and the Trawler Engineer Company are making shrapnel. The Vermont Farm Machinery Company is making shells. The Westinghouse Airbrake Company has a contract for 2,000,000 rifles and the Westinghouse Electric Company for 3,000,000 shells. The Union Twist Reel Company is making steel arrows, which are dropped from aeroplanes. When they hit a man's skull they go clear to the ground.

I have only named the companies which are not regular arms and ammunition companies. These concerns have made money, good money in peace times manufacturing the articles which were the object of their incorporation. Now they are making blood money.

Every big steel plant in the United States has, since the war began, opened benzol plants for the output of toluol and phenol. These are the two most powerful constituents for high explosives. It costs fifty cents a gallon to make toluol. The manufacturers are selling it today at $4.75. It costs twenty cents a gallon to make phenol. It is selling for $1.10. With such profits, a manufacturer has to possess pretty high ideals to refrain from turning his plant into a house of murder. There are some manufacturers in this country with ideals. When an agent of a foreign government offered an order of 300,000,000 brass shells to the Aldrich Manufacturing Company of Buffalo stipulating that one quarter of the contract price be paid in cash advance, President Aldrich said:

"The manufacture of munitions of war by an American firm for foreign warring nations is a direct violation of the principles of neutrality. I shall not help to prolong the war."

If the American manufacturers were to stop sending ammunition to Europe this war would be over by Christmas. If they stopped sending it to Mexico, that war would stop instantly. They hold the war in their hands. But more than half a billion dollars worth of orders are on the books of concerns in this country—and business is business. Seven dead men for $9 profit. That's the proposition. Let us see where this is leading us.

SPEAKING at the banquet of the Lord Mayor of London in 1910, Asquith, Premier of Great Britain, said: "The most tragic paradox of our time is that in almost every country one of the most prominent topics of parliamentary debate is the enormous expenditure upon armaments.... Each country by itself is helpless to arrest the progress of armament.... We seem to be in a vicious circle."

The circle was the armament ring. The ring is not national: it is international. It is not Teutonic; you cannot blame it on German militarism. You cannot dismiss it by saying Krupps. You have to say the Skoda-Armstrong-Schneider-Bethlehem Steel Company. You have to mention all the big ordnance manufacturers of the world. They compose a circle. Krupps is a segment of it. French manufacturers fill a good piece of the circle, so do English, so do Americans. The careless and common thing is to say that Germany wants war so that the Krupps can make money. Of course, that is absurd. Why not England wants war, so that the British firms, Armstrong, Vickers, Beardmore, John Brown, Cammell, Laird and all their interlocking companies can make money? Why not say that France wants war, so that Monsieur Schneider can double his dividends? Why not write that the United States wants war so that Charles Schwab of the Bethlehem Steel Company, the United States Steel Company, and all the powder and small arms manufacturers of America, can make money? The point is, no people should be blamed for the pernicious activities of private manufacturers among them. Germany is not Krupps; Austria is not Skoda; Great Britain is not Armstrong or Vickers; nor is the United States Mr. Schwab.

This brings us to a situation:

In 1901 business with the armament people was not very good. Dividends were only 15 per cent. Like some of the manufacturers, the armament people never think business is good unless they are making 50 per cent. on their money. Of them all, Krupp was prospering on a gigantic scale; prospering, mark you, in peace times! Continually changing the equipment of the army, the German Government following its usual custom gave the work where it

CONSECRATION

A SERMON BY PASTOR H. P. ECKHARDT*

TEXTS: "Consecrate yourselves today to the Lord." Ex. 13: 21; "Who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?" 1 Chron. 29: 25.

CONSECRATION is the English rendering of several words in the original, among them one meaning to separate and set apart, another to devote or dedicate, and a third to bring a fullness of offerings. By combining these thoughts, which are in their essence one, we get the full meaning of the word. Consecrate, then, means, first, to separate and set apart; secondly, to devote or dedicate fully and wholly. Thus, to consecrate a new church building means to set it apart from every other use and dedicate it to the worship of Jehovah. To consecrate one's life to the Lord means to separate it from the service of sin, self, the world and all that is of the world, and then to solemnly dedicate it to God and his service.

Such consecrated men were the Nazarites of the Old Testament. They were entirely set apart and dedicated to Jehovah and his service. And in token of their consecration they allowed their hair to grow untouched by the razor. In this manner the Nazarite could be distinguished from his fellowmen. When others saw him they would say, "That man is a Nazarite, God's man, set apart, consecrated to the Lord."

What Consecration Means

Such consecrated men were the apostles. When Jesus found John and Andrew, Peter and Philip, and said unto them, "Follow me!" they immediately forsook all, and, following him, dedicated their lives to his service. Such a consecrated man was Paul. When he heard the voice of Jesus calling, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" he came apart, separated himself from the former life of unbelief and persecution, and offered himself to Jesus, saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And when the years of his service were drawing to the end, and the aged apostle was languishing in imprisonment in Rome, he wrote in his letter to the Philippians: "To me, to live is Christ." That expressed the sole motive and purpose of his life.

Such consecrated people were those faithful women, standing on Calvary, beneath the cross, faithful to the end, of whom it is written that they "followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him."

And now comes the call of our text to you and me: "Consecrate yourselves today to the Lord." That is a demand of our Lord that we separate ourselves—our heart, our mind, our life, our possessions—from all that would hinder us in following Christ; and that we dedicate ourselves fully and wholly to God and his service. It is a call from on high to follow Jesus day by day in sincere devotion to him, asking ere we take each step, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

But the text does not ask you to consecrate yourselves to the Lord today as though it were a new and hitherto unknown experience. No, every true Christian is a consecrated person. The consecration took place in his regeneration. But what we should do—and what our Master expects us to do—is to increase and grow in our consecration. As a good tree increases in age, its roots strike deeper, its trunk grows stronger, its branches spread and its fruits multiply. So it should be with our consecration. We should make it deeper, more thorough and more fruitful as we go on in our fellowship with Christ.

God only knows how much the church of our day has need of thoroughly consecrated Christians, who are set apart, sincerely devoted to God, spiritually minded, and willing to give their active services to him and his kingdom! Who can fail to observe the menace of indifference, lukewarmness and worldliness that is threatening the Christian Church? You remember the solemn words of our Lord to the church at Laodicea: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth" (Rev. 3: 15, 16). What was it our Lord saw in the Laodicean Church that caused him to utter this solemn complaint? It was lukewarmness, indifference concerning the things of God and the immortal soul—an intolerable spiritual condition. And this evil was not confined to that age. We have it with us today. It is striking at the very heart of the church.

Then think of the menace of worldliness in our materialistic and pleasure-mad age. A man living near Chautauqua Lake, N. Y., one day was watching an eagle as it gracefully soared over the lake, when it suddenly darted with lightning rapidity toward the water, catching in its talons a great fish, weighing probably ten pounds. Slowly the bird rose in the air with its prey dangling below, until it reached a height of nearly a thousand feet. But evidently the fish was too heavy and the eagle began slowly to sink. Then it tried to shake off its prey; but its claws were so firmly imbedded in the fish that it could not release its hold. And so it sank down into the water and both were drowned.

How often is the Christian overcome by worldliness in the same way! It fastens itself deeper and deeper upon him until at last it brings him down out of the heights of strong faith, warm love and true spirituality. In like manner, worldliness weakens the church and brings it down out of its lofty heights. When worldliness fastens itself upon the church it paralyzes it. When worldliness enters the front door of the church, power and vitality and spirituality must pass out through the rear door. When the spirit of worldliness becomes the predominating one in an individual Christian, in a congregation or in the church at large, then their power is gone!

What we need today is consecrated, spiritual-minded Christians, who are willing to thoroughly dedicate themselves to the blessed Lord and his service—Christians who are like a Gulf Stream in this world. The Gulf Stream with its current of warm water runs through the ocean at certain places; it is a thing separate from the rest of the waters; in the ocean but not of it; running through it without mixing with the surrounding cold waters; retaining its own peculiarity and identity; and spreading its influence in every direction to make the climate milder.

The Results of Consecration

So with the truly consecrated Christians. They are separated and set apart. They are in the world, yet not of the world. They are a peculiar people because they belong to Christ, and as such are guided by principles that differ radically from those by which the world around them lives. They make their consecration manifest everywhere: in their churches, in their daily walk and vocation, in their labors of love and mercy, and even in their pleasures and recreations. They are different. Their entire lives are different. Even the world cannot fail to recognize the difference, and say, "Those people are God's people, set apart." "The true Christian," says Martin Luther, "is like the sun, which pursues his noiseless track, and everywhere leaves the effect of his beams in blessings upon the world around him."

"Who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?" That question contains the appeal that I would press home upon every heart. The question is as to your willingness. Do you not owe it to him? "Ye are bought with a price," says St. Paul. And what a price it was! Not gold and silver, "but the precious blood of Christ, as a lamb without blemish and without spot." And so you are his—his own property. He bought you.

During the days of slavery in the South a big-hearted man one day bought a slave, who had been mistreated by a cruel master. Then the purchaser turned to the slave and said, "I give you your freedom. You may go." But the grateful slave fell at the kind man's feet and said, "Massa, I belong to you. You pay big price for me. Let me just go with you and serve you till I die. I love you, Massa."

And so Christ bought you and me with a price. He purchased and won us from the cruel power of sin, death and the devil. And the price was his own life's blood. "This is a faithful saying worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Should we not move us to cast ourselves at the dear Master's feet, and there in faith and love to consecrate ourselves and our all to him and his service until our lives shall end?

Let us learn a lesson from the bloody battles of Europe. Millions of men, at the call of their country, have forsaken business, family, comforts, pleasures, and have consecrated their lives and wholly to the fatherland. Hundreds of thousands have willingly laid down their lives on the battle-field—for their country. Hundreds of thousands are today lying crippled and maimed in the hospitals, and are willingly enduring untold suffering—for their country. Millions of men have passed through a hard winter and spring in the trenches, and even now are willingly passing through the hell of this awful war—for their country. Hundreds of thousands of wives and mothers have given their husbands and sons into the jaws of death—for their country. And all this is counted the duty of every loyal citizen to his fatherland.

Should we not be willing to do as much for our Father in heaven, the King of kings and for our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave his life for us? Unless we are willing, can we be accounted faithful sons and daughters of the King and loyal citizens of his heavenly commonwealth? Who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?"

The Master of the House

But our consecration must be thorough. The door-bell of my home rings. A stranger is standing there. He is invited to enter. He is given a seat in the reception room. He is perhaps given a place at the dinner table. But more of the house is not opened to him. But when the father, after a lengthy absence, returns home and rings the bell, the door is thrown wide open to him. The entire house has been made ready to receive and welcome him. Every room is open to him; yea, every secret corner with its dark corners. There is no part of the home, from attic to cellar, that is closed against him; for it is all his very own.

So we must consecrate ourselves fully and wholly to our Lord. We must take him not mere into a little part of our lives. We must give him not merely a part of our heart's trust and love and service and obedience. But we must welcome and take him into every nook and corner of ourselves, dedicating ourselves thoroughly to him and withholding nothing. For we are his own—his very own.

Friends, you are going to give the service of your heart and life to some one. There is one thing that, consciously or unconsciously, you are running your highest aim and purpose in life, and towards which you today are directing the consecrated energies of your mind, heart and endeavors. What is it? Who is it?

"Consecrate yourselves to the Lord." You may have other aims in life—legitimate aims; but above all aims must be Christ, your dear Lord, who bought you with a price.

Who, then, is willing—now—to consecrate himself to the Lord, and to solemnly pledge himself, "To me to live is not gold, not pleasure, not life—but Christ?"

"Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to thee.
Take my hands and let them move
At the impulse of thy love.

"Take my will and make it thine;
It shall be no longer mine;
Take my heart; it is thine own;
It shall be thy royal throne.

"Take my love, my God, I pour
At thy feet its treasure store;
Take myself, and I will be Ever, only, all for thee."

DAILY MEDITATION

The Mysterious Sword

SUNDAY, July 18. Isaiah 31: 8. "Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of man; and the sword, not of man, shall devour him." When we have counted the material arms upon the field, we have not told the full tale of contending elements. There is a devouring sword, not of the grasp of man, and it is fearfully active in our midst but sure destruction. That invisible sword can slay invisible things. For instance, it can kill the vitality of a man's hope, and sink him in despondency and despair. It can cut the sinews of courage in the very thick of the conflict, and make him shake with fear. It can pierce the trench of his judgment, and cause him to wander in self-deception and delusion. It can maim men who have received no wound, and it can make the naturally mighty helpless as babes. "The sword, not of man, shall devour him."

The invisible sword is the ally of the truth, and the antagonist of iniquity. It is even so in the individual life. The soul that is leagued with iniquity is being devoured by the sword. Nay, it is the ordination of the holy Lord that evil itself becomes a sword and does deadly work in the soul. Evil shall slay the wicked." And so it often happens that the apparent instrument of a man's prosperity is at the same time the instrument of a deep ruin. The falsehood that built a fortune leaves the angel in the soul. "The wages of sin is death." The evil-doer cannot escape this sword.

At this invisible sword is also active in the corporate life of states. When a nation enthrones iniquity, when it harbors injustice, when it exalts itself into a crusade, when it makes material interests supreme, "a sword, not of man, shall devour it." The sword can no more be escaped than a man God himself. The nation may remain for a time in apparent strength, as the beams of a house which have been hollowed out by the white ants may seem to be perfectly whole, but the coming day will reveal that its inner strength is hollow and dead. And what shall it profit a nation if it gains the whole world and lose its soul? Or what shall a nation give in exchange for its soul?

How God Inspires His Faithful Workers

MONDAY, July 19. Isaiah 40: 12-31. "They sit at wait on the Lord shall renew their strength." The margin suggests as an alternative or "new" the word "change." Directly we begin to wait on the Lord, a great change passes over us. We do the same things, but we do them from a new standpoint, and with a novel supply of strength. It is no longer in our old strength, but in a new strength, not only in our experience but in that of our hearers. We pass along the same roads, but at a new speed. Not now with our own power, but with electricity; not now with the strength of man, but the divine. May we not say that at the instant the apostles changed their strength? It is to them they had wrought under the inspiration and the help of the Master, who went beside them, but thenceforth the Holy Spirit rested on them and empowered them; the strength of each was the strength of ten.

The remarkable thing about God's power is that it is given to the faint and to those that have no strength. To these alone he increaseth strength. It is not that there is no room for human wisdom or influence in the kingdom of God. There is room for us, learned in all the wisdom of Egypt, and of Chaldea, educated at the feet of Gamaliel; but the invitation to all who are greatly gifted is to trust their gifts and rely on their natural resources. If they lay these at the feet of Christ, confessing that they need him, that they need the fire to end the dull black coal of their possibilities, that they need the outpouring of his Spirit-power to purify the human spirit, and sometimes the almighty spirits by which the human is dominated so that he can use them. He loves to put the precious ointment in alabaster boxes, and the water of life in vessels of gold. Be sure that you change from the old to the new; it is easy to descend from the old to the new.

Begin to Grow in Grace Now

TUESDAY, July 20. II Peter 3: 18. "But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Thomas à Kempis, in the "Imitation of Christ," that book so rich in spiritual suggestion, says: "If each year should see one fault rooted out from us, we should go quickly on to perfection." In these days of "big business" and "quick results," when material changes of enormous magnitude happen almost over night, we are inclined sometimes to forget that spiritual or moral development, the mastery of ourselves and the progress toward understanding God, are matters of slow as well as vital growth—not to be manufactured suddenly. "Grow in grace," is the injunction.

Because we cannot change our disagreeable traits immediately is no reason for our not making a beginning. One fault overcome a year is Thomas à Kempis's rule. "I can do better than that," you say. Well, do we do better than that? What weakness of temper or disposition have I rooted out and permanently killed this last year? What sin of the imagination, what hatred of evil, or thoughtless habit of speech about a neighbor, have I buried forever in the grave of the last twelve months?

"The only way to write a book," said a famous author, "is to begin to write." The only way to secure character and spiritual ability is to begin today the growth in grace—begin to plant and cultivate some new virtue that will crowd out and destroy some old sin.

Many Folds, but Only One Flock

WEDNESDAY, July 21. John 10: 1-16. "One flock, one Shepherd." There is a tender sympathy and companionship between the shepherd and his sheep, engendered by weeks of lonely fellowship in the mountains or the pastures of the wilderness. They know his voice. They instinctively realize that they are safe under his protection. His rod and staff comfort them, the one being the reminder that by his crook he will extricate them from holes or crevasses, and that by his club he will paralyze the beast of prey. They follow him, however rough the road of the paths of righteousness or dark the descent into the valley of shadow. And that constant fellowship is the Lord's ideal for our relationship with himself.

The shepherd is the center of the flock. Each of the sheep has a claim on him; and as all approximate to him, they approximate to each other. This is true of the church. Jesus is its Head, its Center, its Focal-point; and as we come into ever closer fellowship with him, we discover our unity with a multitude that no man can number, who have washed their robes and made them white in his blood. The Authorized Version used to translate these words: "There shall be one fold and one Shepherd." Our Lord never said such a thing, but that there should be one flock. There is a great difference between the two. If Jesus had said there shall be one fold, it would have meant that there would be only one form of church-government, and that all his followers must be comprehended within its rubrics. But you may have one flock in many different folds. The Presbyterians have a fold; and the Baptists; and the Methodists. But, thank God, there is one flock, even as there is one Shepherd; and if you belong to him, you are one with all who love him of every church.

The Saving Power of the Cross

THURSDAY, July 22. Colossians 1: 20. "Having made peace through the blood of his cross." The Cross has been made too difficult, too theological, too mystically far away for many of us. It has not been sufficiently a reminder of divine love; it has been too often a thing for church emblems and crucifixes, not frequently enough the sign of the surety of peace and power for the sinning soul.

The Cross should be set up, not on a distant hill in Palestine, but in the inner experience and struggle of our human everyday hearts, standing for hope and not for sorrow before every changing scene of our daily task-filled lives.

I sin, I forget my birthright; the page of my life's day that I had hoped to keep white and clean is blotted and sullied by my day's mistakes. "Oh, my mistakes! my mistakes!" cried a good man. "I am cast down. I say, 'what's the use?' Despair over my repeated lapses almost threatens to put out my faith at times. Then I remember the Cross; it stands there ever in my need, as another word for love, my heavenly Father's love; it is a message of peace and the news of an ever-recurring open door into the heart of God. I become again alert to renewed possibility. I say, 'God, I am sorry! I did not mean to lose sight of thy Son's Cross; I accept it anew, I take again thy forgiveness, thy love made vivid as never before through my sin and the need of it; I take thy promise of peace and undying affection, written there so clearly for me on those rough cross-arms, which bore thy final, thy greatest sign of care for me.'

What happens? I do not know. At least I cannot tell it in words that fully express the experience of a new and sweeping confession of sin into the ears of a God that loves unchangingly. It is like trying to paint a new sunrise, or express what comes rushing into the heart after a reconciliation with an earthly friend.

I only know that the clouds lift, the birds sing for me a sweeter song, and I am conscious of a new freedom to take up again the skein of life. I have entered anew into the kingdom of God, which is the kingdom of love. I have been saved by the Cross!

Our Sense of Hampering Limitations

FRIDAY, July 23. Colossians 4: 2-18. "Remember my bonds." The apostle was accustomed to dictate his thoughts to some faithful scribe, who took them down from his lips. But at the close he would take the pen from Luke or Tertius, or some other, and append his own signature or salutation. But so often when he looked at his handwriting and contrasted it with the elegant style of his young manhood, he said sadly: "My writing now is large and clumsy; but, I pray you, forgive it, because I am an ambassador in bonds, and these iron fetters impede the movements of my hands. I cannot do as I would."

Is there not a sense in which we are all in bonds? There is some disability which maims and hampers us. Our influence among men is apparently lessened and impeded by it. But we must beware of these fetters getting on our nerves. Let us dare to believe, as Paul did, that God's strength is magnified in our weakness, and let us glory in our fetters, believing that the very people to whom they bind us will be saved and blessed.

A lady was wishful to teach her little boy thoughtfulness to the disabled. She therefore invited a deformed child to spend the afternoon with him, taking care to caution her child against remarking on the poor hunched back. Leaving the two little lads together, she listened at the door, and to her consternation heard her son say to his visitor: "Do you know what you have on your back? It is the case that holds your wings. Some day God will cut it open, and then you will fly away and be an angel!" Yet the boy was perfectly right. Our disabilities contain our wings. Let us glory in our infirmities; they are the condition of Christ's strength.

The Broken Threads of Life

SATURDAY, July 24. Joshua 2: 21. "She bound the scarlet thread in the window." Christ gives us the thread of life, colored by his own precious blood. When the Sunday school lesson was upon this subject, John Wanamaker gave out fourteen hundred spools of scarlet thread to his scholars. One of the speakers to the school said: "Sometimes a Christian man loses the thread of life, or breaks it, and tries to restore the broken thread; but, my brothers, he cannot do it. The thread so lost will never be an unbroken thread again." General Howard, who was present, quickly replied, "No, no, my brother! We have a Saviour, a Mediator, an Emmanuel, who stands between us and the divine Father. He can re-tie the thread of life after it is broken, in such a way that you cannot detect the knot."

Bishop Fowler once said that when a parishioner called upon him in the morning as he was preparing his sermon it broke the thread of his discourse, and he could always feel the knot as he came to that part of his sermon. Human fingers cannot perfectly restore breaks, even among physical things; but our Creator and Saviour can give you a new thread of life, whole, perfect and white, as his own precious blood can make it. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." He is the perfect Redeemer, who can save unto the uttermost.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

CRANK ATTEMPTS MORGAN'S LIFE. Now that J. P. Morgan, second head of the banking house founded by J. Pierpont Morgan, deceased, has been shot, started the "Herald" on Saturday morning, June 2. The assailant, a deranged former instructor at Cornell University, named Holt, shot into Mr. Morgan's home at Glen Cove, L. I., about 9 o'clock, a. m., firing a shot with a revolver, the bullet, who managed to warn his employer then at breakfast with his family and Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the British ambassador, and other guests. Mr. Morgan, following the butler's warning but not guessing its import, was followed by Mr. Morgan, and presently caught by the main doorway and accosted him only to receive two bullets in his back at close range. The man was overpowered by Mr. Morgan and others and secured, and the body was put to bed, and later the wounds were examined by X-rays and pronounced likely to prove neither fatal nor even dangerous, though the wounded man is kept at rest by his physicians. A strong guard was subsequently placed all about the estate. Holt was taken into custody and confessed to having tried to blow up the Capitol at Washington on July 2 on Long Friday night, wrecked the Senate reception, room. His motive in attacking Morgan was to intimidate him into "stopping the exportation of arms and ammunition to Europe." He went well prepared with revolvers and dynamite, and a thorough but impracticable plan for bombing the capitalist to terms. Mr. Morgan's sudden appearance on the stairway upset the man's calculations. He is clearly insane. It is claimed that the man, who calls himself Frank Holt, is Erich Muenter, a former Harvard professor who disappeared in 1906 after his wife died of poisoning, and has since been a fugitive. This report seems unlikely to be confirmed. "Holt" claims American descent, and discusses his crimes and motives calmly, but denies intent to kill anybody in his campaign against the traffic in munitions. On Monday, July 5, at 8.50 P.M., while police officials at Police Headquarters, Center Street, New York, were investigating the attack, a dynamite bomb loaded with slugs was exploded, doing considerable damage to one entrance to the building, but injuring no one. This outrage at the very center of police power was supposedly by anarchists.

Late on July 3 Holt, who had made no revelations of his past life, killed himself in his cell when his guard was absent.

MEXICO'S EXILED RULER DIES. General Porfirio Diaz died in Paris July 2 at nearly 85 years of age. His wife, son, and daughter-in-law were the only persons present; two daughters are still in Mexico. He had been living in great simplicity. Five years ago Diaz was still Mexico's ruler, one of the greatest men of the century, and generally recognized as the savior of Mexico from semi-barbarism. He was one-eighth Indian. He became president at the age of 46. An heroic adventurer, he lived a thrilling life, and fought Mexico's battles against heavy odds. He ruled Mexico with an iron hand and a wise head, the country's one executive from 1876 to 1911, whereas 79 "preservatives" had preceded him and in the brief period since his retirement 10 have essayed to take his place. Diaz resigned as a result of the revolution under Madero, and left Mexico May 5, 1911.

FORMS NUCLEUS OF A NATIONAL MILITARY RESERVE. With the approval, it is stated, of President Wilson and Secretary of War Garrison, the government will provide special military training for camps of business men and others who care to devote a month to the purpose, some 1,000 Wall Street bankers, lawyers and brokers being expected to form the first such camp at Plattsburg Barracks, New York, under regular army officers this August. This camp has been organized as a result of a call sent out to 15,000 men by an intercollegiate committee which had its inception at a meeting of the Harvard Club. Camps are also in prospect for several other states. The men will be subjected to rigid military discipline, will use strictly military camp equipment, and will be instructed in the use of arms and in tactics. Certificates will be issued to those who see it through, and such men will be eligible for appointment as second lieutenants in a volunteer army in times of national crisis.

A PERPETUAL REMINDER OF AMERICAN SYMPATHY. Good crops of wheat and rye are being grown in Belgium from seed provided by the American Commission; and by arrangements with the German authorities, the crops are reserved for the civilian Belgian population. Similar arrangements may also be made respecting the potato crop, and the outlook is favorable for resumption on a wide scale of agricultural industries by the peasants.

NEW YORK CITY'S TRIFLE OF A LOAN. Bankers had to turn aside from billion dollar war loans June 29 long enough to glance over the specifications of a new municipal bond issue of $71,000,000 at 1 1/2 per cent., and send in their bids with little show as possible of exasperation over the interruption. The "house of Morgan" failed to get its interest up enough to secure any of the issue, the largest allotment falling to Kuhn, Loeb & Co. A $46,000,000 issue of fifty-year bonds to provide for revenue-producing improvements, and a $25,000,000 issue of fifteen-year bonds for other improvements, were subscribed for three times over, but by a much smaller number of bidders than is usual. The total premium for the bonds amounts to $1,903,309, and they will pay the investors a profit of approximately $118,000,000.

COMBINING AGAINST PROHIBITION. At their convention in Utica, N. Y., the State Liquor Dealers considered plans for combining all allied interests in a crushing assault upon the "ignorant, prejudiced and hypocritical" prohibition movement, and were assured by John J. Hanley of the American Federation of Labor that that organization would work with them. Incidentally ex-Secretary of State Bryan was bitterly attacked for his part in the prohibition cause. The United States Brewers' Association announces a national committee representing all liquor interests, to devise ways and means for assisting the police in regulating saloons, and to advocate various ethical regulations, the first among them being the elimination of objectionable practices; but it is to be feared the committee will not agree with temperance people that the most objectionable practice of all is the sale of intoxicating drinks.

PREFERS THE LAURELS OF PEACE. It is stated that Orville Wright, because of religious scruples against war, is wholly unlikely to lend a favorable ear to the suggestion made in an English newspaper that he be invited by the British Government to assume the direction of its great air fleet.

GIVES AWAY A WHOLE PROCESSION OF AUTOMOBILES. Saturday, June 26, on Riverside Drive, New York, the Rice Leaders of the World Association, an organization composed of about forty manufacturing concerns, representing as many industries, presented 12 Willys-Overland automobiles to that number of salesmen at the head of their profession for efficiency shown in a year's competition, and 180 Elgin gold watches specially designed to salesmen next in rank. With their winners in command, the long line of automobiles paraded through parts of the city. The unique event was followed by a dinner attended by the heads of many of the largest companies in the United States.

IN FOR LIFE. For the first time in our history the question has arisen, may army and navy officers resign at discretion? A number of ordnance officers have offered their resignations in order to accept positions with private munitions concerns, and the stampede threatened to become so serious the secretary of war sought the attorney general's advice as to the right of officers to demand that their resignations be accepted. The decision is that acceptance of such resignations rests solely with the President, who may refuse if he wish. He has since refused twenty requests for retirement. Manufacturers are reported to be offering fabulous sums for the services of army ordnance men.

PIONEER DYNAMITER DEAD. "O'Donovan Rossa"—Jeremiah O'Donovan—Irish revolutionist, introducer of dynamite and assassination into Ireland's home rule campaign, for twenty years exiled from the British dominions, for all his life England's implacable foe, though pardoned by Queen Victoria, died in St. Vincent's Hospital on Staten Island, June 29, aged 83. While serving sentence of penal servitude for life (afterward remitted), Rossa was elected to Parliament from the County of Tipperary. He was a "patriot" but no saint.

THE TRUER PREPAREDNESS. The National Security League requested the New York clergy to stimulate public approval of the League's campaign for increased armaments, etc., by preaching on the duty of preparedness July 4, and the American League to Limit Armaments thereupon sent the clergy an open letter, signed by eminent ministers, suggesting that "amid the many voices calling us to preparation, the churches may concentrate their voices on spiritual preparedness. 'Shall we not call upon our heavens in this crisis of the world's history,' says the letter, 'to see to it that the unconquerable idealism of America shall not be dulled by fear or greed or cowardice, that the daring of our forefathers who were willing to try a new experiment in government shall be matched by their sons who dare to attempt an international government by law, in our effort to express our love of country, we make clear we mean no hatred of other countries? The churches of New York stand for peace, not because of the suffering of their fear of bodily pain, but because of the moral and degeneracy which characterize it. To be soldiers of the demands a spiritual exaltation which does not hesitate at a personal sacrifice of ease or comfort or of life itself."

PROBABLY WON'T LET THE BOYS AND GIRLS ON THIS. A movement is taking substantial form to close the school summer vacation, educators and others argue statistics that juvenile delinquency is largely traceable to long period of idleness thrust upon the children at the close of the year. Careful investigation has shown that congestion in cities, immigration, are less of evils to children than this extended relaxation. Miss Jane Addams, Lindsey, ex-President Taft, Ernest K. Coulter, founder of the Big Brother movement, and other men and women who are interested in the child and of the nation at heart, are in line with the new movement.

HUERTA IS JAILED. Acting on new evidence of charges of conspiracy to violate the neutrality of the United States, General Huerta was arrested at El Paso July 1. He is placed in a cell, pending a hearing of his case July 12. He still asserts his innocence, and entertains little respect for the so-called freedom of this country. Huerta, who was arrested with Huerta in the distance when both were released under bond, had escaped to Mexico. He developed a new volitional character, expected. Grave reports from Mexico City, we do not order reigns and threatens the population have alarmed officials in Washington. Communication with the Mexican capital is very uncertain. A little possession of the children is imminent.

ACHIEVEMENT OF THE NEGRO. A national exposition is being held in Richmond, Va., from July 1 to 25, under the auspices of the Negro Historical and Industrial Association, to commemorate the achievements of the race during fifty years freedom. Congress appropriated $55,000 to assist the enterprise. The President has issued a proclamation urging the public to support the exposition in every way.

TRIED AND ACQUITTED ON THE WRONG CHARGE. The unspeakable advertisement of the Cleveland (Ohio) Automatic Machine Company, which appeared in the American Machinist and was reproduced with scathing comments in the Christian Herald of June 2 (horrible in its description of the poisoned shells which could be manufactured on its presses at one dollar per day) has brought both the Cleveland company and the trade paper into much unenviable notice. The Federal Department of Commerce investigated the matter, and declared the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company guilty of violating our neutrality laws or the laws of humanity, and stated that similar advertisements will not be published in future. The crime against humanity committed by the advertiser in the magazine named, consisted in trying to induce concern about the lathes by representing the shells they would turn out at a dollar a day per machine) as certain to deal out incalculable death in the most agonizing form to men in the trenches who "cannot be reached by medical skill in time to save them."

"HONEY SHUCK'S" PROUDEST DAY. It was a great day for Missouri and an especially memorable one for Bowling Green and the quiet little town of "Honey Shuck" near which on June 30, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, some five hundred guests stood under the big honey locust trees which surround the old homestead, to witness the wedding of Speaker James Clark's daughter, Genevieve, to James M. Thomson, New Orleans. There were present celebrities from many states. The state of Missouri was bidden, and responded in numbers as to make the event a record-breaker. It was a wedding in Arcadia. Never had Pike County set its eyes on such a wealth of gifts as those that were sent to the happy pair. From the House of Representatives there came presents that included chests of silver, rich table services, and a 250-diamond resplendent in its silver case. The President's gift was a Dutch silver compote, goblet-shaped with ring handle, engraved with American eagles and the bride's monogram. Hundreds of other gifts of gold and silver and crystal were on the table, the whole representing a fortune. Eighty guests, honor, gowned as Dresden shepherdesses, added to the picturesqueness of the scene. Old-fashioned hospitality marked the wedding supper, one feature of which was a menu of cakes baked by the women of Bowling Green and other towns.

CHINESE UNRECONCILED TO JAPAN'S TRIUMPH. Boycotts of Japanese goods on a wide scale have followed in China upon the heels of the surrender to Japan's demands for many patriotic societies have been formed to oppose the order of things. In consequence, the Japanese minister in China has intimated to that government that popular sympathy in Japan may force the latter government to strong measures.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG
MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON
SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Cost of the War

THE secretary of the Imperial German Treasury is quoted as having said in April in the Reichstag that the cost of the war for all belligerents was $375,000,000 a week. This would mean that the cost up to that time had been $13,000,000,000 for the eight months, or in excess of $15,000,000,000 to date. These figures are applied to the actual cost of war materials, soldiers' pay, transportation costs, foodstuffs, etc. Of course the actual cost of the war will never be known, because wastage and human misery and the colossal loss of life can not be accurately computed in the scale of money value.

But the London Economist goes so far as to predicate the war's cost through processes of estimates which embrace not only actual war expenditures but all the known collateral costs, including the economic value placed upon the lives of the soldiers lost in battle. The awful total is placed at $45,740,000,000. These figures were published about two months ago.

When will this frightful wastage stop? Where is it going to lead? Is it going to bankrupt the world? As the days go on, the cost increases. In April the cost was estimated at $375,000,000 a week. It is now estimated by Mr. Reginald McKenna, chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain, that the present cost of hostilities to the United Kingdom alone amounts to more than $15,000,000 every twenty-four hours. It is believed the cost of the war to Germany is as much as this, and, with the mounting costs to France and Russia added, will amount to more than $395,000,000 a week. This would probably mark the highest rate per week the cost will reach. It should probably rather decrease from now on, even if more European nations should be brought into the fray. But at the rate the war is costing at the present time, another year of conflict would mean a money cost of $16,380,000,000, which, added to the cost up to date, would mean a total cost of $31,000,000,000. This is many times more than all the gold in the world. It is more than ten times our own national debt, and about one-fifth the assessed valuation of all the property in the United States. The war has already cost, it is believed, more than all the other wars of history put together.

The recent authorization by the British Parliament of a loan of $5,000,000,000 and the statement of the chancellor of the exchequer that probably another $5,000,000,000 loan will have to be arranged before another year, and the recent $50,000,000 loan floated in this country by France, confront us with the query: How much have the belligerent nations borrowed so far since the war started? Germany has borrowed since September approximately $3,500,000,000; Great Britain, $2,500,000,000; France, $1,800,000,000; Russia, $1,065,000,000, and the neutral countries, which have been forced to raise money to protect their frontiers, have uttered loans amounting to $430,000,000, a total of $7,345,000,000. This does not include the recently authorized loans of Great Britain and France referred to above.

There is every probability that if this war lasts another twelvemonth, the belligerent nations will find it necessary to borrow many billions more. Where is the money coming from?

The Humorists and the Socialists

PROBABLY neither of the two groups mentioned in this heading would be complimented by being associated with the other, but when it comes to the big war, they belong together—both working for peace. It came to be recognized long ago that the jester often spoke the profoundest wisdom; and history also records the fact that the radical, enthusiastic reformers of one age often became the practical guides of the next.

When the great war is over, those who look back over the records of the struggle, the daily files of that time of blood, will observe the cartoons, the jests, the satires of the humorists, and the impassioned pleadings of the Socialists for peace, and say: "Both were right. Why did not kings and parliaments and peoples heed them?"

Walt Mason, incomparable rhymester, had this to say the other night:

Still Europe goes on killing her son—
With Bedlam mirth, as though a bogus shilling were all the lad was worth;
Her red repast she munches, her brave young men she craves,
As though they grew in bunches from out a flowered cart.

Death, the wisest teacher, is king beyond the seas; he says:
"Young men are cheaper than things that grow on trees; know all men by these presents, boys cheaper are than pheasants, and in the blood of peasants I'm walking to my knees." Does any one remember why nations went to war last August or September—what are they fighting for? A ten-cent duke was smitten, and all the kings, flea-bitten, reared up and yelled: "Tis written that blood must flow, be got!"

Goldberg had drawn the night before a hugely ridiculous number of his series, "Father was Right," showing a young man going off to war though his father said: "But, Julius, I served in the campaign of 1859 and I'm still wondering what the war was all about"; showing Julius again digging in the trenches with cannon balls raining on his head, and at last a crippled beggar, bearing the decoration of the wooden shoe, asking alms, and muttering: "Father was right."

The humorists will do more than all the other pacifists to keep America out of the war. They keep asking the question: "Why should we go in?" And to that question there is no sane answer.

As for the Socialists, their two brave manifestos in Germany, the last one officially passed by the censor, make what is the first really visible ray of hope in the black night of Europe's war. The German Socialists have been bitterly assailed by their comrades in neutral countries for voting the war credits last summer. They said then they did so in the belief that the integrity of the German nation was threatened. Since now, in their opinion, that integrity is no longer in serious jeopardy, they voice their earnest plea for peace, demanding that there be no annexation of foreign territory and calling upon their comrades of the other belligerents to join them in the demands to bring the war to an end.

Peace is reasonable. War is folly. May America preserve her reason and Europe speedily regain hers!

A Paean of the Press

ONE of the many interesting addresses at the recent convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in Chicago was this glowing eulogium of the daily press:

I Am the Newspaper

Born of the deep, daily need of a nation—I am the Voice of Now—the accurate spirit of the Times—Monarch of things that Are.

My "cold type" burns with the fire-blood of human action. I am fed by arteries of wire that girdle the earth. I drink from the cup of every living joy and sorrow. I sleep not—rest not. I know not night, nor day, nor season. I know no death, yet I am born again with every morn—with every noon—with every twilight. I leap into fresh being with every new world's birth.

Those who created me cease to be—the brains and heart's-blood that nourish me go the way of human dissolution. Yet I live on—and on.

I am Majestic in my Strength—Sublime in my Power—Terrible in my Potentialities—yet as democratic as the ragged boy who sells me for a penny.

I am the consort of kings—the partner of capital—the brother of toil. The inspiration of the hopeless—the right arm of the needy—the champion of the oppressed—the conscience of the criminal. I am the epitome of the world's Comedy and Tragedy.

My Responsibility is Infinite. I speak and the world stops to listen. I say the word and battle flames the horizon. I counsel peace and the war-lords obey. I am greater than any individual—more powerful than any group. I am the dynamic force of Public Opinion. Rightly directed, I am a Creator of Confidence. A builder of happiness in living. I am the Backbone of Commerce. The Trail-Blazer of Prosperity. I am the teacher of Patriotism.

I am the hands of the clock of Time—the clarion voice of Civilization.

I am the Newspaper.

This is the paean of the ideal daily—the newspaper as it should be. It smacks of the vivid style of Kernan of the Okolona States, who introduced the "paragraphic punch" in American journalism. It has also a strong reminiscent flavor of Senator Ingalls' famous panegyric on "Opportunity," with the difference, however, that while the average reader, swept along with the torrent of Ingalls' eloquence, yields approval to every utterance, he who reads Mr. Finn's brilliant production feels that, though it is admirable in a literary sense, it is far from being in accordance with the reality. Between the ideal and the actual newspaper there is a wide chasm. The latter is today a thing of many limitations. Even if not partisan and bound to the chariot wheels of a political faction, it usually has many interests to serve of a character that make complete freedom of action and utterance an impossibility.

Every one who knows anything of the subject must smile at the enthusiasm which ascribes such tremendous potentialities to the press as the Chicago eulogist enumerates. How often do the publishers, the money magnates, the greedy corporations, the political wirepullers, the exploiters of the defenseless classes, the advocates of unjust legislation, find their ablest champions and apologists in the daily press! Is there a single scheme of any great magnitude for exploiting the public which has failed to command its support? And today, when we find the press presenting the real views of the people, or the views of an interested minority, in the great crisis through which the nation is passing? Happily, there are bright and shining exceptions—first, fearless journals that still cling loyally to the old-time tradition which holds that the press is the palladium of a nation's liberty. To these we render all honor! May their number increase and their influence and prosperity grow with the passing years.

The Sting of Death

IT SOMETIMES happens that one grows mature life without having been called upon to face the loss by death of any member of his home circle. When such an experience meets at last and he must stand beside the dead form of one whom he has loved, the grief and dismay and bewilderment, so terribly new, are likely to overwhelm him. Notwithstanding Christian faith and Christian training he may be swept, for minutes or hours or days, completely off his feet. There is mental and nervous shock, the utterly new sensations are so intense that clear thinking and calm praying are difficult. He is conscious only of the agonizing longing to see the dear eyes open again, to hear again a word from the closed lips, to feel the tender touch of the loved hand upon his brow. He finds himself speaking to the strange, still form as if the ears must hear and the lips must answer. And as he realizes that they cannot, he comes face to face with a hopeless despair.

Then reason and faith assert themselves. He sees how absurd it is to consider that this silent body marks indeed the end of the life he has loved. Is this the end of that pure character, that noble spirit? Is this the end of all the loves and the gifts and all the attainments of the life that seemed to have stopped? Is this what has indeed happened to his friend—that all these things have come to an end, here in this cold, silent, unresponsive tomb of clay?

All his reason and all his faith rise up to answer "No." This is not the end. This cannot be the end. The friend he knew is his friend still. The character has been untouched by death, the gift have been only enlarged and given wider opportunity. The loves of that life have but been intensified. The spirit has been set free—and may be even greater than before. There comes a new sense of companionship, a new sort of communion. He does not address the dead ears nor expect a message from the dead lips. With the new sense of companionship, with the new vision of his friend's new person, it would be unkind to wish the spirit back to that narrow prison house, beautiful though it may have been. His friend still has power to understand and love, and listen, and—perhaps—to speak.

Then the pages of the old Book are flooded with new light and the truths of the old faith gather new life and power. "She is not dead, but sleeping." "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my sayings he shall never see death." "Neither earthly nor life shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." "Death is swallowed up in victory." "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The close of the wonderful fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians in which Paul meets an unquenchable the taunts of death has precisely the right and fitting note—Back to work. After such experience the rest of life must not be spent in mourning. The look is forward, not back. Other men know of the Gospel's power; others must be helped. Life must be made glad and sound for man and death made powerless. So Paul writes at the close of his resurrection chapter: "Therefore, my brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Doll Has Double Face

A PATENT has recently been granted for a new toy for girls. It is a doll, or rather two dolls in one. The head has two faces opposite to each other, and entirely different feature and expression. What a picture of life that double-faced doll! The woman who instructs the servant to say to the visitor she is not at home when she is, or who says to the one calling to her "I am so glad to see you," when she can hardly tolerate her for a minute; the man who has toned words and fulsome flattery for another man's face, and expressions of ridicule and contempt the moment the back is turned; the man with the pious look when he has on his "Sunday-going clothes," but the features of the sly fox when he has on his everyday working suit—all these have their illustration in the new doll with a double face. Fortunately, there are many men and women who have one face, the expression of which is true, beautiful, good, and eliae. The double-faced people for the doll typified are thus addressed: "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners and purify your hearts, ye out-minded." (James 4: 8.)

Ellen Wilson Memorial Fund

MOVEMENT which is of much interest to the women of the whole country and especially of the South is the Ellen Wilson Memorial Fund for the Christian Education of Mountain Youth. No more beautiful memorial could have been devised, since the education of the young people of the mountain districts of the South was very near the heart of Mrs. Wilson. When Mrs. J. J. Hughes of Rome, Georgia, started the memorial plan before Miss Margaret Wilson, President Wilson's sister, a letter of grateful appreciation, in which the following extracts are included: "We have had a little family conference, and I want to say for my husband as well as for myself how deeply we appreciate the action of the conference you held at Montreal, and how glad I am to make the suggestion you asked for. My own judgment would be that it would be best to raise a fund which would be an endowment, the interest of which should be used to pay the way through school for mountain boys and girls—because I know what Mrs. Wilson would have done if she had had the means and opportunity. She was paying for the education of several herself, from the year. It might be called the Ellen Wilson Fund for the Christian Education of Mountain Youth. I cannot say how much I am touched by this idea of the women concerned. It gives me a certain kind of joy." The memory of Mrs. Wilson's true character, life and benevolent service is like a cloud of fragrant incense over the nation. In this memorial to Mrs. Wilson and other tributes there is illustrated the fact that the memory of the just is blessed." (Prov. 10: 7.)

Joseffy, Famous Pianist, Dead

PAUL JOSEFFY, the celebrated piano virtuoso, who had of late years retired from the stage and devoted himself to teaching and to music, died suddenly at his home in New York City, June 25. The pianist was born in Hungary in 1852. When quite young he studied under Liszt in Budapest, and entered the Leipzig Conservatory, being under E. F. Wenzel and Moscheles. In 1868 he went to Berlin, where he studied under Liszt. Later he was a pupil of Liszt, with whom he spent the summers of 1870 and 1871 in Weimar. In 1872 he made his first public appearance in Berlin, and then gave concerts in the great centers of Europe, attracting the notice and commanding the enthusiastic favor of the public and the best musical critics. Joseffy came to the United States in 1879 and has made his home here since. He instantly took his place in his profession in orchestra and otherwise in the great cities of the country as one of the foremost musicians of his time, which position he has held for more than a generation. He produced some notable original compositions. How much joy and benefit he has given the world! Instrumental as well as vocal music was employed in the tabernacle and temple services from the very beginning. In repairing the temple, men of unusual musical ability were appointed to organize that department of the service. They are thus referred to: "And other of the Levites, all that had skill of instruments of music." (II Chron. 34: 12.)

No Time to Be Sick

FREDERICK BIRKMER, a street sweeper in New Rochelle, N. Y. was at his task in front of the home of Supreme Court Justice Martin J. Keogh. He backed into the path of a motorcycle, which struck him and fractured his skull. They worked over him for twenty minutes and restored him to consciousness. As they were about to lift him into

ONLY WOMAN MAIL CARRIER

ADA PEARL, of Weathersburg, Ky., is said to be the only woman mail carrier in the United States. Her round, rosy face, and her healthy and happy. She advises other women to be that kind of woman, to be clean and to health and beauty. Women can now be taught to make the profession, business and careers of life. Time and experience will add wisdom, adaptation to these vocations; but the one sphere which is the richest, and in which the truest happiness is found, is the home, where she is a queen, with a beauty and power above that of earthly potentates. Most to be envied and most happy is that woman who is called to the highest earthly eminence and usefulness—that of Christian wifehood and motherhood—and who loyally obeys that call. She answers the description of the wise man: "A woman who fears the Lord, she will be honored, but not by the sword." (Prov. 31: 30.)

the ambulance to take him to the hospital, he broke away from them, and seizing his broken broom, he said: "I haven't time to be sick." When his wound was dressed at the hospital, he started to leave, saying: "I must go back to work. I can't afford to miss a day." It is one of the tragedies of our modern industrial life, that so many persons have only one day's wages between them and want. As men get wiser and more just, there will be a better adjustment of our industrial inequalities, so that men can take a day off for rest now and then, and a day to be sick, if affliction should come. There are also personal human limitations of one kind or another, reducing the earning power, which benevolence must take into account. The hard struggle was on in Christ's day, and there were many poor, and he told us plainly how to treat them. Let the words of the prophet be truthfully spoken of society and the individual in imitation of Jehovah: "Thou hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in his distress." (Isa. 25: 4.)

Philippine School Children at Play

THE Philippine Islands are a group in the South Pacific, numbering over 3,000, great and small, 1,000 miles long and 600 miles wide at the broadest place. About 340 of the islands only are inhabited, the population aggregating nine or ten millions of people, ranging all the way from civilized to half-civilized and barbarous. There has been a wise and successful administration of the government under the United States' rule in the executive, judicial and legislative departments. Nowhere has the progress, which has been in every department, been more strongly marked than in the system of popular education. The greatest ignorance and illiteracy prevailed under Spanish rule. The Philippine Commission in 1901 provided a course of instruction for eleven years—four primary, three intermediate, and four secondary. In 1911 there were 4,295 primary, 198 intermediate, and 38 secondary schools. Of the total enrolment of 451,938 children, 277,675 were boys and 174,263 were girls. It is estimated that 2,000,000 children of school age are in the islands. The United States flag means popular education, material, mental and moral progress. The carnival of the school children is a picture of happy childhood, basking in the light of truth, and a picture of an instrument necessary to prepare for an enlightened and thrifty citizenship, and for whatever national destiny Providence may have in store for the people of the Philippines. What Solomon said with reference to the value of wisdom to the individual can be here justly used with reference to our Oriental colony: "Exalt her and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honor when thou dost embrace her." (Prov. 4: 8.)

Joys for Life's Holiday

NOT the Griefs remain always—
'Tis the Joys abiding stay!
Though the sorrows weep awhile,
Soon the raptures come and smile,
And beyond the hour of tears
Lives the sweetness of the years;
Ah, the Joys abiding stay
For Life's wondrous holiday!

Though the clouds and flies rehearse
Evils for the cure and curse,
Ever the endure of the day
All their pyramidal pass away;
But the good far more long
Fills the brave heart with a song,
And the joys abiding stay
For Life's wondrous holiday!

These shall pass: the taunts and tears
With the shallows of the years,
But the raptures side by side
Travel with us and abide,
Love's deep vaults can hardly hold
Treasures of its garnered gold,
And the joys that come shall stay
For Life's wondrous holiday!

These stanzas by Freeman E. Miller in the Oklahoman should be an inspiration in a world darkened by sin and sorrow. The cold, harsh, unjust treatment of men, unfortunate and unhappy environments, the heated competitions in the world of business; limitations of health and faculty and other things bring disappointments and make life to many a dreary drudgery rather than a joyous holiday. There is a cure for the blues; there is no reason for despair. Every soul may be irradiated by heavenly light and thrilled by divine rapture. However rough may be the road, or black the night, or fierce the storm, or insuperable the barrier, Christ's love will make of it all one abiding, joyous holiday. He said: "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, that your joy might be full." (John 15: 11.)

Lord Roberts and Family Prayer

AT THE session of the House of Lords in memory of Lord Roberts' life and service to his country the most significant tribute was from the pen of Lord Roberts himself, an extract from a personal letter he had written which was read by Lord Curzon. This is the extract: "We have had family prayers for fifty-five years. Our chief reason is that they bring the household together as nothing else can. It insures servants and others who may be in the house joining in prayers, which, for one reason or another, they may have omitted to say themselves. Since the war began we usually read a prayer, and when anything important has occurred, I tell those present about it. Attendance is optional, but as a rule all come regularly on hearing the bell ring." What example of the observance of family prayer! He illustrated this Scripture: "But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." (Joshua 24: 15.)

be done most efficiently. Of course, the Krupps are the most efficient.

Now when Frederick Alfred Krupp, who made the wonderful success of the house, died, Arms and Explosives, a paper of the trade in England, commented on "the unscrupulous class of politicians who have been so hostile in their attitude to the man who had done so much for Germany." You see, armament manufacturers are international. They are the greatest internationalists in the world. They look after their own kind, disregarding nationalism; hence the defense of Krupp in the English publication of the armament trade. Again, the occasion of the death of Lord Armstrong called forth a tirade against the government on the part of the armament publications of Great Britain. They described the English Government's treatment of Lord Armstrong as shabby. Ostensibly the government wasn't buying enough from Armstrong. It had actually patronized Krupp. This, in itself, is a commentary on the European situation. British colonies with field artillery and the British admiralty with armor plates supplied by Krupp of Germany! But countries other than England have patronized the English manufacturer, Armstrong. His factories at Elswick were, by 1901, not only able to turn out guns but warships. He had a huge plant on the river Tyne. He had an alliance with an Italian manufacturer that required a plant seven miles from Naples under the name of the Armstrong Pozzuoli Works. The main shop is about the largest in the world. It is divided into eight bays, and is served with sixteen traveling cranes. And when somebody points at the Krupp works, look also at the activities of this English house. And look farther, too.

Things were pretty good in the armament business—but not good enough. Monsieur Schneider in France was making money. He might have made more money, at the time of the Fashoda crisis, but that did not develop into war because secret tests showed that his guns were as yet powerless against the eleven-inch plate with which the British warships were armored. So Schneider had the hurry-up job of turning out bigger guns for the French Government. All the armament firms were seeking inventors—inventors of more terrible devices of warfare. Business was being pushed hard. Campaigns were under way. Then came the new slogan, "Preserve the peace by being prepared." Of course that is nonsense. Preparedness did not prevent the European war any more than it brought it on. Today the United States is living in a world of armed camps utterly unprepared—but that is another story.

There was keen competition early in the twentieth century between the armament manufacturers. It is significant, though, that they were all in flourishing financial condition. There was no price cutting.

The International Ring

IN 1901 Krupp's was getting the Germania shipyard in shape for the big contract on the new German navy. Armstrong was busy with British battleships. The Vickers plant was kicking to the coal dealers that the price of fuel was too high. Still they had made enough guns and ammunition to declare a 20 per cent. dividend. Moreover, they had secured the European rights on the Holland submarine. John Brown had made more than a million dollars in the preceding year. In fact, everybody was doing very well. Of course, when big business men are making money, they want to make more: to do it, they must eliminate competition. Wherefore, on July 16, 1901, there came forth an organization known as the Harvey United Steel Company. This was formerly the Harvey Steel Company of Great Britain. The new concern controlled the old Harvey Company, the Harvey Continental Steel Company and four other concerns operating under the Harvey patent. It also held licenses for the Krupp and Charpy armor plate processes. This was a trust in armament. It was ready to supply any government. If one member of the group could not manufacture a certain kind of desired plate, another could. No government would be obliged to go away without getting what it wanted. In the Harvey United States Steel Company were English, French, Italian, German and American firms. Now this group is the "international armament ring" and this is how it lined up: Great Britain: Vickers' Sons and Maxim; Albert Vickers held 2,690 shares in the H. U. S. Co., and was made managing director; William Beardmore & Co., Glasgow; Sir William Beardmore, represented on the board of H. U. S. Co.; Armstrong, Whitmore, represented by J. L. Falkner; Cammell, Laird & Co., represented by J. A. Clark; J. C. Brown & Co., the Coventry Ordnance Co., Thomas Firth & Co. These last three concerns held together 7,438 shares and were represented by C. E. Ellis. Other British firms allied in the Harvey United Steel Company were the Hadfield Foundry Co., the Projectile Co., Palmers' Shipbuilding and Iron Co., and the Fairfield Shipping Co. So much for England. Now let us see how the French manufacturers stood. Schneider & Company, makers of the famous Creusot rifles and the present wonderfully efficient light artillery of the French army, held 9,862 shares and were represented by Edouard Saladin. St. Chamond Steel Co., 2,000 shares represented by M. C. F. M. Hondaill; Chatillon-Commentry Co., 2,000 shares, represented by M. Leono Levy; La Cie. des Forges et Aciéries de la Marine et d'Homecourt, 150 shares.

As to Italy: Vikers Terni; Armstrong Pozzuoli; Ansaldo-Armstrong, represented by Raffaele Bettini, holding 8,000 shares.

As to Germany: Frederick Krupp, 4,731 shares represented by Ludwig Klupfel; the Dillingen Co., 2,731 shares represented by Fritz Saeftel.

The United States: The Bethlehem Steel Co., 4,301 shares, representative unknown; the Bethlehem Steel Co. represented other American firms in the international armament ring.

Shortly after its organization, an Englishman named Newbold published a pamphlet on the Harvey United Steel Co. He wrote: "It drew royalties from the entire world, or, at any rate, from that part of it which was sufficiently civilized to construct armor-plated slaughter machines. This organization provided a common meeting ground for the world's armament firms, where their representatives might meet and discuss the international weather forecasts. Many a brooding war storm must they have located before they separated in hot haste to arm their respective clients for the fray. Here, when trade was bad, they could, if they chose, meet and consider how they might help each other to storm the stony hearts of obdurate governments, and scare friendly nations with spectral gunmounting plans—gunmountings having to be heavily armored. Fifty more guns in our fleet, shall we say, would mean orders for more and thicker armor from Krupp's rolling mills."

The Ring and the Clergy

IN HIS excellent work on "The Scandal of Modern Civilization," the English writer, H. Robertson Murray, draws a striking picture of hypocrisy. Certain Christian clergymen appear to think, he states, that it is not at variance with their teachings to make money out of a proposition that encourages the various nations to hate each other. Among the shareholders of the English Armament Company are the Bishops of Chester, Newcastle, Adelaide, Hexham, Newport, and Dean Inge of St. Paul. Lord Kinnard, president of the Young Men's Christian Association, is a stockholder in Vickers. In the same connection we have Andrew Carnegie and the United States Steel. Mr. Carnegie is an apostle of peace. He built the Peace Temple in The Hague—which is a scene of peace now for the first time. It used to be the center for a lot of senseless wrangling in the name of peace.

Mr. Carnegie made his money from United States Steel. That is another humane institution. United States Steel is noted among other things for the fact that because of inadequately protected machinery it let its workmen be slaughtered until it was compelled to protect them. United States Steel makes tons of armor plate. Mr. Carnegie gets his income from the United States Steel. This seems a trifle incongruous when one considers that Peace Temple. It must also be recalled that Carnegie tried to saddle United States Steel on the rulers of this country.

At the time of Federal prosecution of trusts, Carnegie came out and offered to pension Presidents of the United States. Upon leaving office they were to be paid a big annual income by Carnegie. There was only one stipulation. The income was to come from bonds on the United States Steel Company. There was only one inference: a man who was going to get a big income from the United States Steel would, as President, permit nothing to injure the properties of United States Steel. One of our statesmen characterized Mr. Carnegie's offer as "insulting."

That was a typical case of the skill with which armament people work. Their power is far-reaching.

A few years ago, when Carranza organized his revolt against Huerta, President Wilson issued a strict embargo on arms and ammunition. We were going to be humanitarian, we were not going to permit American manufacturers to send arms over the border so that Mexicans could kill each other. The United States troops guarding the frontier received orders to enforce this embargo strictly. In a week all gun running into Mexico stopped. I know of the officers on duty along the American side of the Rio Grande.

"We had the whole thing closed up tight," he said; "one or two attempts to get ammunition through were made and then they gave it up. Not a rifle or cartridge was going into Mexico. And then came unofficial orders. They came through Washington, and of course, from the War Department. We were to shut the other eye. We were henceforth to pretend to stop the gun-running but really to let it go on."

We issue a proclamation preventing the exportation of arms and ammunition to Mexico. The army enforces it. In all the newspapers appear articles that cannot but breed an air of righteousness. But we are Pharisees although we don't know it. Huerta is getting arms elsewhere; then what shall Carranza be deprived? Unofficially the embargo is lifted; and finally, after a period of time, it is officially lifted. Still we have gone on record as a government, against supplying these poor berthed Mexicans with the weapons of death.

And the public accepted what the papers said to it. That the government at Washington had acted fast and loose with neutrality and with humanity was unperceived—then.

All the Christian influence in this country, all other sincere humanitarian influences, have fought the exportation of arms and ammunition to Europe. They have been fought back by the men who are making money out of killing men. This is our war. The ammunition is not supplied by American manufacturers for patriotic motives. They are making capital out of Death. A group of men, infinitesimal to the population of this country, is placing us in an unenviable rôle before the world. Don't think that the French, the English, the Russians or Italians, love us any more because we are giving them rifles and ammunition. They are merely using us, they know precisely why we are doing it. Unlike them we have no big national ideals at stake. We are simply puddling in a sea of blood trying to pick some foreign money from the bottom.

Because of this condition, we have suffered diplomatically. We have lost the friendship of Germany and Austria. We have gained nothing diplomatically, nothing from England, France, Russia or from Italy. This exportation of arms and ammunition has brought us close to the brink of war. It caused the Lusitania incident. If the ship had been no ammunition on board, the ship would not have been sunk.

Those sincere humanitarians in our country who have their eyes open, have been able to make some progress in their fight against the exportations of arms and ammunitions to Europe. The manufacturers have their eyes open to the situation. But they can gull public opinion through a subsidized press. And when this war is over, on whatever side they are going to try to gull the public more.

Preparedness is one thing. We must be armed. We can be armed without using our arms. It is an insult to the spirit of the American people to declare otherwise. But are the manufacturers, the armament makers who have invested huge sums of money in new machinery to produce arms and ammunition for Europe, are they going to be satisfied with supplying the United States with the reasonable maintenance of peace? When a man gets a lot of goods on his counter he likes to get rid of it. I know of a quicker way of getting rid of ammunition than war. What about the firms in this country that in the last August, have done millions of dollars' worth of business, who have made millions by killing men in European battle fields? When you get into the millions you get away from scruples. The temptation will be big. Who is going to take the goods off the counter?

THE WAR AND AMERICA

IT IS no longer possible to discuss the European war without reference to the effect which individual events may have upon the course of the United States. An issue that can involve us in the war has been raised, and has not yet been settled. In this tense period of waiting, while the people in general go about their daily affairs with little thought of the peace about us, the leaders of public action are viewing affairs with serious eyes, the more so because of the clash of opinion as to the policy this nation should adopt. Unseen but powerful currents of influence are at work to compel our government to stand by a course of conduct which, to say the least, does not make for peace; while on the other hand the people themselves are being appealed to to exercise their sovereign right in the interest of a peaceable method of handling all questions arising between this country and the war-maddened rulers of Europe.

Recent Submarine Attacks

VERY recent encounters between German submarines and British merchantmen tend to stiffen Germany in her contention that she cannot abandon submarine warfare in toto. On June 30 the State Department at Washington was notified that the American Leyland Line freight steamship Armenian had been torpedoed by a German submarine off the Cornwall coast and had sunk with the loss of twenty or more Americans, members of the crew. Immediately there were fears that a new danger had been injected into the situation. It was positively stated that the ship was American-owned, though carrying mules and cattle, which are contraband of war to a British port; the boat was en route from Newport News to Avonmouth. She had a crew of 72 men and carried 96 mule tenders, of whom 87 were said to be American citizens, most of them negroes.

Further reports of the incident, however when received, disclosed that the Armenian had been chartered by the British admiralty for transportation of contraband and was therefore, in effect, a war vessel. The submarine which attacked her, the U-38, was one of the largest and most powerful in existence, and approached the Armenian on the surface of the water with flag flying. Two warning shots were fired and the freighter was ordered to surrender, but her captain put on full speed and by a zig-zag course sought to evade and escape from the submarine. The Armenian was therewith riddled with shells and caught fire. The boats were lowered and took off most of the crew and mule tenders; several had been killed in the attack. The boats were picked up the next morning by a Belgian trawler. The captain of the Armenian states that at the moment he surrendered the Germans acted fairly and gave the merchantmen time to leave the ship, and also rescued some of the men who had fallen from the boats.

The whole aspect of the case was heretofore changed, and the attack how to be entirely within the rules of naval warfare. Americans shipping vessels liable to the fortunes of war under international law cannot claim the protection of their government excepting in cases of a violation of international law. A merchantman that refuses to stop and tries to escape from a war vessel of an enemy country after being warned, is liable to attack.

The second incident occurred July 4, when the British steamship Anglo-Californian was attacked by a German submarine and escaped. The Anglo-Californian sailed from Montreal on June 24 and sighted the submarine eight o'clock Sunday morning. The vessel was at once put at full speed and wireless calls for aid were sent out. The submarine gave chase on the surface, at the same time firing many shells after the fleeing steamer. As escape seemed impossible, a zig-zag course was adopted to prevent use of torpedoes. It developed into a running naval fight, in which the captain and nine of his men were killed and many wounded, and the boat was riddled. The captain's son took command and brought the ship safely into Queenstown harbor, British destroyers having appeared in response to the S. O. S. calls, the submarine abandoning the attack and sinking out of sight upon the arrival of help.

The crew of the Anglo-Californian included some fifty Americans, it is said, but the officials at Washington point out that apparently no American rights had been violated, the attack being in the same class with that on the Armenian.

The American Reply on the Frye Case

ON JUNE 29 the full text of the American note dated June 24 to the German government, replying to the latter's suggestion that the question of the amount of indemnity to be paid for the sinking of the William P. Frye be submitted to a German prize court, was made public.

The American government declines to submit this question to a German prize court. The basis of this refusal is that "the claim presented by the American government is for an indemnity for a violation of a treaty in distinction from an indemnity in accordance with the treaty." The American government holds that the sinking of the Frye was in direct violation of the provisions of the treaties of 1785 and 1799 which were embodied in the treaty of 1828 between the United States and Prussia, now in force and recognized by the imperial German government.

The American government does not yet admit that the Frye's cargo contained contraband of war, but contends that even if it did there was no justification, according to treaty and under the circumstances, for destruction. Other matters are eliminated from the discussion in the note of June 24, the American government stating that it "has considered that the only question under discussion was the method which should be adopted for ascertaining the amount of the indemnity to be paid under an admitted liability." The note insists that the amount of indemnity in this case be fixed not by a German prize court but by "direct diplomatic discussion."

As to Peace Prospects

RUMORS and more than rumors of agitation springing up in the capitals of Europe for a movement toward peace have become so persistent that the Administration at Washington is said to be impressed by them. President Wilson is understood to have abandoned permanently his intended trip to the expositions on the Pacific coast, in order that he may be in Washington ready to seize any opportunity for offering mediation, or in any other way aiding a definite movement for peace.

A very significant thing happened on Tuesday evening, June 29. The member for Coventry in the British Parliament gave notice that he would ask the premier on Wednesday evening whether, in view of the recent peace speeches in the German Reichstag, "His Majesty's government will consider the advisability of stating more specifically than heretofore the terms upon which a peace would be possible, with the object of hastening such a happy consummation."

This is the first time the subject has come up so definitely in Parliament. In the Reichstag the speakers were mostly Social Democrats, and in a general sense the member for Coventry, though called a Liberal, is the same thing, there being much similarity in the opinions and aims of the advanced wing of the German Social Democrats and the advanced section of the English Liberals.

Coventry is largely a working class constituency, and the British workman sees conscription, industrial and military, on the horizon. It will be extremely interesting to see what answer this question will receive. There is little doubt that a strong peace party exists in Great Britain, and very possibly this party might become strong enough to force peace.

The Christian Herald believes in prayer, and in the wisdom and sincerity of men who pray for what they cannot obtain otherwise. Men ought always to pray for peace and not to faint: that is, not faint in the fight to obtain that for which they pray. The state of Colorado, at the urging of the Sons of Colorado, who meet August 1 to celebrate the state's birthday, will devote three minutes to silent prayer for peace; the movement is said to be assured state-wide participation. It is a good movement. Every state might well follow the example. Yet it is a futile movement unless those who pray will also as devoutly work to stop the supplying of arms and ammunition to the warring nations, including Mexico, without which arms and ammunition from the United States the war now going on would cease whether we pray for peace or not. Let prayer by individuals and organizations be promptly followed by signed demands upon the President and upon the right congressmen to stop the manufacture of munitions of war for gain, and lo! "Before they call upon Him he will hear them, and while they are yet speaking He will answer!"

On the fifth of July former Secretary of State Bryan was the principal speaker at the Independence Day three-day celebration at the Panama Pacific Exposition. His audience numbered over 122,000, the largest, he said, which he ever had addressed. Mr. Bryan's subject was "Universal Peace," and he declared that "the heart, overflowing with sympathy and animated by good will—this and this alone—is equal to the delicate and difficult task for which a great nation has prepared itself." Earlier in the week Mr. Bryan had been addressed through the press in an open letter by Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, one of the leading world advocates of peace. The letter was dated at Paris June 17, and took the United States to task for failure to speak out against the invasion and occupation of Belgium, and for failure to espouse the cause of the Allies in the war. He charges Mr. Bryan with running the risk of prolonging the war by placing his eloquence on the side of German militarism. "We do not want the kind of peace you suggest," says the famous writer; "we do not understand it. No; as we have always maintained, we must do away not only with war, but with the causes of war, that is to say, the unbearable burdens and uncertainties of armed peace. We must do away with violence and its conquests. We must do away with Prussian militarism."

To this letter, which was very long and argumentative, Mr. Bryan replied through the New York Times in a clear statement (printed elsewhere on this page) of what the American people believe to be the honorable and Christian course for this country.

On June 29 a bill was introduced in the House of Commons for the compulsory enrollment of all persons, male and female, between the ages of 15 and 65, with a sworn declaration of present employment, physical condition and choice of employment under the government as a volunteer. This national registration bill, it is said, will be opposed by the Liberals. It has passed to the second reading, and the government insists that it must become law.

BRYAN CORRECTS BARON D'ESTOURNELLES' VIEWS OF AMERICA'S DUTY

Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, Paris, France:

ESTIMED SIR: Your open letter, dated June 17, recalls the many pleasant days which we have enjoyed together as collaborators in the cause of peace. I am greatly distressed that the situation in Europe compels you and other distinguished pacifists, residing in the belligerent nations, to turn aside from the peace propaganda in order that each, true to his patriotic impulses, may support his nation in the unprecedented conflict which now convulses the Old World. You and they could not do otherwise.

If, however, peace advocates residing in the warring countries are in duty bound to support their respective governments while the war continues, it is likewise the duty of the citizens of neutral nations to be neutral in spirit as well as in word and act. It would violate the spirit of neutrality for neutrals to declare judgment upon the acts of the belligerent nations; they have not the complete information necessary to form an unbiased judgment, even if they felt it their duty to announce such judgment during the progress of the war.

While I regret that you should deem my government deserving of criticism, still I am not surprised. The neutral countries, if they carefully refrain from unilateral acts, must expect criticism from both sides, because each side is too intensely interested in its own success to act as an impartial judge. It is as natural that the Allies should criticize us for not doing things that would help them as it is for Germany and Austria to criticize us for not placing an embargo on arms and ammunition. Criticism from both sides is proof that this government has successfully maintained a neutral position.

I do not conceive it to be the duty of neutrals to decide at this time whether it is more cruel to attempt to drown noncombatants at sea than it is to endeavor to starve noncombatants on land. Neutrals can, in my opinion, serve humanity better by refusing to approve of either method of warfare.

To my mind, the paramount question now is not "Who began the war?" or "Which side has been most cruel in its conduct of the war?" History will render a verdict on these questions when passion has subsided and when all the facts are obtainable. The most important question now is, "How can peace be restored?"

The war cannot last always; the end must come some time. Why should any belligerent nation hesitate to state the conditions upon which it will agree to peace? The war is not an international secret; it is being waged in public, and all nations are witnesses. Has not the world a right to know why bloodshed continues? Is it not due the neutral peoples that the participants should give up some generalities, but definite and explicit statements as to the end sought? If the belligerents are too much absorbed in the struggle to consider the right of neutrals, do they not owe it to their own brave soldiers and their own suffering people to answer the question, "Why do we die?"

Who knows but that peace may be possible now, not a truce, but a permanent and enduring peace? If the nations will only make known for what they are fighting they may find it possible to come to a satisfactory understanding. Reconciliation as to what is done and silence as to what is desired—these mean an indefinite prolongation of the struggle. The only possible hope of reaching an end lies in a frank statement by each nation of its position. In announcing the terms which will be acceptable, the nations will be restrained by a sense of responsibility, because upon the nation or nations which demand conditions which are unjust must rest the blame for a continuation of the indescribable woes of this unspeakable war. The conditions of peace must be announced ultimately; why not now? With assurances of great respect, I am sincerely your friend,

W. J. BRYAN.

SECTION OF THE "PAVEMENT"

Showing Roman games cut by the soldiers. Such slabs are found inside the portico shown below

THE archway shown on the cover picture, spanning one of the modern and narrow streets of Jerusalem, is nothing else than the remaining part of an ancient Roman triumphal arch of the well known type. The room above it is of course modern. In its day it stood across a wide paved street; under it rattled the Roman chariots, while the smaller arches, one on each side, accommodated the pedestrians.

On the north or right-hand side of the picture we see part of the building belonging to the Sisters of Zion, where, in all probability, in the days of Jesus stood the Prætorium (Mark 15: 16), or "Hall of Judgment" (John 18: 28), where also the then Roman governor, Pontius Pilate, lived. Almost directly opposite we find a Turkish barracks, being undoubtedly the site of the Castle of Antonia. This latter site was originally a natural rocky spur, jutting out into the northwestern corner of the temple area. In consequence of its proximity to the temple itself the Jews, while worshiping, used to be severely harassed by the Syrians, but when the Maccabees came into power about 130 B.C., they caused this spur to be cut away for an area of about three acres, leaving a sheer scarp of rock some twenty-five feet high, as can still be seen.

We all know that in the days of Jesus the Jewish nation had been completely subjugated by the Romans, who, though having no sympathy with the religion of this people, had to tolerate it for political reasons. The Romans had learned from past history the revolutionary tendencies of the Jews. Jerusalem was then the center of Judaism, and the temple, with its extensive grounds and buildings, its nucleus. Here yearly, at feast times, immense crowds met, and the temple therefore could have been looked upon as a possible hot-bed for an uprising.

We can thus see how well placed a Roman castle would be here, perched high above the temple, where not only its grounds, about 30 acres in extent, could be thoroughly surveyed, but also so situated that the entire garrison could be rushed into the enclosure in case of an uprising, as was indeed the case when Paul was rescued from the mob by the Roman soldiers and brought up into this very castle. (Acts 21: 26 to 22: 30.)

But we have not set out to see this castle; instead we have stayed here only long enough to try and reconstruct in our mind's eye something of this neighborhood as it was in the past.

Jerusalem of today, or more properly the portion within the walls, although itself old, rests upon the dust of ages. Below the surface lie the remains and rubbish of many cities and their past glories.

Forty years ago the place where the buildings of the Sisters of Zion now stand, before alluded to, was nothing more than a tumble-down heap of ruins of a late date and great refuse heaps. While preparing for the construction of the present church and schools, and the removal of the debris, the northernmost of the two smaller arches was found intact, adjoining the large one shown in the cover picture. Several feet below the present street level an extensive pavement made of large thick stone slabs well laid was uncovered. Ten years later, when digging through the street for a sewer, more of this pavement was brought to light.

This latter has long since been covered up, while that part within the limits of the buildings occupied by the Sisters of Zion is laid open to view, as well as the northern portion of the triumphal arch. (See photo.) Let us examine this pavement. At the outer edge we find the blocks grooved, and we see that this was a street pavement intentionally roughened to keep the animals from slipping. We also observe that this part is directly in line with the large central arch, while next to it and in line with the small arch the blocks are smooth and clearly only intended for the use of pedestrians. It is only because the present street is so much narrower than the ancient one that we find some of the Roman street pavement within the limits of the present buildings. But the important point is that this pavement is not confined to a street and sidewalk, but extends far in, or about 100 feet in width. Its entire length has as yet not been ascertained by excavation.

On the smooth surface of these stone slabs we see cut into them Roman games. (See photo.) Two large stone benches, something the shape of a pedestal, about four feet high, placed on the pavement, were also unearthed. A look at the accompanying restoration may help to make the above description more vivid.

That this spot in Roman times was extremely important there can be no doubt. Nowhere else have there been found paved streets of this description nor has another triumphal arch been known.

Here on one side of the street we find the Roman castle, on the other a large paved court taking the place of a forum. That the Hall of Judgment and home of the governor should be situated by this city square seems quite natural, and the Bible accounts go far to make it clear, as we shall later observe. Having thus fixed the surroundings in our minds as we stand on this pavement, we can almost see small squads of Roman soldiers, while off duty from the castle, lounging here or passing the time with their games which they themselves have cut into the face of this pavement, or it may be we shall soon see a large crowd congregating here, listening to some orator standing above the audience on one of these stone benches, or "bema," as they were then called, and placed here for the purpose.

But our minds are filled with deeper things, and while our thoughts run on it has become late. We see men hastening along this very street, leading as it did to the "Sheep Gate" (the modern St. Stephen's Gate), and join a crowd with torches at Gethsemane, which, with the betraying Judas, have taken the Nazarene found here absorbed in prayer. They lead him up the steep slopes of the Kedron Valley into the city to the palace of Caiaphas, the high priest. In the around a small fire warms himself and his Lord. The picture is very vivid, for has not seen in most of the houses of the present bility just such surroundings, with a large court in the center of each? the servants and hangers-on collect, and have not seen them warming their hands around a brasier on which possibly they are preparing for the élite?

By morning we see them move on to the square before Pilate's house. (See John 18: 28; ginal note.) Pilate comes out from the palace the crowd clamoring against Jesus. The Jews not enter the Judgment Hall lest they be defiled and prevented by their law from eating the passover which was then being kept. Therefore see Jesus entering alone with Pilate. During short interview that ensues Pilate asks: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Jesus answers: "My kingdom is not of this world." Pilate reappears. The square is crowded and we hear Pilate say: "Vill ye that I release to you the king of the Jews?" But the clamoring reply is: "Not this man, but I bas." Pilate now orders Jesus to be scourged, soldier, possibly running to a pile of thorns such as are still extensively gathered and kept for fuel, plait a crown, which is placed upon Jesus, also a purple robe. Thus he is presented to his adversaries outside, and Pilate's voice is heard above the din of outcries, saying "Ecce homo" (Behold the man).

The high priests call out "Crucify him." Pilate seeks to release him, but the former, knowing his weak spot, for Pilate was only a procurator or governor under Cæsar in Rome, call out: "I thought let this man go thou art not Cæsar's friend who-soever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar."

Pilate is influenced. We see him now returning to the crowd outside and taking his seat upon one of these stone benches here preserved, as Jesus led before him, complies fully with the requests of the Jews, and the crowd disappears with crosses and Roman soldiers. It is about the sixth hour, or noon, for then, as now, in Eastern countries time begins with sunset.

Thus in our minds' journey we have followed closely St. John's graphic account given in the 18th and 19th chapters. The 13th verse of the latter chapter is of all importance to our subject. "Pilate therefore brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat in a place called pavement." The words here translated in the authorized version "judgment seat" have been rendered in a more critical translation by J. B. Rothham "elevated bench." In the original Greek it is "bema," meaning an elevated platform for orators' use. Nor does the context go to show that it was anything like an official throne or judgment seat.

In Matthew's description we read: "Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus in the common hall and gathered unto him the whole band of soldiers." (Matt. 27: 27.) Mark (15: 16) also gives substantially the same words. Both add a link in favor of the idea that the Prætorium where Jesus was judged must have been adjacent to the castle, which now practically is located.

Jerusalem has been besieged and destroyed more times than any other city. Nearly 2,000 years have elapsed since the days we have been thinking of. Naturally we cannot, nor should we expect, here absolutely certain spots associated with our Lord's life on earth. In fact few of the maps pointed out are capable of being authenticated. Nevertheless, as we turn away from this scene we cannot help but feel that we have looked upon the very "pavement" trod by our Lord, and probably have seen the very seat from which Pilate gave sentence.

It is true that some archeologists may argue that this triumphal arch is later than the days of Christ; but even if this were so it does not disprove the "pavement."

THREE DIMINUTIVE NATIONS

WHO is San Marino?" is the question that doubtless occurred to many a newspaper reader, as he propped his morning paper against the sugar bowl. San Marino might be the name of an Italian prince, or an adventurer from some of the Latin nations. But by this time he knows that San Marino is the oldest and the smallest republic in the world, and not only that, but the oldest state in Europe. For San Marino has entered the war. She has mobilized her entire army, consisting of fully a thousand men, and in a flare of medieval panoply, has declared war on Austria!

San Marino was founded by Marinus in the reign of the Emperor Diocletian, and in the church at San Marino the visitor is showed what is declared to be the tomb of that saint. Marinus was a humble stone-cutter, and was sent to Mount Titanus with other laborers to quarry stone. Enticed by the religious calm of the mountains, he left his work and became a monk. He founded a monastery, or rather a lay retreat for those who wished to retire from the world. When he died his bones became objects of veneration. Little by little a community grew up around the monastery.

The documentary history of San Marino begins in the eleventh century. While the greatest of republics has to worry along with one President, San Marino has two executives, called capitani reggenti (captains regent), elected twice a year from among the members of the council.

This council consists of sixty members, twenty of whom are oblige twenty peasants and twenty working men. The captains regent are installed with imposing medieval ceremonies, clad in sixteenth century costumes. The council is hereditary, and twelve of them, chosen by vote of the others, form a sort of upper house. This constitution was adopted in the year 1100.

The people of San Marino are chiefly agricultural laborers. The mountain is an almost impenetrable ness. It has no growing industry, no mineral wealth; nobody wants it. Therein lies the secret of its continued independence. It has not escaped the gambling concessionaire, however. But like Andorra rejected the proffered bait; it preferred poverty and decadence with life to wealth with the kind of progress that vice would bring. In Marino has been quicker than the United States to appreciate the value of military training, and every man must serve in the army of one hundred men. The citizens are very proud of this army. In Marino has its own mint and issues its own coinage. The coins are all of copper, and are in demand among coin collectors. It also makes its own postage stamps. It is even a—think of it in a republic!—that runs an honest penny by selling it of nobility.

One day, long before the Christian era, a fleet of Phœnician ships anchored in a bay on the southern coast of Gaul. The pirate crews landed and erected an altar to the god Melkart Menonach, whom they had chosen as the patron of their settlement. From the name of the heathen deity, which means "the one on whom is thy help," Monaco is thought to be derived. (Is it a coincidence that the motto of the principality of Monaco is "Deo iuvante"—God helping?) Melkart Menonach, born of Baal and Asherah, has been identified with the Phœnicians. We can imagine the ships arriving, after passing between the pillars of Hercules, laden with tin from the mines of Cornwall, stopping at Monaco to take on a cargo of tin from Gauls who had been engaged at the Phœnician fortress. The only absolute monarchy left in Europe, and its smallest state, is this tiny Monaco, which covers eight square miles of land on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, nine miles south of Nice. Monaco has 15,000 inhabitants and is bounded on one side by the sea and on all other sides by France. In the year 7 B.C. the emperor Augustus erected a monument in Monaco (the ruins of which are seen today in close proximity to the modern hotel and casino) to celebrate the subjugation of the fifty-five Gallic cantons which had been so ill-advised as to defy the power of Rome. These cantons were the tiny Monaco—little states, independent or united in more or less feeble confederacies. They might be called the star-dust of which the constellations of the European solar system are formed. Rome itself was originally just such a village state. In spite of its small size, Monaco has been invaded and overrun by all the nations that passed that way—Ligurians, Lombards, Saracens, Genoese. In 1297 a Genoese family, named Grimaldi, seized the place and started a dynasty that still holds sway. The worst invasion occurred in 1543, when François Blanc, expelled from France, descended on Monaco, and with the ill-gotten gains he had acquired during the many years he had been keeping a gambling house in the city. He offered Charles III, the reigning prince, $100,000 a year for his expenses, together with half the profits, for the privilege of setting up a casino in Monte Carlo. The prince was to pay the salary of the governor who relieved the prince of the duties of ruling; it was to keep the army; and last, but not by any means least important, the gamblers were to pay the police and magistracy. The establishment of the casino naturally brought forth a great deal of protest from the civilized world. Even the Monegasques themselves revolted in 1869, and the prince was almost ready to yield to popular demand, when his evil genius, François Blanc, suggested that he abolish all taxes. The cries of the people were immediately changed to "Vive le prince!" "Vive Monsieur Blanc!" François Blanc died in 1877, worth $1,000,000 ill-gotten dollars. The moral blindness of the prince was followed by physical blindness, from which he suffered until his death in 1889, when the present ruler, Prince Albert, succeeded him. Tradition says that Christianity was first preached in Monaco by Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul. Monaco has more priests in proportion to population than any other country in Europe. Its patroness is St. Devota, whose anniversary comes on January 27. Her chapel is in the ravine of the Gaumates, a locality much favored by the suicides who have lost their all at the gaming tables. The army of Monaco is composed of eighty-two men and four officers.

FROM time immemorial the inhabitants of the Pyrenees Mountains have been divided into little tribes or clans, something like the clans of the Scottish Highlands. Little by little these have been brought under the authority of the French or Spanish Government, until now there is only one left. It owes its survival to the fact that both France and Spain claim a reversionary right to it, in case it should go the way of dead empires. Andorra is a promontory of the Middle Ages, jutting into the ocean of modernity. Perched on the Spanish side of the Pyrenees, her 5,000 highlanders have maintained the independence of their one hundred and seventy-five square miles of national domain ever since the time of Charlemagne. The Andorrans, like the Swiss, have solved certain political problems which have vexed larger communities, and as for social and industrial problems, they have none to solve. They have established a federal republic, governed by a president and two vice-presidents (called the syndic and assistant syndics), chosen by the legislative body of twenty-four members, elected by the people of the six cantons, which are also parishes from the standpoint of the church. Each canton maintains a body of militiamen, and military service is universal, but the soldiers receive no pay, except when on duty guarding prisoners, and then the prisoner is made to pay the expenses. This, however, occurs very seldom, and there are no policemen. On the very rare occasions when the death penalty has to be inflicted, the soldiery is called out to escort the executioner, who is always a foreigner, from the French or Spanish border to the capital, and to guard him on his return to his native land after his work is done. It has never been possible to induce an Andorran to perform this disagreeable task. There is no national debt, and the taxes are light. Each citizen pays a poll tax of five cents a year. All public service is rendered gratis, and is obligatory. The voters are heads of families. Andorrans have the name of being the freest people in the world. There is not a drunkard in the republic; there are just three doctors and three lawyers. Education is free, but not compulsory; and it is altogether in the hands of the church. Every village has its patron saint.

In 1879 the gambling octopus, the great enemy of the tiny republics, encouraged by its success at Monte Carlo, extended its tentacles toward Andorra. The near success which it attained almost precipitated a revolution. At the same time the French sought to set up a telegraph line, but it met with nearly as much resistance as the gambling, and the good bishop sent fifty men to cut down the poles. But in 1902 the opposition was overcome, and a telegraph line now runs across the republic.

Andorra is still deep in the sleep of the Middle Ages. The telegraph will probably do a little toward waking her up from her dream; the railroad which the French have built up to her northern border will no doubt do more; and a road which Frenchmen and Spaniards are now building across the valley will probably spell the doom of medievalism.

SOLOMON DEDICATES THE TEMPLE

I KINGS 8: 1-53

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all peoples." Isa. 56: 7, R.V.

This is a great advance on all previous conceptions. To the Jew in Solomon's reign house of God was filled with sacrifices, so that the air was heavy with the fumes of burnt flesh, and the floors ran with blood. But led by the divine Spirit, men have been taught that the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit. Jesus our Lord has offered one sacrifice forever, and now the highest form of worship is prayer, which includes confession, adoration, intercession and petition. God's house is not limited to any spot or building, but extends within its holy walls every one who kneels in prayer. Your bedroom, your study, your chosen walk by the ocean or on the mountains, is a little corner of the house of God. Wherever and wherever you pray, immediately you are in God's house. If your life is one of prayer, you dwell in the secret place of the tabernacles of the Most High. Around you stand the invisible and transparent walls of eternity. The air is fragrant with the incense of angel censers. You have already entered the company of the spirits of the just made perfect. The bare spot on the moorland, on which Jacob lay down to sleep, became the house of God and the gate of heaven. And there is no spot so lonely or deserted that it cannot become the house of God, if only you will pray.

The Lesson in Life

By Amos R. Wells

THE Mohammedans tell a beautiful story about Abraham. They say that when he began to think about the higher life he saw a lovely star and said, "This is my God!" and worshiped it. But when the star set he rejected it, saying, "I like not gods that set." Then the moon arose and he took it for his god, until it also sank below the horizon. Then rose the splendid sun, and he fell down and worshiped it; but it also set and left Abraham in darkness. Then Abraham opened his heart to the unseen Being who guides star and planet and sun, whom he followed so faithfully all his life.

The ark was the center of Solomon's temple. It stands for Abraham's God, the God of permanence, the abiding presence of the Most High. Christ came, and the world no longer needed an ark, since it had the reality which the ark only imaged.

Above the ark shone the Shekinah, the visible glory of Jehovah. What is the Shekinah of a Christian church? It is the light of love in Christian lives. Dr. Broughton draws a beautiful picture of Loch Katrine, up in the Scottish highlands, one of the loveliest lakes in all the world. But the glory of the lake, says Dr. Broughton, is not there; it is down in the crowded city of Glasgow, to which the pure water of the lake is piped, for the health and cheer of men and women. So the true glory of God is the blessing that flows from his altar into the lives of his men and women.

Note how prominent is the element of thanksgiving in the dedication of the temple. Church life without gratitude is without power and beauty.

Note also the element of adoration in those impressive dedication ceremonies.

Then, the dedication of the temple was full also of the element of petition. The needs of all men are at bottom the same. Sir Edwin Arnold told in verse the story of four men in the East who agreed to put their pinnacles together and buy a meal; but they could not agree what it should be, for the Turk insisted on azum, the Persian demanded anghur, the Arab wanted aneb, while the Greek must have staphyllion. Just then an ass was driven by, bearing panniers of grapes. "There it is!" cried each, for all had been urging grapes, each in his own language. So it is with the desires of human hearts; expressed with infinite variety, they are all one, and are all satisfied in the church of God.

Another element of the dedication was the insistence upon righteousness. It was to be a pure temple, so different from the heathen temples, and it required purity in its worshipers. "What a happiness were it," wrote Archbishop Leighton, "if every time you came to His solemn worship some of your strongest sins did receive a new wound, and some of your weakest graces a new strength." That is just what happens with true church-goers.

Of course the dedication of the temple is full of the thought of reward. An old slave in Kentucky was once plodding through the snow four miles to church, and was asked by a gentleman why, at his age and in the winter, he did not stay home. "Ah, me," he replied, "I darn't do dat; 'ca' yo see, I dunno when de blessin' gwine to come; an' 'spose it 'ud come this mornin', an' I away!" God's temple would always be crowded if all Christians had this faith in the promised blessings.

Last of all, the dedication has the thought of universality. Solomon's temple was not for the Jews only but for all mankind. So are our churches. Said Dr. Maltbie D. Labcock finely, "If Jesus Christ is anything to me, I know he can be anything to any man, and as much as in me lies I will take Christ to the last man." That spirit makes a missionary society out of any church.

The Greater Temple

By Arthur H. Howland

WONDERFUL as the temple of Solomon was, yet it was, after all, only a bit of kindergarten preparation to help the world learn its real lesson of God.

Travelers through Catholic countries or districts are impressed with the appalling disparity between the splendor of the churches and the poverty of the houses in which the people dwell. One often thinks of the order of Cromwell upon entering a gorgeous church which contained twelve liver statues of the apostles.

"Who are these men?" ask the great Protector.

"They are the twelve apostles," was the answer.

"Take them down and melt them and send them about their Master's business," he commanded.

Can there be any doubt that Jesus has been vastly amazed as well as deeply grieved during the centuries since he was on earth to see his simple teachings wrought into circuit and elaborate rituals and doctrines, to see the worship he evoked transferred from the fields and the lake shore to the people to the cold and gorgeous churches and cathedrals of Christendom?

True, Christ himself worshiped in the temple. But when he said, "The day is coming when there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down," there was doubtless in the words more than a mere statement of fact. He had said to the woman at the well: "Thou comest when ye shall neither on this mountain nor at Jerusalem worship the Father. God is a Spirit, and those that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth." Even Isaiah had said long before: "When ye shall appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?"

No one wants to restore that palace of worship with its splendid

ble. Even the Jews no longer follow the old ritual of sacrifice, but, far from the site of the great altar of long worship with simple and blood-ceremonies the God of their fathers. The new churches of Christendom are places not only of worship but of service for the people, centers of every kind of helpful activity, while pastor and people are learning that their best work for Christ may be done not in the sacred building but where cross the crowded ways of life.

by missions and Salvation Army bands throughout the world are witnessing daily and nightly victories for Christ; multitudes are won by preaching in tents or rude tabernacles but for brief evangelistic campaigns.
 We are learning that what counts is not the permanence of the structure nor the costliness of its furnishings, but the presence of the Holy Spirit.

And here lay the great truth, the great value of Solomon's temple. Despite its crudities and errors and extra-gances it did teach this one sublime fact—God will dwell with men.

I do not fail, in connection with the lesson, to read the Epistle to the Hebrews. It will take little more than half an hour. See how the Spirit-filled writer belittles the temple service when contrasted with the stupendous and dazzling blessings wrought by the Saviour in the souls of believers. The great temple and its elaborate rituals were only types and symbols of the work of Christ. He is greater than the whole priestly tribe of Levi; his grace can accomplish what the law failed to achieve; the power of his sacrifice can work a cleansing in human souls such as the blood of bulls and goats and the ashes of a heifer could not produce. The entrance to this greater temple of communion with Christ is faith; and its service includes all the good we can do to help the people we can reach.

The essential point of the lesson is the presence of God. Christ has made a way by which the divine Spirit may dwell in every life, the divine fire burn in every soul. Every soul needs God's Spirit, every church needs him, every community, every commonwealth. Not a single building or city, not a tribe of any nation, nor any nation alone, is to be Jehovah's dwelling place; but he will dwell in the hearts of men everywhere when his glory shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

 Men's hearts shall be attuned to love for him and that love for God shall produce love for fellow man and shall stir up every life to glad deeds of kindly service.

The lesson should bring home to every teacher and every pupil the question Paul asked the Ephesian brethren: "Did ye receive the Holy Spirit when ye believed?" Christianity without the fires of Pentecost is cold and empty, formal and powerless.
 While the Sunday schools are studying this lesson of the dedication of the ancient temple and the coming to it of Jehovah's fiery presence, schools and churches, pastors and people, young and old, may well sing pleadingly the ardent prayer:

Come, Holy Ghost, our hearts inspire;
 Let us thine influence prove;
 Source of the old prophetic fire,
 Fountain of life and love.

Echoes from the Holy Land

THIS dedication of Solomon's Temple is the first of which we have any record, and without doubt the grandest ceremony ever performed under the Jewish dispensation.

Solomon's Temple was erected about 1000
 B.C., and about 1000 A.D. began the erection of Christian churches in the Holy Land. The dedication ceremonies of some of these have been preserved, of which the Crusader Church at Tyre, where the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa is supposed to be buried, is the most interesting and elaborate.

In more modern times several dedications have found a place in historical records. When the Russian buildings and great bell tower were dedicated on the Mount of Olives, the scene was made memorable by the large number of Russian ecclesiastics and the thousands of Russian pilgrims who drew the great bells in carts all the way—more than fifty miles—from Jaffa to Jerusalem. The dedication of the German Protestant Church of the Redeemer in Jerusalem itself, October 31, 1898, was made memorable by the presence of the Emperor William II, the Empress Augusta Victoria and a great cavalcade of German pilgrims. This was equaled if not surpassed when the German Crown Prince came in the name of the empress to consecrate the great group of buildings on the Mount of Olives with a pomp that none of those who saw it can ever forget.

"Spread his hands toward heaven." This most exalted and impressive attitude in prayer is still the most accepted form by Jew, Moslem and Christian in the Holy Land.

"And when thou hearest forgive," is the prayer in which all men with any spiritual instincts of every creed in this land of many religions can heartily join.

Away From Home

Scripture Topic. Dan. 1: 3-8;
 Rom. 14: 15, 16, 17, 21

Our topic committee asks us to consider tonight the question: "Is it ever Right to Do Away from Home
 When One Would Not Do At Home?"

There is no need for having any difficulty about that. Of course you will take Christ along with you on your vacation. Of course you will want to share your good time with him. Of course you will ask him to show you day by day what he would like you to have you do. Of course you will ask for his approval upon any course before you take it and while you are enjoying it. Of course you will remember that your body and your mind and soul are his, and that he wants you to come back from rest clean and strong and glad. Of course you will remember that away from home as well as at home your thoughts must be on others—how to help, how to gladden, how to give your life you meet just the right one, the touch toward the things that are good and right and eternal—the touch toward God.

Christ In Me

Scripture Topic. John 15: 1-11

The "location" of a personality is one of the hardest problems either of science or philosophy. Doubtless of immortality have asked how a soul can live without a body. It is a harder question how a soul can live in a body.

When you talk by telephone with your friend a hundred miles away, where is your personality, and where is his? Your minds are together though your bodies are a hundred miles apart.

After the resurrection of Jesus his disciples and friends were constantly wondering and querying: "Where is he?" But after Pentecost they knew where he was. He was dwelling with them, among them. They felt so powerfully the conviction that he was with them individually that they could say, one by one: "He is in me." He was so near, he talked so freely and familiarly with them that there was no sense of distance, no feeling of separation. They were abiding in him and he in them.

May we live like that? Assuredly.
 With us in our work; with us in our play; with us in our joys, our griefs, our cares; with us in every waking moment—that is where Christ is, for he declares: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Sales Marching Far Ahead of Heavy Shipments

Two important developments followed closely the first showing of the 1916 Hupmobile.

All over America the "old guard" came flocking back to renew their allegiance.

Almost on their heels a new army of enthusiasts marched into Hupmobile stores.

Those of the first group appreciate, better than any perhaps, the full meaning of a Hupmobile at $1085. Hupmobile quality has been real and tangible to them for years.

In the second group are those who have long looked forward to Hupmobile ownership.

So, almost in less time than it takes to tell it, the Hupmobile market has been doubled—as we were certain it would be.

When we announced the new car in June, we had perfected our plans for a 50 per cent increase in production.

Shipments began on that basis on the day we promised they would begin.

But sales everywhere are marching far in advance of them.

The situation in your city, and in every city, is, in itself, such a wonderful advertisement of Hupmobile value that it leaves little more to be said.

The new Hupmobile deserves its good fortune.

In point of past and proven worth, in point of present perfection, in point of size and beauty and luxury—we cannot find a car in the world comparable at the price.

The Hupmobile dealer will be glad to give you a delivery date as early as orders now in and his arrangements for factory shipments will permit.

Get in touch with him, for delay now means delay in getting your car.

Write for the new catalog, which illustrates and describes the entire Hupmobile line of seven beautiful body types.

IN THE DARK

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

FOR several days this week I was forced to lie in bed with bandages over my eyes. At other times, when I have had to stay in bed, I have been able to read or write, or at least look out of the window; but this time the situation was a new one, and more or less unique. After a few hours it proved to be very monotonous.

When one is alone in the dark the minutes loom ahead like vast periods of time, and the clock ticks off its seconds very slowly. Thinking is the only diversion that offers itself.

I have all my life thought, I suppose; sometimes with great intensity, sometimes with carelessness and almost lack of interest; but I have always been able, when I grew weary of a thought, to turn to some other fascinating occupation. This week, while I was lying in bed with my eyes bandaged, there was no other occupation. True, there was a view outside my window—but I couldn't see the view; and there were bookcases beside the wall, but I couldn't see them either.

At first I grew rather tired of the enforced quiet, but when one day had dragged past on slow feet my constant thinking began to take effect. Little details of neglected work began to come forward in my mind, and fragments of stories that I am some day going to write blended into complete plots. Small verses that I had forgotten to remember came back to me, and tiny snatches of conversation that had drifted out of my mind crept to the foreground. When I could take the bandages off and was once more able to read, and write, and just look at things, I found that the house of my mind was in better order than it had been for a long time, with the ideas neatly pigeon-holed and the empty places swept clean. But it had taken me a time in the dark to do it.

In the dark—A great many people fear the dark, I think. They people it with harsh noises, and vague forms, and creeping fears. They look for shadows grimly approaching when the moonlight is at its brightest; and they glance nervously behind them at the least snapping of a twig. They think that the dark frightens them, but in reality it is fear and imagination that grip at their heartstrings. If people would only look at the dark sensibly, they would perhaps realize that it is a very soothing, restful thing, a time that prepares one for the glaring brightness of the dawn.

ONCE knew a little live-wire sort of a girl, with taut nerves and searching eyes and queer, quick little ways of speech. We used to say she was "temperamental." One day I was walking with her through a crowded store when suddenly she turned and put a nervous little hand on my arm. "Don't you ever get tired," she asked me, "of this eternal rushing around? See the people in the store, every one dashing about as if their lives depended upon it! Every one hunting for different things. It's that way at school, too, and, more or less, at home. Don't you ever get tired of it?"

I admitted that I did. "But," I questioned, "how can I avoid getting tired?"

"I used to wonder that myself," answered the girl, "until I struck upon a scheme that has worked out splendidly for me. When I am tired of all the noise and confusion and turmoil, I go away into my own room and pull down the shade and shut my eyes, and think. After I have been there just a few minutes things begin to straighten out and the kinks in my mind become straight. After an hour I am rested."

Here in the city, life seems to be brightly lighted—a gay, glittering period of time. The nights are made brilliant with electric signs, and huge arc-lights make the darkest hours as bright as day. It isn't the easiest thing in the world to drift away from all of the noise and brightness and find a quiet, dark nook. Perhaps that is

The difference between

Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Smith

This is the way the wash-basinet looks to Mrs. Jones—and this is the way it looks to Mrs. Smith.

Mrs. Jones

is still doing her washing and all her work is hard, long work.

On washday she gets up hours earlier, starts a hot fire, huddles and rubs her clothes, not getting done till late afternoon.

Mrs. Smith

uses Fels-Naptha Soap. She gets up at the regular time, because she doesn't need to start her washing till breakfast is all cleared away. She gets done quickly and easily without having to boil or hard-rub the clothes.

Her wash is all on the line early, and she has the afternoon free to iron, rest, or to do just what she pleases.

Mrs. Smith does just as much work as Mrs. Jones—in fact, she has a larger family. Her clothes are always clean and white, her house is always light and shining—but she is never tired out or overworked. She uses Fels-Naptha Soap for her washing and all her household work. Cuts out all the drudgery and saves at least half the time.

UNLIKE OTHER BELLS

why so very many people look white around the mouth, with strained, tired eyes. Perhaps that is why so many men and women every year have nervous breakdowns. Perhaps that is why a few, who only seem a few because they are among so many, commit suicide. They can't find a quiet, dark nook for rest. And yet some people fear the dark!

HAVE you ever walked along the edge of a ravine, or maybe a steep hill, when the way was dark and the walking difficult? One night, a dark, almost stormy night in April, I was walking beside a railway embankment. As the way was new to me I was not frightened, for, though it was dark, and though I knew that I was high above the even ground, the path seemed level and smooth for my feet. I walked safely until I reached my destination, with never a worry on my mind.

The next morning I took the same walk back to my home, and in the merciless glare of the sun I shuddered as I saw the dangerous way my feet had traveled. There had evidently been a washout along the path, for jagged pitfalls lurked in the dark corners where crumbling earth had slid down the sides of the hill. I had need to be careful even in broad daylight on that homeward walk, for I feared that my step might falter and that my foot might slip, plunging me far down, a broken heap, on the stones below. And yet in the dark I had walked safely without fear. It seemed as if some presence must have been near me to see that I did not stray from the path.

THERE is a presence, I think, that walks near those of us who dwell in darkness, though they may dwell there a long time or but a very short time—though their pilgrimage may be only a walk along the top of a steep hill, before the moon has risen. This presence is a courage-giving presence who can erase the troubles from a disordered mind and eliminate the pitfalls from a broken path.

Some very beautiful things come out of the dark, I think. All the Fanny Crosby's hymns were born in that way, and she is not the only genius who made wonderful masterpieces with eyes closed to the beauties of a world. There are artists and sculptors and evangelists. Perhaps that is why there is something so calm and peaceful and trustful about such work.

Oh, friends of mine, it's a very terrible thing to be blind to the glories of a golden world, but it's a very wonderful experience to lie with your eyes bandaged for a few days. There are so many things that eyes—real eyes—cannot see, that you come to understand only in that way. Some time, when the world seems just a little too much for you, go into a room and pull down the shades and shut your eyes, and think. Perhaps, if you do that, you may feel the guiding presence that is always near in the shadows.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

REV. W., Keystone, Okla., sends us glad tidings of a gracious revival in that town. A clipping which he enclosed in his letter reads: "Strange as it may sound, this town, the former home of many outlaws, and the witness of much lawlessness, is now in the midst of a great revival. Nearly a third of the population has been converted, besides scores of reconsecrations."

A Friend from Fort Collins, Colo., writes: "Your prayers were heard and answered, for seven hundred persons were gloriously converted in Rev. Mr. Belgin's meetings here." M. A., Marion, N. C., writes: "Since I asked you to pray for me my husband has been converted." Mrs. A. R. P. writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for the return home of a prodigal son."

AN EVANGELIST ENGINEER

ON THE Southern Railway, running between Atlanta, Ga., and Greenville, S. C., D. J. Fant drives an engine. His engine pulls one of the heavy, vestibuled passenger trains on this road. His first act, before climbing to the cab of his engine, is to kneel on the steps and pray that his trip may be accomplished in safety. After getting his engine ready, he finds time to read a chapter in the Bible, and he keeps the good Book in sight as he speeds over hills, hollows, rivers and plains.

Before his conversion about seventeen years ago he was addicted to profanity. But God saw fit to turn him, and this is how it was done:

A little son was the joy of the engineer's home. One day the boy was taken sick. The parents felt no uneasiness at first, but the little fellow grew steadily worse. A physician was called in and the father stopped away from his work. But the child died, to the great sorrow of both parents. As the father stood beside the little form, now silent and white, he wondered why the Lord had taken his child. Then his own sinful past rose before him and he then and there resolved to give his life to God and to accept Christ as his Saviour.

We heard from him just a few days after writing to the Prayer League; we feel it is a direct answer to prayers offered." A happy mother writes: "About one year ago I sent to you asking your prayers for my daughter, who was insane. I praise the Lord that she has been restored."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

H., Vandalia, Texas, requests prayer that all the nations may be drawn together in Christian love and fellowship. Mrs. L. N. F., Chatham, N. Y., requests prayer that a suitable pastor may be sent to a church in that town and that the members may be encouraged. Mrs. N. G., Antwerp, N. Y., that a clergyman may receive a call to become a pastor of a church, that he and his wife may be able to do the work required.

From that day he was a changed man. He took up mission work and work among his fellow railroad men. He was a fireman at that time, and began religious work by supporting one missionary. Afterwards he was promoted to engineer, and then he supported two missionaries. It is now his custom to take out of his salary simply enough for actual living expenses for himself and family, and the rest he gives to charity and religious work. He is known widely as the "Evangelist Engineer," and every other Sunday he goes to some small town and preaches the Gospel in some church or other suitable place. His theme is always the Lord Jesus Christ, and the salvation of men. While waiting for his run in either Atlanta or Greenville, he devotes his spare time to going out among the poorer classes and working for his Master. He never fails to speak a word for Christ, and to help his fellow man in every way possible.

Westminster, S. C. S. C. W.

The man who has not gone into sin as far as he could go has not gone too far to be saved from going too far.

Questions and Answers

J. B. S., Clearfield, S. D. 1. It is justly the case that on coming into an altogether new environment, we are apt to find it very difficult to carry out plans and live according to principles which may have long been set in our minds. It is wise, however, to struggle on and hope that an opportunity for betterment may arrive. You ask about Sabbath-keeping. The Lord's Day should not be turned into a day of pleasure, of social amusements, of dinners, etc. That is not keeping the day hallowed making it a day of rest. 2. Tobacco use is unquestionably a vicious indulgence; and we believe that if most tobacco users were disposed to be frank about the matter, they would admit that they would be better without it. For the sake of example, if for no other reason, it is well to leave tobacco alone. 3. I know nothing about the habits of the evangelist you mention, and don't believe the stories that have been circulated. Whenever we realize that certain things are harmful, even in small degree, it is well for us to renounce them if not for our own sake, then for the sake of others who might suffer through our example.

Y. Z., Clarksville, Va. The question whether the world is growing worse or better is one that is capable of being argued on both sides. In view of the present struggle in Europe and the terrible consequences, many will feel justified in concluding that it is worse than the any previous age. On the other hand, when we look at the many efforts that are being made for human betterment, the spread of benevolence and the great spiritual uplift movement that is now going on in both hemispheres, there would seem to be reason to conclude that faith in God and the love of our fellowmen are increasing. The Bible, however, was of evil times and persecutions and false doctrines in the last days of this dispensation.

J. D. S., Pittsburg, Pa. The passage in Luke 14:6 is frequently misunderstood. In order to get clearly at its meaning, you should compare it with the parallel passage in Matt. 10:37. In both passages, Jesus is asserting his claim to a supreme loyalty and affection, and warning that we must be prepared to make sacrifice for his sake of our dearest ties and to break even with those we love most in this world, that he may have the first place in our hearts. It is unfortunate that the passage in Luke should have been expressed in a form that obscures the true meaning, and gives a harshness to the injunction which was doubtless never met in the original.

Leader, Virginia. 1. There is no foundation for the statement that Darwin did not believe in a Supreme Being. He did not accept the orthodox view of the origin of species, however. 2. Races that have not received the Gospel are judged according to the light they have. Missionaries tell of heathen peoples who have a certain standard of morals and conduct, notwithstanding their ignorance of the Gospel, and all races, however unevangelized, have some knowledge or intuition of a Supreme Being whom they must obey. The Bible tells us that those not having either the law or the Gospel may be "a law unto themselves." (Rom. 2:14.) We have no warrant for assuming that the heathen who died in ignorance of Christ are beyond the reach of God's mercy. In every age he has had his witnesses—good men and women who have lived clean, upright lives, even under natural law. Were not justified in holding that they are not acceptable. (Acts 10:35, Rom. 4:9.) 3. The Carmelites are a monastic order of the Roman Catholic Church, very austere and subjecting themselves to unusual privations. 4. The inside and irresponsible cannot be judged by ordinary standards.

J. E. W. R., Jersey City, N. J. writes with reference to an article in this journal on April 28, dealing with suffrage: "I have always felt and do now that we women who are opposed to the vote are really the 'friendly majority.' We are working all the time for good and believe accomplishing it; whereas, did we have the vote, we would be handicapped. We are not a class by ourselves, we women; we are part of all classes, the same as the men, and much would be our vote. . . . We feel that we are loving and God-fearing and we are trying every day of our lives to make the world better for our living in it."

W., Belvidere, Ill. The origin of the Philistines is not expressly stated in the Bible. However, Amos 9:7 speaks of them as "the Philistines from Caphtor," and "the remnant of a maritime district of Caphtor" (Jer. 47:4). It is believed by some authorities that they were the people who expelled the Avims and occupied the territory (Deut. 2:23) and that they were the descendants of Mizraim (Gen. 10:14). Some eminent scholars hold that they belong to the Semitic family, as the names of their cities and their proper names would indicate. The island of Crete is believed to have been the Caphtor of ancient times. The Philistines were a warlike race, superstitious and idolatrous. In the time of Saul they were evidently superior in the arts of life to the Israelites (see I Sam. 13:19-21).

Mrs. D. R., Louisville, N. S. 1. God endows man with reason and it is man's duty to use it. "Taking no thought for tomorrow" does not mean to be careless of your business nor indifferent to the duty of providing for those dependent upon you. The first evangelist gave sound advice. 2. The passage in Heb. 12:14 must be read in connection with the related verses. "Holiness" here means sanctification; one who is sanctified becomes as "a son of God." Without sanctification he could not appreciate this great privilege. None else, therefore, shall abide in his presence; for it is only "the pure in heart who shall see God."

C. M. B., Texas. The wounds inflicted by a friend are the hardest to bear. Yet they often turn out to be a blessing in disguise. We may misjudge a true friend who has had the courage to tell us disagreeable truths from which we ourselves would have shrunk, and which a false friend would have concealed to our ultimate hurt. The friend who is always praiseful and who shuts his eyes to our faults is by no means the most desirable. One sincere friend is worth a score of flatterers. If he ever gives us pain, and we can learn the motive and know that it was a worthy one, we should be willing to forgive. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend," says the proverb, "but the kisses of an enemy are profuse." Whatever the cause, you should forgive your friend. If he has wronged you deliberately, your forgiveness may be the means of making him realize and regret his treachery; and if he has acted from a worthy impulse, he will rejoice that you understand.

Miscellaneous

F. A. H., Mount Vernon Springs, N. C. The passage in Deut. 14:21 refers to the Levitical law which prohibited the Jews from eating of any animal that had not been killed by the priests, or under their instructions. It does not necessarily mean that corrupt or diseased flesh was to be given to strangers as food. (See Lev. 11:15; 22:8.)

Reader. It is undoubtedly true that there are Christian people in every land now involved in the war. The questions you raise concerning the attitude of these people and of the Christian Church at large in the present struggle is very thoroughly discussed in the address on "The Church and Peace," by Rev. Dr. Jefferson, which appeared in last week's issue of this journal.

Mail Matter Lost on Lusitania. The Postal Record, a monthly magazine published in Washington, says: "Only such American mail as was especially directed via the Lusitania was lost when the great Cunarder went to the bottom. This amounted to eighty-three bags, consisting of about 47,000 letters, 1,800 packages of newspapers and printed matter and 900 registered letters and packages. No parcel post mail was aboard."

Miss P., West Philadelphia. 1. The St. Patrick's Day celebration is observed by the people of that country in honor of Ireland's patron saint. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the birth-place of Patrick, some holding that he was born in Ireland, others that he was a native of Bannavem-on-Clyde, Scotland, and still others that he was born in France. He is said in the records to have been the first missionary to raise the standard of the cross in Ireland. The story about the driving out of the snakes is doubtless purely legendary. 2. Almost all the states have their state flowers, those of Pennsylvania being the daisy and violet. The national flower is the goldenrod.

B., Spring Mills, Pa. The Sabbath was instituted to conduce to the highest good of mankind, and Jesus himself opposed and rebuked the slavish restrictions which had been set down by the Jewish ecclesiastics in connection with Sabbath observance. He showed them there were various acts, meritorious in themselves, which were permissible on the Sabbath. Those included works of necessity and mercy. The Christian Church today still adheres to this view, although there are some differences in interpretation, certain denominations being more liberal than others. The generally accepted view is that business as such should be laid aside on the Lord's Day, and that no labor should be performed on that day which can be attended to on a secular day. As to one's occupation, it is safe to say that wherever one is engaged in a business which he feels in his own heart to be in violation of the spirit and character of the Lord's Day, and yet which demands his time and labor on that day, if his conscience accuses him, he should make an effort at the first opportunity to get out of that business altogether.

You Eat Bread

Made of part of the wheat. Puffed Wheat is whole wheat, and four times as porous. For serving in milk, imagine how much better are these bubbles of whole grain. And how much more delicious.

You Eat Toast

Because toasting aids digestion. But toast gets little toasting. Puffed Wheat and Rice, before the grains are exploded, are rolled for one hour in 550 degrees of heat.

You Eat Crackers

Puffed Grains are crisper, flakier, and they have enticing flavor. Again, they are whole grains made wholly digestible. Don't you think them better for a bedtime dish in milk? Or for wafers in your soups?

You Eat Nuts

Puffed Wheat and Rice taste like nut-meats toasted. They are porous, yet crisp. They are better in candy—better as garnish for ice cream. And better, doused with melted butter, for hungry children to carry when at play.

CORN
PUFFS

Think of these as all-day foods, not morning foods alone. Think of them as tit-bits, too.

Served with sugar and cream they are luxuries, or mixed with the morning fruit. But they are also confections, to be eaten dry. They are wonderful in milk. Between meals or at bedtime there is nothing else so fit.

For these grains are steam exploded. Every food cell is broken by Prof. Anderson's process. They do not tax the stomach. Every atom feeds.

They are ideal foods—the best you'll find—both for goodness and for good. In summertime keep plenty of each on hand. Everybody wants them.

The Cars I've Owned

Written by a Hudson Owner Who Bought 15 Cars Before It

$1350
F. O. B.
DETROIT

The writer is a motorist of 16 years' experience. In that time I've owned and driven 15 different cars.

I started with the experiments and ran the whole gamut up to big, heavy, costly Sixes. Now I own the new-type HUDSON—have owned it for a year. And the makers ask that I anonymously review this evolution.

The Coming of the Six

The early cars don't matter. Real motor car luxury began with the advent of the Six. That brought continuous power, flexibility, freedom from vibration. And now, as then, it represents finality to me. But Sixes when they came were costly and immensely heavy. They drank up fuel, ate up tires, and drove me back to Fours.

Howard E. Coffin was known to me long before he became the famous HUDSON designer. I bought his first great success—a $2750 Four. I have watched all his HUDSON models, and have followed all his four-year progress in revision of the Six. No one knows better what it meant—a new-type motor, special steels, the refining of a thousand parts to reduce the weight of a sturdy Six below 3000 pounds.

I am one of the 15,000 who have proved out the result. The weight-reduction cut my tire cost and my fuel cost in two. Yet there were seats for seven, and power for hills, and luxury and looks. 'Tis the finest car I have ever owned, the best-appearing, best-equipped. To me it represents the acme in efficiency and class, the ideal in size and comfort. It never has cost me a moment's delay or a penny in repairs. And I never have once asked for HUDSON service, which my dealer offers free.

New 1916 Features

But this new-model HUDSON excels my car in some most important ways.

The Yacht-Line body is stunning. Who would believe that last year's streamlines could be so improved?

The wider tonneau means more room than ever. Three big men like me can now sit on the rear seat. Seven long men like me can sit uncramped in the car. And the two disappearing seats, when down, double the room in the tonneau.

The enameled leather is not new to me, but my last car which had it cost $3500. The leather-bound top to the doors and body is entirely new, and was wanted. The four non-skid tires are welcome.

But the two premier advances, in my estimation, lie in the new finish and new price.

The Lustrous finish solves my greatest problem—how to keep a car looking new. I sold a dozen cars and bought new ones mainly to get new looks. They ran well but looked shabby. This Lustrous finish, where coat after coat is baked on, means enduring gloss.

Then $200 reduction. Two seasons ago, at $1750, this was a record-value car. The next model—the one I bought—sold at $1550. And now this new model, with its costly improvements, is announced at $1350. That should convince anyone of the HUDSON efficiency.

Last year I waited eight weeks for my HUDSON. Now the output is trebled, they say. But there must be 100,000 class-car buyers who would buy this HUDSON at $1350 if they knew the car as I do.

7-Passenger Phaeton or 3-Passenger Roadster
$1350, f. o. b. Detroit

Also a new Cabriolet, $1650 f. o. b. Detroit

The above ad was written by a well-known HUDSON owner, and the facts are exactly as stated. The 1916 model of the car referred to is now shown by dealers everywhere.

When you go to see it, ask the dealer about his HUDSON service. Its system and extent will surprise you.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. M. F., New Raymer, Col. 1. Although the story of the rich man and Lazarus is the only one of its kind in the New Testament in which a proper name is employed, it is universally regarded as a parable. Lazarus was a familiar name in the country where Jesus spent the years of his ministry. It is true, there are traditions still preserved which give the name of the rich man as Dobruk, and that of the beggar as Nimeusis, but these are unauthentic. Jesus used the two characters to illustrate two different types of men, the helpless and friendless poor and the heartless, selfish rich. 2. The promise which Jesus made to the repentant thief on the cross (which is dealt with in the book "555 Difficult Questions Answered") gave him what he needed most—the assurance of rest and peace. Paul speaks of degrees of heavenly exaltation (II Cor. 12: 2), which was in accordance with the religious teachings of that day. Our Saviour's words conveyed to the penitent the comforting assurance that his future place would be the one best fitted for him, and beyond this it is useless to speculate. 3. Job is believed to have been an important personage, rich and influential, who lived in Arabia near the river Euphrates, about 1800 B.C. His book is regarded as the oldest book in the Bible.

M. E. B., Northfield, Vt. The passage in Luke 22: 36-38 must be interpreted in conjunction with the preceding four verses. Jesus had been testing the faith of his disciples, and now he was admonishing them of the trials and sufferings they must endure in his service after his departure. On this point Edersheim writes: "But again they only understood him in a grossly realistic manner. These Galileans, after the custom of their countrymen, had provided themselves with short swords, which they concealed under the upper garment. Two of them—among them Peter—now produced swords. But this was not the time to reason with them, and our Lord simply put it aside." They interpreted him literally and thought he had referred to present defense, when he really had been looking forward to a future time when trials and dangers would press so hard upon them that they might be tempted to resort to the weapons of the flesh. The meager passage in the Gospels is not to be accepted as implying that Christ advocated the use of weapons, but rather that he wished to show their uselessness.

S. S., Consort, Alta., Can. Temples and places of worship have been a feature of the world's civilization from the very earliest times. The erection of Christian churches may properly be said to date from about the time of Constantine the Great, when Christianity superseded paganism and became the controlling spirit in the architecture of the Christian world. The first assemblies of the primitive Christians, however, were not held in churches, but in the rooms of private houses, or in the open air. In Acts 1: 13 we have an account of the first church meeting indoors in an "upper room" in Jerusalem, where about 120 persons gathered for the first Christian service. Within the next half century, as the result of the apostles' missionary efforts, churches sprang up in many places, and buildings began to be devoted almost exclusively to these services.

Constant Reader, West Plains, Mo. 1. One of the apocryphal books or writings current in the early part of the second century, but not sufficiently authentic to be admitted to the canon, was the "Acts of Paul," which is mentioned in the writings of Origen, Eusebius and Philaster, and which gives information concerning the apostle's career to be found nowhere else. Cyprian also mentions a book under the name of "Paul," and there were others of the same doubtful authentic class. Perhaps the best digest of what is contained in all of the various sources, outside of the New Testament, is that given in Whiston's "Authentic Records" and in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography. 2. Answered by mail.

C. C. H., Burr Oak, Kan. The question whether or not the meal eaten by Jesus and his disciples, at which he instituted the sacrament, was the paschal supper, according to Jewish ecclesiastical law, is a difficult one and has been much discussed. Some authorities regard it as clearly shown in John 13: 1, 2, 28, 29, also John 19: 14, 31, that the evening of the supper was the day preceding the paschal meal. Against this theory, however, other authorities point out that if the Lord's Supper was indeed the paschal feast, the law of Ex. 12: 22 was violated by all the disciples in leaving the house before day-break. The other evangelists furnish material for argument on both sides. See Matt. 26: 18 and Luke 22: 15 as well as I Cor. 11: 23. Some modern authorities regard the supper as a distinct event occurring one or more days before the passover. Lightfoot and Bengel belong to Jesus, in view of his approaching death, chose to anticipate the day.

A. E. C., Deep Creek, Wash. The word "perish" is derived from "pereō," to pass away from life or existence—to be destroyed. In the passage in John 3: 16 we have a continuation of the same illustrative figure that is employed in the two preceding verses. Like the brazen Axon. It will be remembered that Mr. Axon looked after the relief work among the Mexican refugees last year, and received many contributions of clothing from Christian Herald donors. He writes us that all the officers of his regiment attend services on Sundays and encourage their men to attend. From the prescribed order of service for each week, sample of which Mr. Axon sends us, it is seen that successive companies of the regiment have charge of the details of the meetings, provide the decorations, special music, ushers, select the hymns and look after the comfort of every one. Soldier quartettes, the regimental band, instrumental and vocal soloists from the company and the community, are called on for most of the special music. The band takes the place of the organ. The chaplain preaches. On "Threshers' Day" the regiment got up a special hymn head and doubtless used it to good purpose.

Ernestine, Westerville, Ohio. It was a Spartan poet-orator who wrote the famous lines: "A fair thing it is to die in the front rank—a brave man fighting for his native land." The war spirit has been kept alive through the ages by adulation. The martial soul has been lauded and the peace-lover has been despised and craven and effeminate. This to a considerable extent is the dominant note in the Old Testament today, where Christianity, which teaches peace and brotherly love among men, has been almost submerged in the clamor of the great struggle. Yet we have the comforting assurance that a time will come when our sons will no more go out to fight and die, and when the whole world will be filled with the spirit of peace.

Miscellaneous

Any one knowing the whereabouts of Frank Longshore, formerly of Condit, Ohio, would confer a favor by sending address to his mother, Mrs. L. Davidson, Condit, Ohio.

H. E. C., Clyde, N. Y. The hymn "Jesus, and Shall it Ever Be?" was written by John Gregg about one hundred years ago, the original title being "Glorying in Jesus." It was intended to encourage the believer in professing his faith. "A Mighty Stronghold is Our Jesus" is one of the many English versions of Luther's famous hymn "Ein Feste Burg," which he composed for the famous Diet of Spire in April 20, 1529, and became the war song of the Reformation. "How Firm a Foundation," which appeared in 1787 under the title of "The Rock," gave no clue to the authorship beyond the letter K, which is supposed to have been the initial of George Keith, an English writer.

J. J. B., Orange, Va. The word "king" is from the Anglo-Saxon "cyning" or "cynning," the ruler of a tribe, and whose territory was called the "cynningdom," from which we derive the word "kingdom." In the Bible, the word "king" does not always imply a ruler of great importance over a large and populous territory. Many of those called "kings" in the Bible would today be denominated "chiefs" or "heads." An illustration of this kind is found in Joshua 12: 9, 24, which relates how Joshua overthrew thirty-one kings in the comparatively small country of Canaan. These were probably at that time more accurately called "chiefs" or "heads"—the headmen and tribal leaders of that day. The Hebrew and Chaldean titles usually "melek" (ruler).

Reader, Paterson, N. J. The "Holy Grail" or "Sangreal," mentioned by many writers and notably in the Arthurian legends, is said to have been the dish or cup used by our Saviour at the Last Supper. According to some authorities it was also the cup he used at the marriage feast at Cana. One Jewish legend pronounces it the cup which the Queen of Sheba gave to Solomon. In the Cathedral of Genoa is a hexagonal, two-handled cup of glass, three feet nine inches in circumference, which Genoese Catholics claim to be the Grail, or Sacro Catino.

Z. A. K., a reader in Harlan, Ore., sends us a cheery note from his faraway home: "I thought I would be safe in saying that nowhere is the dear old Christian Herald more appreciated than in our home, tucked away back in a little pocket in the coast range mountains, four miles from the railroad and without Sunday school or church or even neighbors. We get all this when some one makes a four-day trip to the post office and returns with the Christian Herald. We have taken the paper so long that I really can't tell you just when I began; but I know it is something like twenty-five years it has been a most welcome gift. We never destroy a paper, but pass them along. We are thoroughly in accord with all its teachings. I will only add that my greatest wish is that the Christian Herald will march on, along, ever keeping the eye single to the Father's glory and hastening his coming kingdom."

PASTURE LAND
By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

The shadows fall, a velvet brown,
Across a stretch of pasture land;
The trees are silent, scarce a breath
Of wind is stirring. God's own hand
Has smoothed the troubles of the world
Away to some far distant shore;
What though the echo of a gun
Proclaims that somewhere there is war?

The grass is short, and heavy feet
Have worn it level with the soil;
The cows have cropped the clover blooms,
And, coming from his daily toil,
The farmer pauses in the shade,
And breathes, perhaps, an honest prayer,
To thank his God for health and peace,
And summer in a world so fair.

When shadows fall, a velvet brown,
To tell that toil, and day, must cease,
When all the world, its trees and grass,
Is covered with a veil of peace—
Then let our feet, that may be worn,
Pause for a bit, that we may stand
Among the cows, and send a prayer
To God from his own pasture land.

this class. Against all this, however, there is the very plain statement of Luke 22: 7-13. Alford, Tischendorf, Ellicott and many modern critics favor what seems to be the obvious interpretation: viz., that the supper was eaten on the evening of the 13th of Nisan, which, until the evening of the 14th, was called "the preparation for the Passover," and that on the 14th (which was also called the preparation, and, besides, was the first day of Passover or of unleavened bread) the crucifixion took place. Dean Alford adds that the Gospel narratives "exclude the supposition that our Lord and his disciples ate the usual passover," implying that serpent in the wilderness, the Cross of Christ was to "lift up" the world, the first to save it from physical death, the second from spiritual death; the brazen serpent was the emblem of salvation to those who had been stung by the fiery serpents, and the cross is the spiritual remedy for every perishing sinner.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE HUSS PAGEANT IN NEW YORK

A FESTIVAL on New York's East Side is different from anything else to be seen under the sun—or under the stars, for it is most delightful at night. For weeks one manotice along one block, or possibly two, mysterious arches strung with electric wires. Still more mysterious signs and banners in unreadable languages announce that wonderful things are to take place beginning on a certain date and extending through three or four days and nights.

At length the time comes; the arches burst forth into electric beauty; flags are hung from windows and across the street; a band, mounted on a story-high stand, fills the air with melody and merriment; pascarts with flaring torches are lined up against the curb to dispense all sorts of eatables and trinkets; confetti flies through the air; from the windows and fire-escapes girls and children and women in Sunday dresses and with happy faces aglow with the radiance from street lamps, store windows, electric arches and the torches look down with satisfied joy.

These festivals are semi-religious, semi-patriotic, usually connected with some church, just as the church at Hollingswood Center will hold a strawberry and ice-cream festival in the church grove. Often they celebrate some great religious or national event. Always the flavor of the old world—Naples, or Poland—or Bohemia.

The Bohemian section of New York is farther uptown than the region known generally as the East Side, and bears evidence of far greater prosperity and modernization, but a few days ago this quarter of the city gave itself up to a genuine old-world celebration, with many new features added, in commemoration of the five hundredth anniversary of the martyrdom of Jan Huss. There was a positive and gleeful note to the festivities, because they were partly to celebrate the completion and dedication of the Jan Hus Neighborhood House. This establishment is connected with the Jan Hus Bohemian Presbyterian Church, which has been for thirty years a powerfully helpful factor in the life of the community. Dr. Vincent Pisek has been the pastor of the church since its organization and is loved and honored and followed most readily by his fellow countrymen of the neighborhood. He was the guiding spirit of the celebration, assisted by his associate, Rev. Kenneth Dexter Miller, who is to be superintendent of the Neighborhood House.

The celebration extended through three days, July 4, 5, 6. Its most spectacular feature being the historical pageant held on the holiday, July 5. Ten floats were drawn through the streets of the Bohemian community, representing various scenes and events in the life of the great martyr. The first float depicted John Huss and his notary. The second showed him as rector of the University of Prague; the third, preaching; the fourth, in conference with Zizka, the great Hussite general. The fifth float portrayed vividly the scene of the martyrdom, showing Huss bound to the stake while fagots are being brought for his destruction. The sixth and seventh floats were Hussite battle scenes, the first showing Zizka and his warriors, the second, Prokop the Great and his compatriots. The eighth float represented the scene of Podesbrad, elected king of Bohemia. The ninth showed Columbia, Bohemia and history, and bore the slogan: "The sufferings and sacrifices of the Bohemian people have not been in vain." This float was designed to show that the desires and hopes of the ancestors of America's Bohemians have found their fulfillment in their prosperity and freedom in the new land. At the end of the procession came the bell "Jan Hus," which had been secured by contributions from the people of the community for the new Neighborhood House. This float was drawn by boys from the Sunday school, and attended by twelve little girls dressed in white. At the conclusion of the pageant the bell was consecrated and hoisted to the new bell tower especially built for it through the generosity of Mrs. Helen Hartley Jenkins.

In the afternoon the performance was given of the Bohemian operetta "Bohemia in Song," arranged from Bohemian folk songs by Dr. Pisek and sung by the young people of the church in native Bohemian costumes.

At the church service next morning, July 6, the new bell sounded for the first time, and a large crowd of people obeyed its summons to the memorial church service. In the evening the great mass meeting in memory of Huss was held, at which many representatives of American as well as Slavonic churches attended. Among the speakers and guests were: Hon. Frank Moss; Chancellor Brown of New York University; Father Nikoly Velmirovich of the Serbian Orthodox Church; Professor Michael R.

Pupin, royal consulate general of Serbia; Professor Francis Brown, president of Union Theological Seminary.

The new Jan Hus Neighborhood House, built through the Church Extension Committee of New York Presbytery, gives a complete and modern equipment for religious education and for social work. With its club room, meeting room, gymnasium and workers' quarters it is without doubt one of the most complete and attractive plants for distinctive foreign work existing in this country. Dr. Pisek and his congregation have been eagerly looking forward to having this building for many years and it is regarded as in the providence of God that they were able officially to dedicate it on the occasion of the 500th anniversary of the martyrdom of John Huss.

The responses read at the dedication services of the Neighborhood House on Sunday, America's Independence Day, convey in a beautiful manner the real meaning and spirit of its work:

"Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, loving Father of all men, to thee we dedicate this house. Christ, the Son of man, who came to minister to the hungry, the thirsty, the strangers, the naked and the sick, to thee we dedicate this house. Spirit of God, Spirit of peace, good-will and brotherliness, to thee we dedicate this house. To the development of the artistic, cultural and intellectual life of the Bohemian people, we dedicate this house. To join the hands of the Bohemian and American peoples in the quest of a new America wherein dwelleth righteousness, we dedicate this house. To a sympathetic and joyful ministry to the needs of the countrymen of Jan Hus, in the name and in the spirit of the Master for whom he lived and died five hundred years ago, we dedicate this house."

The dedication sermon was preached by Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin; the dedication responses were led by Professor William Adams Brown of Union Seminary, who also made the prayer of consecration.

The new Neighborhood House was erected at a cost of about forty thousand dollars. The present church building is valued at $50,000. The congregation numbers 300 members, the Sunday school more than 900.

GREATEST WISDOM IN THE WORLD

A REVIVAL SERMON BY STEPHEN A. NORTHROP, D.D.*

TEXT: "He that winneth souls is wise." Prov. 11: 30

GR^{EAT} truths are often expressed in fewest words, as with sunbeams, the more they are condensed the deeper they burn. The text is one of those familiar proverbs, crystallized in one brief sentence, like maxims in law, aphorisms in literature, axioms in philosophy and postulates in mathematics. It is one of those diamond gems of Scripture frequently quoted, and as we turn it toward the Sun of righteousness and the mellow warmth of the Holy Spirit, the rays of the divine light falling on each face and angle, how it flashes forth the will of God that man should be won back to his open arms by the righteous wisdom of soul-winning. As man was instrumental in the ruin of the race, so should he be in the salvation of the race, the divine and the human blending in heroic service. "Everywhere the human soul," says Carlyle, "stands between the hemisphere of light and darkness, on the confines of two hostile empires." And methinks the winning Christ, with his fishers of men, stands upon the shores of the hemisphere of light to draw all men unto him "from the wild ocean of the world's sea of sin."

I.—Consider the inestimable value of the soul as the great incentive to the mightiest endeavor. The value of anything depends on its intrinsic worth; upon what it costs of time, labor, sacrifice and means to secure it. Put all worlds, known and unknown, in the one scale, and the immortal soul of the vilest outcast in the other, and how kicks the beam? the spiritual outweighs the material.—

Knowest thou the importance of a soul immortal?
Behold the midnight glory; worlds on worlds;
Amazing pomp; redouble thine amazement;
Ten thousand add and twice ten thousand more;
Then weigh the whole: one soul outweighs them all!

But there is a truer method by which to determine the value of a soul—God's estimate. The real worth of anything depends on what the one knowing its value is willing to give for it. He who created the soul only knew of its worth, and so in exchange gave his only begotten Son. The redemptive price paid, not with corruptible things as gold and silver, was the precious blood of Christ, the highest gift and the brightest glory all Heaven could afford. To win souls, then, must be the ruling passion of our lives. Indeed it is the sum total of all wisdom; he that is wise in everything else but soul-saving is not wise. "He that winneth souls is wise."

The Master-Passion of Soul Winning

WHAT is it to win souls? Christianity is winsome, persuasive, alluring. "We beseech men." This is the very genius of the Gospel. On the inauguration day of the new kingdom, from the shore of that historic sea, Jesus called Simon and Andrew, brothers; James and John, brothers, and said, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." And so we have the apostolic fraternity a type of a universal brotherhood—commissioned to be soul winners. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save the lost." The Father sent the Son on this one mission and the Son sends us. "If souls will not come to Christ we must take Christ to them. Our word of command is to go for them, drawing, constraining. Here is a stronger term still, "Pulling them out of the fire"; "snatching them as brands from the burning." And what does Paul say about his master passion? "Knowing the terrors of the law we persuade men." "I cease not to warn every one night and day with tears." Even Job, a thousand years before the Cross, is stirred by the same heroic endeavor: "Deliver them from going down to the pit!"

In this inspiring work we should never make ourselves self-centering. In other words, we are to point souls right away from self to the Master. It is only when God is everything and we are nothing, that the Holy Spirit in saving and convicting power descends in pentecostal blessing upon our efforts. Fishers of men must keep themselves out of sight if they wish a good catch.

Summer schools, Northfield Institutes, Student Crusades, Winona Assemblies, have constantly before them this supreme question in one form or another: "How to win souls?" In these changing times, with all the attractive amusements seven days in the week to sidetrack humanity, the Church is up against the most serious problem of all the centuries. How to reach young men? How to grip boys and girls? How to line up the pulpit and pew to the grave responsibility to save the lost? Who can give the key? Who are the wise?

The question was asked of the matron in one of our great metropolitan union stations, "how do you enjoy your work?" "I have no heart in it; I'm here for the money that's in it," was her answer. Henry W. Grady of Georgia spent a few days in a northern city with his good wife. Next to his apartment he saw crepe on the door. He asked his landlady who was dead. She coolly replied, "I don't know; it's none of my funeral." Grady turned to his wife and exclaimed, "Let's go back to Georgia where neighbors love one another." What would Jesus have done? Just as he did in Palestine. He goes where people are sick, where people are dying, where people hunger, where people labor, and he cures them, comforts them, rests them. In city, country, lake, mountain, valley, wherever he finds a broken heart, he is always the same affectionate Friend: pitying and loving, living and doing, serving and saving, weeping and dying.

Sanctified sympathy and affection will do more to lead souls to Christ than intellectual ways and means. This poor world of ours craves more heart than brains, longs for manly sympathy; not a sickly sentimentality that piles flowers upon the caskets of the dead, a kind of post mortem love, but a love that scatters them in the pathway of the living, their fragrance giving life, hope and peace. What a power over the human heart is the kindly greeting, the warm hand-grasp; the comforting word in the hour of social trouble or financial reverse, the tender inquiry, the friendly call; the cheery salute; with a face of sunshine in pew, shop, office, store, avenue, to all classes, high or low, rich or poor. Why not love people into the kingdom?

A Loud Call to Personal Work

DEAD saints can never win live sinners! Sluggish Christians are no match for the quick-witted! The regular, faultily faultless, splendidly null can never outrun the on-rushing man of the world. In grace as in nature light should overtake darkness. Nothing but the loud bugle-blast, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength!" can arouse the average Christian to this God-entrusted mission. Soul-saving business should be systematic; evangelism should be the normal condition of the Church. The chariot wheels of salvation should never stop. A certain class of Christians feed on the effervescence of emotionalism; they make a great noise when the evangelist arrives. Some never "rescue the perishing" unless pressed into service; like wheelbarrows, they move out into "the highways and hedges" only when pushed. Others show wonderful zeal with no results; like rocking-chairs motion, motion, but no progress. Some during Easter week or Lenten season seem to make great headway, but like bicycles fall flat when no especial effort is made. For real, downright, evangelistic business, we must have warm hearts that glow with the white heat of enthusiasm twelve months in the year, and lips touched with a live coal from off the altar seven days in the week. We shall never move others Christward till we first move ourselves. Our Saviour was so intensely concerned to save the lost that his critics declared, "He hath a devil," and of Paul, "Thou art beside thyself." The same fault was found with scores of men whose consuming passion was to evangelize the world: men like Whitfield, whose heart yearned night and day for the perishing, like the saintly Alleine, who was "infinitely greedy for the conversion of souls;" like Lyman Beecher, who affirmed, "that the greatest thing was not theology, not controversy, but saving souls;" like Matthew Henry, "I think it is a greater happiness to gain one soul to Christ than mountains of silver and gold;" like Summerfield, after an illness of months, crying out, "Oh, if I might be raised again how I would preach! I could preach as never before, for I have taken a look into eternity."

We are living in a new era of evangelistic awakening among our laymen, which is a source of cheer to pastors and evangelists in the thick of the fight. We see leading Christian men and women of our churches forging to the front to help the lost to "strike the trail." Oftentimes men of the world will listen to a representative lawyer, physician, merchant, statesman, on the great theme of the Gospel, when they would turn a deaf ear to the most eloquent preacher in Christendom.

We must bring sinners to the feet of our Lord one by one. A Church of three hundred does not do a very thing when, under a consecrated pastor's leadership, on their knees last New Year every member vowed to God to win one soul that year. The Gospel plan is that his people are saved not in masses or classes but individually. Telling of Jesus to crowded audiences may inspire the speaker, but it is the prudent personal work that counts the most. With every revolution of the earth upon its axis, statisticians tell us, 1,000 souls are ushered into eternity; but men and women must be led into the kingdom one by one. Jesus must needs walk the hot sands of Samaria to reach one humble woman. At Jacob's well he found a congregation of one, and soon she quaffs the water of everlasting life. An angel guides the steps of that mighty layman, Philip, to a desert place to meet just one man, a cabinet officer of queen Candace, and here we have personified a living Christian on the run to save one soul.

Christianity always has and always will grow along the axis of personal finding. A winsome B. wins C., and C. wins D. The first chapter of John emphasizes this divine method. There stands the rugged, pioneer preacher of Judea with two disciples. He introduces them to the Lamb of God; human-nature like first findeth his brother man; Jesus then findeth Philip, and Philip findeth Nathanael. Surely this is the chapter of Eureka!

The Assurance of a Positive Faith

WE ARE to win souls by revealing a personal Saviour in sermon and testimony. Souls are to be won through the gateway of speech, and the best way to preach sinners to Christ is to teach Christ to sinners. It was the heavenly appointed plan for reaching with transforming power the hearts of men as implied in that little word "Go," spoken by our Lord to his astonished disciples at Olivet. They took up that word of command, and like an electric message, it ran all along the apostolic line. After Pentecost, Peter lifted up his voice for Christ as the only Redeemer. In the very presence of the murderers of Jesus he fearlessly declares, "Him ye have taken and by wicked hands crucified and slain." No wonder such a sermon brought three thousand souls to their knees. Now comes the call! Toward the cross his index finger points to you almost see the letters of light: "We preach Christ." He melts that name in every sentence he utters. To win souls, then, "Christ" must be the all in all of sermon, testimony and life.

These sublime truths that attract the hearts of men are the same to-day as when they came from the lips of our Lord. Redemption means just what it did when the warm blood ran down his quivering side. Man, in all his sorrows and sins, is just the same as when men mocked him with "here he saved, himself he cannot save." The old story won its way to the hearts of men in apostolic days and why not now? Dragging into the pulpit social problems, making it the medium for advising false issues, these are methods that repel rather than attract. A faith proclamation, positive and clear, with no suggestive doubts, has always succeeded best and always will. Trying to bolster up the Cross by negations never convicts. Science has won all its victories by affirmation. So with the Gospel. The assurance, the "I know" ways awakens thought and concern. "We believe and therefore speak" is a sure token of victory. Said Goethe to a friend, "If you have convictions, I will listen; but keep your doubts to yourself." Said Daniel Webster, "In the house of God I will meditate on the simple verities and the undoubted facts of religion, and not upon its mysteries and abstractions."

Finally, what is the compensation after all of the soul-winner? It seems to me, speaking from experience, that the happiest man this side of heaven is the one who has been the humble instrument of leading scores to Jesus. To save a soul is a glory Gabriel might envy, for "it shall come to you at even time it shall be light;" to look back at the weary but fruitful years and recall hundreds of faces made bright, homes made better, though "saving grace and dying love." "Your heaven will be two heavens for me," said the dying Ruford to his spiritual children. So this glorious service will be rewarded with a record, written on beautiful Italian marble, or on tables of precious stone, or halls of fame, but upon the tables of the heart and the unfading pages of the soul.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

An Unsundered Sword

SUNDAY, July 25. Romans 6: 13. "Yield yourselves unto God . . . and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God." "Your sword first!" It was the speech of Nelson to an officer of the enemy who had been taken prisoner, and who waited to shake hands with the great admiral. "Your sword first!" Surrender before communion! Homage before familiarity: the relinquishing of the last symbol of hostility before the can be free courtesies of friendship. And that too, is the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. The condition of a full communion with the Lord is absolute surrender. So long as we retain a sword the fellowship is broken. We may seek the gifts of grace, and the consolations of the promises, and the encompassing care of Providence, but if we hold to our sword the search is in vain. "Your sword first!"

Our Lord demands the weapon with which we have fought him. That instrument must be yielded as an instrument of righteousness. But too often we aim his friendship and yet deny him our sword. We pay back part of the price. Perhaps the sword is of money which is still unconsecrated, and which is still used on the fields of rebellion. Or perhaps it is a flashing wit which remains unhallowed, a fine amascene blade which is exercised in questionable ministries. Or perhaps it is a sharp temper which has never been yielded to the command and mission of the Lord. The sword is the unsundered anything which is still employed under the authority and control of the kingdom of the world.

That unsundered sword is the all-sufficient explanation of much inglorious discipleship. How can there be the joy of battle in a divided heart? How can we have the kindling passion of righteousness when we are supplying arms to the foe? How can we fight the good fight of faith when a grim selfishness lurks in the soul? How can we enter in a noble crusade when some member of the soul is dallying with rebellion? "Your sword first! And with the surrender of the last weapon the warfare begins. In the full reconciliation with the Lord we are baptized with fire, even the fire of the Holy Ghost. J. H. J.

God's Call Inspires with Courage

MONDAY, July 26. Isaiah 41: 1-14. "Fear thou not." The conception in this passage is superb. Jehovah summons the earth, as far as the remote stars of the west, to determine whether he or the gods of the nations is the true God. Immediately there is great commotion. On their way to the great assembly each bids the other take courage. There is an industrious furbishing up of the dilapidated idols and the manufacture of new ones. It is like the bringing repainting of the saints of the time-worn altar of a fishing village, in the hope of making them more efficient to save in winter storms. What all this is afoot, Jehovah turns to Israel, saying the chosen people that whatever appearance might be against them, he had chosen them and could not cast them away. They are thrice added not to fear. "Fear thou not, for I am with thee. No height, however steep, no depth, however profound, can separate us from his love. No dangers, therefore, however numerous, should dismay us. Heart and flesh may fail, but he will strengthen. Difficulties may seem appalling, but we will deal with them. The feet may be cut and bleeding with the desert march, but he will uphold this strong right hand.

"The Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not." How often has the life been enabled to bear the surgeon's knife if the hand sat by her and held her hand in his. The human hand has a marvelous power of imparting sympathy and strength; but how much more so! "Fear not . . . behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing-instrument." He can take those who count themselves as worms, as insignificant few, as ciphers and nobodies, and can make them mighty in his service. In thine own esteem thou mayst be as lowly and inarticulate as a worm; but only thou wouldst yield thyself to God, he would make of thee an irresistible threshing-instrument, severing wheat from chaff. Spirit in Service

TUESDAY, July 27. Joel 2: 28. "I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions." The old prophet, Joel, was a bearer of a warning note regarding the visitations of the consequence of men's sins upon their own heads, but he was also a prophet of the divine pity and the divine favor, which would come upon a people into whose hearts he would empty his Spirit.

Today, as then, we try to save ourselves and the world in two ways, by material and by spiritual forces. At present we seem to be, as a people, believers in the social propaganda, in trying to lift up the earth by means of all kinds of philanthropic and secular applications to the social organism. It is a timely emphasis of the second great commandment of Jesus, the love and the effort to make the world better by making society better, by thinking of mankind in masses.

Yet we need to keep ever in mind that Christianity works from the inside to the outside of a man or woman, and not from the outside to the heart. The method of Jesus was to get men right, and he trusted right men to make and to maintain right laws. His woes pronounced against the Pharisees were warnings against wrong hearts; "whited sepulchers" was his withering term applied to them, for he saw that ever so perfect care for outward rites and conventional exercises could not save men from themselves. "The words that I speak unto you," said the Master, "they are spirit, and they are life." As Christians, our work is first with the individual, with ourselves. Spiritual forces are the great forces that rule the world. "Am I right?" that is the first question. A wrong inner motive cannot make a right or permanently successful outer service. C. S. C.

The Power of Honest Record-Bearing

WEDNESDAY, July 28. John 10: 17-42. "John did no miracle; but all things that John spake of this man were true." It was no care to the Baptist that he was unable to work a miracle. He who had sent him had not put miracles into the program of his life, and he was perfectly satisfied with the arrangement. His commission was to announce the coming of the King, and to speak true things about Jesus Christ. To fulfil this task, for which he had been qualified and sent forth, and to do it so as to please him that sent him, was his one ambition and aim. He did it, undaunted by threat, unspoiled by popularity—and this made him great.

The lesson is for us all. We can work no miracles. It is for others to dazzle by the splendor of their intellect and the brilliance of their speech. For us are allotted the path in the valley, the monotony of the commonplace, the gray sky and drab environment. But let us take heart. Though we cannot do miracles, we can speak true, brave words to our Lord. John spoke to crowds, but it was what he said to two of his disciples, as they stood with him, that gave our Lord Andrew and the rest. He spoke experimentally, as when he said: "I saw and bare record." He spoke with earnest and eager tones, as the Bridegroom's friend. Though he had been dead for two years, his words were still in the people's memories, and as they recalled and compared them with the Lord's career, many were led to faith. We are doing more than we know, starting streams that will refresh hundreds all along their course, and planting orchards whose fruit will refresh coming generations. And as people stand beside our graves, they will say: "Well! well! he was not brilliant and did no miracles, but he spoke true words of the Master." F. B. M.

Religious Foundations

THURSDAY, July 29. Psalm 127: 1. "Except Jehovah build the house, they labor in vain that build it." We have a vast array of "foundations"—educational foundations, medical foundations, peace foundations—but as the psalmist said, below all these and essential to the ultimate triumph of these is the Foundation of Religion. It is religion, the life of God in the soul of man, that has stirred the world most deeply. It is a strong religious idea that has been found capable of uprooting the long established habits for drink and vicious living. It is to religion that people turn in disaster and in sorrow. It is religion that has raised the fiercest controversies and it is religion that draws the masses and makes saints and orators out of common men.

Has religion a real place in the groundwork of my earthly house? Is my career being lived under the eyes of God? These are the all-important queries; and the affirmative answer spells success for us in our life-work, no matter with what particular calling we may be associated.

In fencing off time to give to a study of the Book of Psalms, for instance—the literature that perhaps more than any other in the world has called out the deep aspirations of our religious consciousness, the attending to the "spirit and the method" of Jesus, as Matthew Arnold spoke of religion—here lies our personal hope of greatness; here also lies the hope of the state. As Harold Begbie has said: "One power and one alone can make the habitual criminal a good man in the loftiest and only lasting sense of that term—and that force is religion."

Let God build the house.

The Influence of Simple Christian Lives

FRIDAY, July 30. I Thessalonians 1: 8. "From you hath sounded forth the word of the Lord . . . so that we do not need to speak." What a beautiful testimony this was to the Christian character of these people! Their lives were so holy, so consistent, so beautiful that they rendered even the apostle's words needless. Probably they were just simple, ordinary folk. In a later paragraph he speaks of them as working with their own hands. But though the setting was poor, the jewel of character was so rich and beautiful that it dazzled all beholders, and the tidings spread that a new human type had appeared in those worn-out lands, where every idolatry and philosophy had been tried and failed. There are sermons without speech, and songs without words. We are reminded of those beautiful words of the psalmist, when, speaking of the heavens and their contents, he said:

Day unto day uttereth speech;
There is no speech nor language.
Their words have gone out to the end of the world.

Are our lives of this sort? Do they preach with silent eloquence to the people who know us best? Is it true that what we are speaks so loudly that men cannot hear what we say? When, on one occasion, a number of Christian friends were retailing the ways in which they had been brought to Christ, a young girl broke in by saying, "I was not converted by any one's preaching, but by my Aunt Mary's living." There are some people who live eloquently.

What is the secret of such living? We have it in the previous verses. These people were imitators of the Lord. They received the word in much affliction, but in much assurance. They were welling over with joy; and probably it was this that arrested the wonder and admiration of their contemporaries. The world may be merry, but it is joyless, and when they hear apostles singing in the stocks they begin to ask how they too may be saved. F. B. M.

He Saves to the Uttermost

SATURDAY, July 31. Mark 9: 23. "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Bishop Fowler once called to see a dying infidel. He realized that his doctrine of the "geology of character," which he had privately embraced, would not do in this case. So he said to the man, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." The dying man exclaimed, "Don't tell me that; for fifty years I have been crystallized in sin and now I have only an hour or two to live. You can't make me over in an hour." He said again, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." And then he added another promise: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Light flashed upon the face of the dying man as he said, "Say that again!" after which he cried, "I believe it! I believe it! Glory be to God! It is not dark; I can die now." That night the dying man passed away, saved by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ, and Bishop Fowler was cured of his "geology of character." He saw that the only salvation was to rest on Christ, the Rock of Ages, to lie down hard upon the atonement, to throw away every human hope, clasping, by faith, the divine Saviour. E. W. C.

And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

Germany Answers Our Note of June 10

The full text of the German Note received at the State Department in Washington July 9, replying to the American Note of June 10, is given below:

BERLIN, July 8.—The undersigned has the honor to make the following reply to his Excellency Ambassador Gerard to the note of the 10th ultimo re the impairment of American interests by the German submarine war:

THE Imperial Government learned with satisfaction from the note how earnestly the Government of the United States is concerned in seeing the principles of humanity realized in the present war. Also this appeal finds ready echo in Germany, and the Imperial Government is quite willing to permit its statements and decisions in the present case to be governed by the principles of humanity just as it has done always.

International Friendship

The Imperial Government welcomed with gratitude when the American Government, in the note of May 15, itself recalled that Germany had always permitted itself to be governed by the principles of progress and humanity in dealing with the law of maritime war.

Since the time when Frederick the Great negotiated with John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson the Treaty of Friendship and Commerce of Sept. 9, 1785, between Prussia and the Republic of the West, German and American statesmen have, in fact, always stood together in the struggle for the freedom of the seas and for the protection of peaceable trade. In the international proceedings which since have been conducted for the regulation of the laws of maritime war, Germany and America have jointly advocated progressive principles, especially the abolishment of the right of capture at sea and the protection of the interests of neutrals.

Even at the beginning of the present war, the German Government immediately declared its willingness, in response to proposals of the American Government, to ratify the Declaration of London and thereby subject itself in the use of its naval forces to all the restrictions provided therein in favor of neutrals.

Germany likewise has been always tenacious of the principle that war should be conducted against the armed and organized forces of an enemy country, but that the enemy civilian population must be spared as far as possible from the measures of war. The Imperial Government cherishes the definite hope that some way will be found when peace is concluded, or perhaps earlier, to regulate the law of maritime war in a manner guaranteeing the freedom of the seas, and will welcome it with gratitude and satisfaction if it can work hand in hand with the American Government on that occasion.

The Submarine War on Trade

If in the present war the principles which should be the ideal of the future have been traversed more and more, the longer its duration, the German Government has no guilt therein. It is known to the American Government how Germany's adversaries, by completely paralyzing peaceable traffic between Germany and neutral countries, have aimed from the very beginning and with increasing lack of consideration at the destruction not so much of the armed forces as the life of the German nation, repudiating in doing so all the rules of international law and disregarding all rights of neutrals.

On Nov. 3, 1914, England declared the North Sea a war area, and by planting poorly anchored mines and by the stoppage and capture of vessels, made passage extremely dangerous and difficult for neutral shipping, thereby actually blockading neutral coasts and ports contrary to all international law. Long before the beginning of submarine war England practically completely intercepted legitimate neutral navigation to Germany also. Thus Germany was driven to a submarine war on trade.

On Nov. 14, 1914, the English Premier declared in the House of Commons that it was one of England's principal tasks to prevent food for the German population from reaching Germany via neutral ports. Since March 1 England has been taking from neutral ships without further formality all merchandise proceeding to Germany, as well as all merchandise coming from Germany, even when neutral property. Just as it was also with the Boers, the German people is now to be given the choice of perishing from starvation with its women and children or of relinquishing its independence.

Germany's Fight for Existence

While our enemies thus loudly and openly proclaimed war without mercy until our utter destruction, we were conducting a war in self-defense for our national existence and for the sake of peace of an assured permanency. We have been obliged to adopt a submarine warfare to meet the declared intentions of our enemies and the method of warfare adopted by them in contravention of international law.

With all its efforts in principle to protect neutral life and property from damage as much as possible, the German Government recognized unreservedly in its memorandum of Feb. 4 that the interests of neutrals might suffer from the submarine warfare. However, the American Government will also understand and appreciate that in the fight for existence, which has been forced upon Germany by its adversaries and announced by them, it is the sacred duty of the Imperial Government to do all within its power to protect and save the lives of German subjects. If the Imperial Government were derelict in these its duties, it would be guilty before God and history of the violation of those principles of highest morality which are the foundation of every national existence.

The Lusitania Case Discussed

The case of the Lusitania shows with horrible clearness to what jeopardizing of lives the manner of conducting war employed by our adversaries leads. In the most contradiction of international law all distinctions between merchantmen and warships have been obliterated by the order to British merchantmen to arm themselves and submarines, and the promise of rewards therefor, and neutrals who use merchant ships as travelers thereby have been exposed in an increasing degree to all the dangers of war.

If the commander of the German submarine which destroyed the Lusitania had caused the crew and passengers to take to the boats before firing a torpedo this would have meant the sure destruction of his own vessel. After the experiences in sinking much smaller and less seaworthy vessels it was to be expected that a mighty ship like the Lusitania would remain above water long enough, even after the torpedoing, to permit passengers to reach the ship's boats. Circumstances of a very peculiar kind, especially the presence of large quantities of highly explosive materials (word omitted, possibly "disseminated") this expectation.

In addition it may be pointed out that if the Lusitania had been spared, thousands of cases of munitions would have been sent to Germany's enemies and thereby thousands of German mothers and children robbed of breadwinners.

A Proposition to Safeguard American Lives

In the spirit of friendship wherewith the German nation has been imbued to the Union (United States) and its inhabitants since the earliest days of its existence, the German Government will always be ready to do all it can during the present war also to prevent the jeopardizing of lives of American citizens.

The Imperial Government, therefore, repeats the assurances that American ships will not be hindered in the prosecution of legitimate shipping and the lives of American citizens in neutral vessels shall not be placed in jeopardy.

In order to exclude any unforeseen dangers to American passenger steamers made possible in view of the conduct of maritime war by Germany's adversaries, German submarines will be instructed to permit the free and safe passage of such passenger steamers when made recognizable by special markings and notified a reasonable time in advance. The Imperial Government, however, confidently hopes that the American Government will assume to guarantee that these vessels have no contraband on board, details of arrangements for the unhampered passage of these vessels to be agreed upon by the naval authorities of both sides.

For Safe Trans-Atlantic Travel

In order to furnish adequate facilities for travel across the Atlantic for American citizens, the German Government submits for consideration a proposal to increase the number of available steamers by installing in passenger service a reasonable number of neutral steamers under the American flag, the exact number to be agreed upon under the same conditions as the above-mentioned American steamers.

The Imperial Government believes it can assume that in this manner adequate facilities for travel across the Atlantic Ocean can be afforded American citizens. They would therefore, appear to be no compelling necessity for American citizens to travel in Europe in time of war on ships carrying an enemy flag. In particular the Imperial Government is unable to admit that American citizens can protect an enemy ship through the mere fact of their presence on board.

Germany merely followed England's example when she declared part of the North Sea an area of war. Consequently, accidents suffered by neutrals on enemy ships in an area of war cannot well be judged differently from accidents to which neutrals are at all times exposed at the seat of war on land, when they betake themselves into dangerous conditions in spite of previous warnings.

May Travel in Enemy's Steamers Under U. S. Flag

If, however, it should not be possible for the American Government to acquire an adequate number of neutral passenger steamers, the Imperial Government is prepared to interpose no objections to the placing under the American flag by the American Government of four enemy passenger steamers for passenger traffic between North America and Europe. Assurances of "free and safe" passage for American passenger steamers would then be able to apply under the identical pre-conditions to these formerly hostile passenger steamers.

The President of the United States has declared his readiness, in a way deserving thanks, to communicate and suggest proposals to the Government of Great Britain with particular reference to the alteration of maritime war. The Imperial Government will always be glad to make use of the good offices of the President and hopes that his efforts in the present case as well as in the direction of the lofty ideal of the freedom of the seas will lead to an understanding.

The undersigned requests the Ambassador to bring the above to the knowledge of the American Government, and avails himself of the opportunity to renew to his Excellency the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

VON JAGOW

What Shall Our Answer Be?

THE long-looked-for reply from Germany to the United States which was published in America on July 10 gives good hope that an amicable understanding between the United States and the Kaiser's government can be reached. The note is friendly and kindly in tone. The only serious divergence of view between the United States and Germany is that the American administration insisted that the right must be conceded to all American citizens to travel on all ships at all times in all waters, the German government contending that American citizens should not travel on belligerent vessels through the war zone nor on any vessels carrying contraband. It is perfectly true that this is a new sort of International Law, but it is also perfectly true that the present gigantic war is creating conditions never before faced and for which the present code of International Law makes insufficient provision. Secretary Bryan's contention that in the interests of world-wide peace American citizens should forego their former rights of sea-travel to the extent of traveling through the war zone only on neutral ships and in other seas only on ships not carrying contraband of war would seem to be thoroughly reasonable, thoroughly American and thoroughly consistent with America's avowed desires for peace. The New York Tribune, commenting on Germany's reply, said editorially: "A method of separation of ammunition cargoes and American passengers can be found. A majority of the American people seem plainly willing that certain American rights should be waived, that American citizens may not be used as a screen for the transport of ammunition intended to destroy man soldiers."

The administration must remember that the voice of the throes of a new and desperate turmoil. So far as the advantage of standing just outside. We must not let the noise and fever of the turmoil itself to deflect attention from its ordinary calm and deliberate process. The reply to Germany must be framed not in the heat of the struggle now raging but with the cool and modious thinking that takes account of the year. History will praise us for being willing to forego to some of our rights and to make certain compromises in previous demands in the deeper and farther-reaching interests of Peace!

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic, staff writer of the Paris Daily Matin and Le Temps; contributor to L'Independence Belge

THE fighting on the western battle line during the week ending July 8 has been, on the whole, colorless and has had the general character of "routine business," there being no apparent concerted and sequential offensive on any point of the line, the French movement of this kind north of Arras, which lasted for six weeks, having terminated for the moment.

It does not mean that there has not been fierce and murderous fighting, however, in isolated sections, particularly in the Argonne and Meuse-Moselle regions, but simply that the fighting has not been to any particular well-defined tactical end. In the Vosges have been comparatively quiet, and their calm has been only disturbed by intermittent skirmishes.

A little farther to the west, in the Meuse-Moselle region, there was particularly hard fighting in the vicinity of Ailly and the forests of Le Prétre and Apremont, in which regions the Germans made an effort to retake the ground lost by them to the French in May. This effort was successful only in the western part of the Le Prétre fort, where the Germans made progress of some consequence, capturing about a thousand prisoners and some artillery. At Ailly and in the forest of Apremont the French were able to repulse the German attacks.

North of this and nearer Verdun, at Le Eparges, a rather fierce battle raged for three days, with no very well-defined results; this was also an effort on the part of the Germans to recover lost ground.

In the Argonne at many points there was intense fighting, with the object, the French say, of cutting their communication between Châlons-sur-Marne and Verdun. This fighting at no point assumed the importance of a general engagement. Whatever the object may have been there was no important change in the relative positions of the combatants as a result.

From the Argonne to Noyon all was quiet until Arras was reached. Arras itself was very severely bombarded by the Germans toward the middle of this week, with the object of destroying the British stores gathered in that city, which is the main British supply depot. This object the Germans failed to have accomplished. Incidentally during the bombardment the beautiful cathedral was destroyed. North of Arras there was comparative quiet, though twice there was fighting of some importance at and near Souchez, which resulted in the French gaining ground.

North of Ypres the British made an attack on the German positions, gaining ground and taking some prisoners; a subsequent counter attack, however, drove them back to their original positions. From Ypres to the sea all was reasonably quiet.

An instance of how costly in lives the fighting on the western line has been, the case of the Canadian Princess Patricia Light Infantry may be cited. This regiment reached the firing line about the first of March, but until February 28 was held practically in reserve. Two and a half months later, on May 7, the regiment was still 645 strong, but on May 15 they were withdrawn from the trenches only 142 men commanded by the one officer left, a lieutenant.

The south Polish campaign has been again the most important of any of the campaigns the past year, and in this field of action the advancing line of the Teutonic allies now stretches practically unbroken from north of Radom eastward, through Janow and Lipsko, to the Vistula River, which it reaches a little to the south of Solez. To the eastward, between the Vistula and the Bug, the line starts at Josefow on the eastward bank of the Vistula, and thence runs north of Krasnik, north of Turobin, north of Samostje to Krylow on the west bank of the Bug.

Some attempts were made by the Russians to stem the tide of this advance, but these proved only strong enough to check for a few hours the advancing Teutons. Towards the end of the week the defensive grew stronger, as reinforcements, both of men and of artillery, reached the Russians. As these lines are being written a battle of importance is going on a little to the north of the line above outlined, on the issue of which hangs the fate of Lublin, Ivangorod and ultimately Warsaw. The nearest points on this line are not more than twenty miles from Ivangorod and about fourteen from Lublin.

Lublin, if the Russians are defeated in the present battle, would offer presumably little resistance to the Teutons, in fact would most probably be abandoned; but the fortress of Ivangorod, one of the four strongholds composing the so-called Polish quadrangle, will be a much more difficult place to take, particularly as the heavy artillery necessary to its capture will have to be brought up slowly over roads of rather poor quality, as it is to be presumed that the retreating Russians will destroy the railroad from Radom to the fortress, as they fall back along it.

In Galicia itself, the cleaning up process continues in the southeast, where the Russians were driven back to and across the Zlotz Lipa, whose left bank along its entire length is now occupied by the army of General von Lensengen.

The next step will be the crossing of this river, which, if the Russians resist wholeheartedly, will be an operation of considerable difficulty, and if successfully achieved will compel a Russian retreat to the line of the Strypa River, to the eastward, the next to the last of these north and south running rivers which form a natural line of defense for the Russians.

Farther to the southeast, between the Pruth and Dniester Rivers, the Russians in the early part of the week made desperate attacks on the Austrians, but were repulsed, it is said, with losses estimated as high as 20,000. As the combined German and Austrian forces work down into this sector, the Russian position here is apt to grow more untenable.

In this South Polish and Galician fighting during the past week the Germans claim the capture of about 35,000 prisoners, besides a considerable quantity of artillery and munitions of war.

In central Poland there was some hard fighting on the Warsaw front in the middle of the week. Here the Germans attacked the Russian positions between Scernewice and Sochatchew, a little northeast of Borlizow, and carried them at the point of the bayonet, inflicting considerable losses on the enemy. Russian counter attacks were unavailing to recover the lost positions. In Poland, north of the Vistula, the Germans began an attack on Prasnych, which is still in progress. Both of these movements are connected with the general attack on Warsaw.

In a naval battle off the Swedish coast between the Russians and Germans, the facts of which are not precisely known, a German mine-layer was sunk and one or two torpedo boats, but as regards other casualties the accounts contradict each other most flatly.

From the Dardanelles we at last have a little definite information. General Hamilton reports that the third Turkish assault on the position of the Allies on Gallipoli Peninsula, delivered from July 4 onward, was decisively repulsed, and very heavy losses inflicted on the Turks, and further states that the Allies are now only six miles from the Narrows of the straits. No naval action appears to have taken place in the Dardanelles themselves for some time. London intimates that another general assault by the Allies, both by land and sea, may be looked for at an early moment.

General Hamilton also makes the first official report we have had so far of the British losses in the Dardanelles, but only for the ten days, April 25 to May 5, the period of the landing. These losses aggregated 14,800, without including those of the naval brigade or of the French; probably the total losses of the Allies on Gallipoli to date exceed 110,000. The British put the Turkish losses at 180,000.

The Italians are making progress, but very slowly. On the Gradisca-Goriz line, the westward bank of the river Isonzo, however, there was some really hard fighting. The line of serious defenses of the city of Trieste runs along the eastward bank of this river, and before the Italians can make further progress in the direction of that town, it is necessary for them to break through these defenses. This they attempted to do in a three days' battle, beginning the latter part of last week and continuing into the early part of this, but in spite of all their efforts were repulsed with losses said to be serious. This attack was renewed July 8, but of course at the time of writing its result cannot be told.

Towards the end of the week the Italians suffered their first important naval loss, an armored cruiser, the Amalfi, of 10,000 tons displacement, laid down in 1904, being sent to the bottom by an Austrian submarine in the upper Adriatic. This was one of the largest and newest of the Italian vessels of this class. The loss of life was not very great, most of the crew being saved.

From London comes the statement that, according to an official appeal by the French Relief Society, the French casualties up to June 1, 1915, total 1,400,000. From official sources the latest estimates of the total casualties of all the powers engaged in the great war are as follows:

	Killed	Wounded	Prisoners and Missing	Casualties Total
France	400,000	700,000	300,000	1,400,000
Great Britain	116,000	229,000	83,000	428,000
Russia	733,000	1,982,000	770,000	3,485,000
Germany	482,000	852,000	233,000	1,567,000
Austria	341,000	711,000	183,000	1,235,000
Belgium	47,000	160,000	40,000	247,000
Serbia	64,000	112,000	50,000	226,000
Turkey	45,000	90,000	46,000	181,000
Japan	500	910		1,210
Grand total	2,228,500	4,857,510	1,705,000	8,791,010

No report has been made officially of Italian losses.

Miss Addams on Peace

HAVING completed her mission in Europe, Miss Jane Addams has brought back with her some suggestions that prove her to have been a very close observer of the situation on the Continent. She met and talked with Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg and Foreign Minister von Jagow in Berlin, with Premier Viviani and Minister Delcasse in Paris, with Premier Salandra and his foreign minister in Rome, and with leading statesmen and diplomats in other countries visited. Wherever she went she found a deeply rooted peace sentiment among the women, while the impression she received from her diplomatic interviews with the statesmen was that the war must be pushed to a decisive end. Her own conclusion, reached after weighing all the evidence, is that "the way to end the war lies only through the neutral nations, with the United States playing the leading part. I am sure," she declares, "that if peace could be effected with honor, the people of the warring nations would welcome it. They are eager for some other method of settling their disputes and now is the time for the United States to act."

Her suggestion of a neutral council of nations as a means of affording a substitute for war and its horrors is not a new one, but she has invested the idea with a new emphasis. Her confidence that the time is at hand for such a movement will carry inspiration to multitudes who have been praying for peace. Meanwhile the war is accomplishing one result which nothing else could possibly have brought about—it is turning the thoughts of the nations Godward. In every country that is a participant in the long conflict, practically without exception, there is among the people a growing conviction that the highest objects and ambitions of those engaged in the struggle count as nothing, and that the outcome is to be as God wills. They are beginning to realize that civilization is not the handmaid of Christianity, and that the arm of flesh cannot decide the fate of the world. Our own nation, the leader among the neutrals, is in danger of falling into dependence on that arm, like all the others, on the plea that to avoid war we must be able to make war successfully. We are in danger of forgetting the fact that militarism and preparedness dug the pit into which all the combatant nations have fallen.

The war is destined to bring the race to its senses and to make it feel that God still rules and that the nations are but as clay in the hands of the potter. It is a great thought that when the last gun is silent and the last of the war's victims has been buried out of sight, the world will then have fully awakened to the realization that all this evil has been transformed by divine wisdom into discipline.

If we would honor God and do humanity a service, here is an opportunity to test the sincerity of our professions. Are we willing to sacrifice commercial considerations, for a time at least, in order that we may be the means of restoring peace to the world? Can we consecrate ourselves and rise to the dignity of this great sacrifice? It would mean a crown of glory for this nation. Shall we grasp it in the true spirit of Christian civilization?

Farm Lands for the Idle

HERE is another plan to relieve unemployment which will doubtless in the end work out also to the financial advantage of the farmer. Men out of work who wish to take up farm land will be helped to do so by an inter-departmental committee which has been named by Secretary of the Interior Lane and Secretary of Labor Wilson. It is expected that President Wilson will press a "Rural Credits Bill" upon Congress at the next session, and the new plan for connecting would-be farmers with farms will be urged at the same time. The plan will provide that by a system of farm credits men in the cities will be enabled to take up farm lands on easy payment loans.

The proposed plan is inexpensive because no new officials will be required for its operation, all the work being done by departments already organized. Commissioner Caminetti of the Immigration Bureau of the Department of Labor has suggested that the poll tax collected from immigrants, now amounting to $10,000,000, might be used in financing this new plan on the ground that congestion and unemployment are due largely to concentration of immigrants in the larger cities.

About the time this plan was made public delegates to the fourth "Banker-Farmer Conference," which was in session at Chicago, declared that the time of "cut-throat competition" between bankers and farmers had passed and that a national platform would be established, aiming to bring these two industries closer together. Director R. Forgan, of the Chicago Clearing House, contrasted the two fundamental business principles, suspicious competition and commercial co-operation. He declared that the former resulted in misunderstanding, opposition and war, the latter in peace, harmony and prosperity.

Thus the day draws nearer, despite the horrors of war and poverty and crime, when the children of the earth shall really have learned to dwell at peace, helping instead of antagonizing one another. It is to be hoped that Congress will welcome the proposed plan and put it into speedy operation. Again new, eager adventurers will go westward from our crowded towns to learn the joys of labor and liberty in uncrowded places and to develop still further America's vast opportunities of cheer and plenty.

A Madman and His Crimes

ANY lingering doubt concerning the insanity of Holt, who attempted to kill J. P. Morgan at the financier's home at Glen Cove, N. Y., has been swept away by the horrible method of Holt's suicide in the Mineola prison, and also by the disclosures of his past career. He was of the criminal type which broods in solitude and plots in concealment. Such men, at all times a menace to society, under the influence of any unusual excitement frequently develop homicidal mania. Many cases of insanity are traceable to the long strain of this terrible war. Minds that have been compelled to dwell for months on the horrors of the battlefield, reading constantly in the daily papers of the frightful slaughter and suffering, at last become obsessed with the idea of violence. Holt, as his record shows, had strong passions and criminal tendencies. For years he had hidden from justice under an assumed name. It has been established beyond question that Eric Muentner, wife murderer and fugitive, and Frank Holt were one and the same individual. His anonymous warnings, his boastful admission that he had caused the Capitol explosion, and finally his letter to his wife, written on the train, in which he told of his murderous plans for killing Mr. Morgan and also for sinking an Atlantic liner with every soul on board, are indisputable evidence of a disordered brain suddenly stirred to violent mania by the tragedy of the great war. All his criminal plans were spectacular. Possibly overwork and worry may have contributed to his outbreak; but his wild schemes to terrorize the American people sound more like the production of a mad anarchist than of a disappointed college professor. It is worth noting that his old college associates, his father-in-law, his wife, and even Mr. Morgan, his intended victim, have all expressed a belief in Holt's insanity.

It is a matter for sincere thankfulness that Holt's attempts miscarried. Mr. Morgan's personal courage saved other lives as well as his own. That Holt was able to procure, without the slightest question, a supply of dynamite big enough to wreck a hundred houses or destroy a dozen liners is one of those startling discoveries which suggest a dangerously lax condition of our New York laws regulating the sale of explosives.

"Tom Brown" to Stay at Sing Sing

GOVERNOR WHITMAN'S assurance on July 7 that he had no thought of ousting Warden Osborne from Sing Sing was most gratifying to the multitudes who have been sympathetically watching the progress of prison reform in the Empire State. No one who has visited Sing Sing under the new régime and witnessed there the new spirit of hope, good cheer and a desire to be square could consider with anything but deepest regret the thought of Warden Osborne's removal before he has been enabled to develop and demonstrate his humane theories further. The acute crisis between Superintendent Riley and Warden Osborne came as the result of the superintendent's desire to have men removed from Sing Sing to other prisons, and thus avoid the necessity of any "doubling up" in the Sing Sing cells. The very horror of the Sing Sing men at the thought of leaving for another prison where they might have more room and greater comfort in their cells shows how strong a hold "Tom Brown's" Mutual Welfare League has upon them. To leave Sing Sing and the league and the companionable warden seems to them like losing hope, and going back to the old days when imprisonment meant despair.

Coincident with the consternation about Sing Sing there came sharp criticism of conditions in New York City prison at Blackwell's Island. Tannenbaum, the I. W. W. agitator who was fined there for nearly a year, issued a number of statements to the press on his release, making specific and detailed charges revealing the most deplorable conditions. He declared that men with loathsome and almost incurable diseases are herded with healthy men, and that men with these diseases are even employed in the prison bakery, kitchen and dining-room. He stated there were only eight shaving cups for 1,800 men, that these shaving cups were of tin and rusty, and that diseased and healthy alike used them. He said that during eleven months and eleven days of his imprisonment cot blankets were never fumigated, and were in the most foul condition. Commissioner Davis issued a general denial of his claims, but Tannenbaum reports that his accusations are specific and not to be refuted in detail if at all. Official investigation to be made as a result of this controversy and forced improvements will doubtless be made.

The whole matter of caring for society's "delinquents" must be met with greater courage, skill and sympathy. The public must demand the facts about these institutions in all our states, and the spirit of humanity must control our treatment of the unfortunate. "Tom Brown" of Auburn and Sing Sing is showing us the way. To love these men, to trust them, to care for them, to fill them with hope, to prepare them for a useful return to the world in which they have failed—this is what must be done. Attempts from any quarter to remove Warden Osborne must be met with indignant protest not only from the citizens of New York state, but of other states, who are watching his achievement and will learn from them the newer and better way of curing the criminal.

Barriers to Educational Progress

SHOULD the trustees of a university, in charge of its finances and property, and the faculty, who are presumably the best judges of the educational qualifications of the teaching staff, decide when a question arises as to retention or dismissal of any of its professors? This problem has been brought very sharply to the front by the recent dropping of Professor Scott Nearing from the teaching staff of the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania. No question has been raised as to the capacity of the teacher, but it has been alleged that his activity in connection with movements for labor and economic reforms has given offense to certain men of influence whom the trustees regard as valuable friends of the university. On behalf of the trustees who failed to retain Professor Nearing, it is claimed that consideration of this character have had no weight. An official statement of the real cause for dropping him, due both to the university and the public. It is only a few weeks since fourteen members of the teaching staff of the University of Utah resigned, in protest at the expulsion of two professors whose teaching had been altogether too liberal for the Mormons. The electric spark that kindled the conflagration was the address of Milton H. Sever, who saw fit at commencement to criticize the antiquated methods and autocratic control of the Mormon trustees, alleging that they dominated the institution and put up barriers to intellectual and religious progress. A committee of inquiry, after examination, reported that there had been no proper grounds for the dismissal of the University of Utah teachers, and that the repression of legitimate utterances of the faculty and students on religious, political and economic questions, on the ground that they might be disapproved by persons of influence who could unfavorably affect the university's appropriations, was detrimental to the general efficiency of the university. There are other universities more or less under the same harrow, where modern scholarship and the search for truth are made to suffer by those who unfortunately have the power to subordinate educational ideals to less worthy considerations. If the real facts of the Nearing case are permitted to come out, they may help to bring about a better state of things in other colleges by clearing the atmosphere around.

Trepanned Skulls 1,800 Years Old

DR. JOSEPH C. THOMPSON, a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy, has written a detailed description of the methods of trepanning practiced by the Indians of Peru more than 1,800 years ago. They are known as the Columbian Indians and more than 5,000 of the skulls have been collected by Dr. A. Hrdlicka, curator of the division of physical anthropology of the National Museum. Many of these skulls are now on exhibition at the San Diego Exposition. Within the last few weeks, the museum has loaned to exhibit a priceless collection of 21 of the actual surgical instruments used by the Peruvian prehistoric doctors in the operation of trepanning. These instruments are sharpened flints of various shapes and sizes, and the skulls of the collection show that the first medicine men were no mean surgeons. The ancient Peruvians noticed that while many who had received a fracture of the skull died, some recovered of their own accord. Either the broken pieces of the skull of the warrior pressing down on the brain sprang back into place, or the splinters that would otherwise have proved fatal were discharged by suppuration. The medicine men, noticing this occasional survival of the warriors given up for lost, set themselves to the task of aiding nature. They lifted the pieces of the skull back into place, and put down with their fingers to clear out the splinters; they scraped off the ragged edges of the bones with their flint knives so that they would heal the more easily, chiseled into the bone wall to relieve the pressure on the brain, and did other necessary surgery with their primitive instruments. The service of the surgeon of the Peruvian warriors nearly 2,000 years ago, calls to mind this account of the medical treatment of a wounded warrior who lived centuries before: "And King Joram went back to be healed in a creel of the wounds which the Syrians had given him at Ramoth when he fought against Hazael king of Syria." (II Kings 8: 29.)

Liberty Bell on Its Travels

WITH military and naval honors to mark its departure, the Liberty Bell left Philadelphia for the Panama Exposition on July 5. One of the largest audiences ever assembled in Independence Square gathered to pay homage and say farewell to the becoming exercises. The old bell was carried on a large motor car and transferred to a flat car for its long journey. Special privileges were provided for the cars of the train so that the venerable relic might escape damage. But it were electric bulbs which made it visible a mile. Five thousand school children in the young rain saluted the bell with appropriate songs and decorations. A train of passenger cars carried those who guarded it. Cities and towns along the line paid homage to the bell, whose iron tongue had echoed the birth of a new nation. All liberty, moral or political, implies righteousness and love. Liberty incarnated these, and he is necessary to true liberty. "If the Son therefore shall make you free ye shall be free indeed." (John 8: 36.)

Receives Prize for Punctuality

MISS MARION E. PATTERSON of Freeport, Long Island, received a prize of ten dollars at the graduating exercises of the high school of that place for not having been tardy nor absent a single day in ten years, which included the grammar and high school course. She is going to college and says she intends to keep up her record there. To make sure she arose at six o'clock every morning and started for school at a quarter after eight. Miss Patterson was fortunate in having good health, and in possessing the constancy that is too rare, and which is so much to be commended. Many preachers begin service on the dot, whether the people are in their pews or not; too many begin five or ten minutes late. The average congregation is hardly ever in its place at the appointed hour for Sunday service. A few might be found who have attended the services every Sunday for ten years, but there are more who miss them ten times in one year. The high school girl's prize for punctuality and constancy calls to mind this injunction in the spiritual world: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." (I Cor. 15: 58.)

Classics in Literature Commended

HENRY CABOT LODGE, in his recent address at Radcliffe College commencement on the value of classics in a liberal education, said among other things: "Greek and Latin are foundations of the literature of Western civilization. Is literature then to be pushed aside because it is not obviously the city's industries, and a millionaire. He was even spoken of for governor of his state. He had lived happily with his wife and five children, but his sudden promotion, and the adulation naturally given to such a man of talents, spoiled him. He built the finest house in the city and lived in luxury and extravagance, the empty vanities and social temptations of high life swept away his moral and religious ballast, and he went to pieces on the rocks. Beginning with the first glass of champagne, and the gay social circle, he yielded to the mastery of every evil passion, became a social degenerate and a drunkard, losing fortune, fame, family and friends, traveling the road as a common tramp. He was picked up severely injured in the streets of a strange city and carried to the prison hospital where he died. His body lay in the dead house two days before he was identified. Such a large and hard fall, such a prostitution of faculty, such a wreckage of hope, love and heaven are enough to bring tears to the eyes of the hardest-hearted person. A fate like this should be a warning to those who may be tempted to lead a life of dissipation and debauchery, and call to mind these words with reference to such a course: "And put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite." (Prov. 23: 2.)

Little Republic's Glory

ONE of the tiniest republics in history for centuries had a powerful influence on the world's destiny. It was the little republic of Ragusa. Its splendor fled and its fame well-nigh forgotten, it has been brought into the light by the present struggle for the possession of the Adriatic. This little port was once one of the richest cities of the world. In influence it was scarcely second to any in the middle ages. In the time of its greatest prosperity, its ships were found wherever Europe traded. It illustrated a pure, prosperous democracy before the American continent was discovered. In the time of its highest splendor it possessed no more than 500 square miles of area, but it endured all manner of trials, produced energetic and prosperous citizens through centuries, maintained a wise and stable government for ages in the midst of countries torn by tumult and war, and opened out its arms to the restless and oppressed people of other nations, as the United States does today. Ragusa reminds us of the fact, that much that is best in men, institutions, and governments has been provided for the present age by the men and women of the past. The freedom of the little republic is taught in these words of the prophet: "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?" (Isa. 58: 6.)

Do Our People Overfeed?

A NUMBER of scientists and physicians have been persistent in charging that the people of this country eat too much, and that many of the physical ills can be traced to this overeating. Dr. Woods Hutchinson, in an essay full of common sense, takes the opposite view. Among other things he says: "Food is the only real medicine that can be relied upon for a permanent cure of any of our ills. Pure food and plenty of it has cut the slaughter of the innocents during the first year in two, almost in three. The rich food of modern civilization has narrowed the swath cut by the deadly scythe of tuberculosis most cheerfully, and increased the general resistance to the inroads of typhoid, pneumonia, bronchitis, and rheumatism. More and better food for young and old, poor and rich, would increase the efficiency by at least twenty-five per cent." The leanness and weakness in the spiritual realm for want of proper food is thus referred to: "Eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." (Isa. 55: 2.)

utilitarian and practically valuable in science, in business, or in money-making? Literature and art are in the fine flowers of the highest civilization. As Shakespeare has it: 'Not marble, nor the gilded monuments of princes shall outlive this powerful rhyme.' Worth more than all the money ever piled up are the happiness, the help which literature has brought to the children of men. The world admits that those to whom we award the honor of scholarship, whom we describe as cultivated and accomplished, must be men and women who know something at least of history, art and literature." Paul's writings bear evidence that he was a classical scholar. He makes this reference to Grecian literature, with which he was familiar, in his address on Mars Hill: "For in him we live, and move, and have our being, as certain also of your poets have said, For we are also his offspring." (Acts 17: 28.)

Mayor and Millionaire Ruined

A MAN died in the prison ward of a city the other day who had a truly pathetic history. He was the son of poor parents, and by native ability and indomitable industry arose so rapidly that at the age of thirty he was elected mayor of one of the capital cities of the country, the head of five of

AMERICA'S OLDEST SCHOOL BUILDING

THE original Dummer Academy schoolhouse, which was erected in 1762, is in practical use for school purposes now, and is claimed to be the oldest school building in America. Recently, when the big farmhouse structure of the famous buildings in South Byfield, Mass., burned, it was necessary to seek room for class purposes. The old school building, with its hand-hewn beams and heavy plank walls, standing as staunch as in revolutionary days, was selected and once again resumes the task of housing students from all over the country. In this old school building Commodore Preble of the United States navy was a student at the time of the Revolution. Many of the great men in the history of the country received their earlier instruction there. Tradition says the first blood of the Revolution was spilled there in a fist fight between Commodore Preble and Baron Ochterlong, the latter one of the founders of the British Empire in India. The longevity of the school building is only a faint type of the permanency, of the immortality of the truths taught within its walls in the formation of individual character and a new nation's life. All truth in nature, human experience, and revelation is from God, and endures forever. "His truth endureth to all generations." (Ps. 100: 5.)

ARGOSIES OF AGONY AND DEATH

Shall the lives of passengers be endangered by the business of war? Shall American citizens travelling abroad be used to guarantee the delivery of this fuel of hatred and destruction?

FROM the port of New York, during a period of two months, from April 1 to June 1st, American manufacturers sent to warring European nations cargoes of death—arms, ammunition, explosive chemicals, swords, bayonets and other munitions of war—valued at $14,774,250. The list of shipments, which mean untold suffering among human beings and the prolongation of the war, is based upon the manifests of ships filed at the New York Customs House. Representing the port of New York alone, these form only a comparatively small part of the monthly output of war material from the United States. Shipments are made from other ports, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Seattle, Washington. The greater part of the output of shells, shrapnel and high explosive is sent to Canada by rail, where it is shipped British bottoms to Allied ports. The shipments from New York are significant, and give some idea of the extent of this profitable trade.

Each gun manufactured in the United States is to be directed against human beings, each shell, each cartridge is meant to kill. Each shipment from our ports to the shores is meant to fan the flames of hatred among Christian nations. Each shipment puts peace further distance and adds to the duration of this dreadful war.

AMONG the ships leaving from New York stevedores below twenty-five carried passengers: thousands in all.

Is the Administration willing to jeopardize the lives of peaceful, helpless, people travelling abroad by allowing shipments of arms and ammunition on these ships? Are the American people willing that the persons of foreign citizens shall be used to guarantee the delivery of these sinister cargoes of death? Shall the people unite in demanding that such exports shall cease, and that from our ports shall go argosies bearing only what will add to the well-being of humanity and the good of the world? A few ships go forth from the time bearing charity—food, clothing, medicines for the starving of impoverished countries and medicines for the alleviation of those who have been wounded in a war which American munition manufacturers are helping to prolong. How few are these compared to the ships carrying tools of murder for the earth's most catastrophic tragedy! How little our carnage compared to the millions of dollars reaped from the harvest of blood and killing!

THE United States has become the seat of a great war-making industry. Shall every citizen take it upon himself to demand that this highly industrialized trade of death be stopped at once, and that manufacturers turn to peaceful trade which adds to the prosperity and security of human kind?

DEATH'S ARGOSIES

List of Shipments of Arms and Ammunition based on Manifests filed in the Auditor's Department of the U. S. Customs House, New York, and giving information of shipments up to the last available report of the Auditor's office of July 30. Passenger-carrying ships are denoted by heavy face type, with number of passengers aboard, at right. Number of passengers based on statistics of trans-atlantic conference.

Total amount of exports of arms, ammunition, explosive chemicals and munitions of war, from April 1st to May 29, a period of 59 days, from the port of New York $14,771,214

Note. Trinitoluol is one of the most terrific elements in high explosives, sold at from 35 to 40 cents a pound before the war. While it is nominally listed at a moderate price—say $1 a pound, it is said that the Allies are actually paying from $6 to $8 a pound. Shipments of swords and bayonets are listed in the manifests as "cutlery."

WHEN VACATIONS LURE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I. Vacation days of gold and blue,
When fairy tales seem almost true, . . .
Ah! who would be a warring king,
When eyes are bright, and free hearts sing?

II. A light canoe
With sails that sway
Darts swift across
The silver bay.

III. But later, near
The friendly shore,
It hears love's old
Sweet tale once more.

IV. While boys are boys and trees are tall,
Small trousers will be torn, that's all!

VI. And, since the ark in times remote,
Earth's sons have fashioned homes to float.

V. And while the foam sweeps white and high,
Small boys will romp with joyful cry.

VII. Vacation days!
Along the sands,
The waves stretch out
Entreating hands.

VIII. And every breeze sings sweet and low
A lullaby, and all the glow

IX. That creeps along when day is done Brings magic from the setting sun.

contained in storage batteries. Is all of this a bit too technical? Perhaps. And yet our pictures show that Mr. Ferguson succeeded in his difficult task. He tamed the mountain brook as one would tame an unruly colt, and converted it into a veritable treasure box of modern wonders. At present his house contains wish that my children were just a tiny bit different, for in some ways they are a great nuisance. Why can't they play clean games? It seems to me that all of my days are spent in washing faces and mending clothes, and kissing black and blue spots to make them well. It is hard to have such a strenuous family!"

At this point, the youngest boy came tearing across the lawn as fast as his chubby bare legs could carry him. His face was radiant under the dirt and a deep dimple flashed roguishly in one plump cheek.

"Oh-h, mummy," he screamed excitedly, "oh-h, mummy! We made a water wheel in th' lil' falls in th' brook an' it works!"

That's the cry of an inventive childhood. And when you look at it in the right way, forgetting to bother over torn clothes and dirty faces and scratches, isn't it a cry that mothers should encourage? For when God filled the world full of mountains to climb, and rivers to be traveled on, and brooks to be converted into electric power, he gave us the minds to do these things.

WHEN you haven't proper materials for work it's very easy to get out of doing the work—if you are that sort of a worker. It's very easy, if you are a sculptor, to put off designing because your clay isn't just right or your tools are broken—but not long ago I read of a poor boy who made models in mud with a bent stick and a rusty nail. He wanted to learn. Some day, no doubt, the world will ring with his name. It's easy, if you are a writer, to say that the subject doesn't interest you or that it's too warm to think of any but pleasant things. It's easy to remark, nonchalantly, that you haven't the right kind of a pad or that your pen is broken or that your pencils are blunt. But if you want to get ahead, really ahead, you will write with a quill on the edges of a newspaper. Some great things have been written that way! If you want an electrically lighted house, with modern cooking appliances—the kind that you see fascinating pictures of in the back of magazines, and there isn't a powerhouse near, you can fuss about it for a little while in a lazy, inefficient way and then you can buy lamps or candles. But if you want electricity—want it hard enough to work for it—you can take a little brook and harness it with pulleys and dams until you have made an electric plant of your own. Mr. Ferguson did that.

Shakespeare said:

"Our life . . . finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything."

Perhaps, if Shakespeare had lived a little later, he would have said that our life finds opportunities in trees and running brooks and stones. Perhaps he would have said that, with work, we might find the way to victory over the forces of nature in everything.

It's an old-world rule, handed down from the men of the stone age, the rule of strength conquering all obstacles. There was a time when the man with the largest fist and the lumpiest muscles was the greatest man in the community.

Times have changed—changed greatly. But the old rule is fundamentally the same. The strongest man rules, but it's the man with the strongest mind, the strongest will, the strongest purpose. And, friends of mine, if you are strong in this way you will not only conquer mountains and rivers and plains—you will not only force light and power from a tiny brook, but you will become known as a personality and you will lead people, and create light and power in living souls.

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of Time."

RUNNING SPRING

WHEN I see a brook dancing merrily over the stones on its way to some larger body of water, I invariably think of poetry—probably because so very many young poets have immortalized the "babbling brook" in their attempts at verse. When I see a small brook I invariably think of something young and playful—something that sings and frolics and never pauses to think.

When Mr. Charles Ferguson of Valhalla, N. Y., saw a brook near his home, however, he thought of something much more vital than poetry—something almost alive that can turn huge wheels at will—something that can save life, or torture, or kill. He thought of electricity.

Unfortunately, there is no power plant near Valhalla, so all the lighting is done by a less convenient way than electricity. Mr. Ferguson was progressive.

When in a real life equation you add the lack of something to progressiveness, you usually get results. Mr. Ferguson wanted a modern house—an ultra modern house—that would be up to the minute in every convenience. To do this, he needed electricity. He wanted up-to-date cooking appliances and heating apparatus, he wanted the sewing machine to run easily without the tiresomeness of foot pressure, he wanted hot water at all times. To have these things, he needed electricity. As there was no electric plant to make the way to these luxuries easy, Mr. Ferguson decided that he must make his own electricity.

IT WOULD have been a problem—no less—to the eyes and brain of a less trained, less efficient electrician than this man. But, while you or I would have been noticing the way the water eddied around a flat stone in the creek bed, or the way a fringed blue gentian dipped gently into the water, Mr. Ferguson was noticing that the brook had its source from a number of cold springs, and that it would not dry up in summer or freeze in winter for that reason. He was also noticing that it had a fall of some ten feet and that it gave a hundred gallons of water which developed into one-quarter horsepower a minute. While you or I would have been noticing how the puffy white cloud far up in the sky was reflected in the quietest part of a tiny pool, Mr. Ferguson was building a dam with a dozen feet of flume running from it; and was installing a ten-foot wheel with about thirty-five buckets on the circumference and two strong pulleys on the main shaft. The first of these pulleys he belted to a small pump in the wheel pit, which draws water from a spring for the house at about an eighty-pound pressure. The second pulley ran a 100-watt generator in the wheel house power station. Alongside of this Mr. Ferguson placed a much smaller dynamo which was good for eight volts. The supply is every electrical appliance that a city house, within a stone's throw of a huge power plant, could boast. He is able to run a sewing machine, he hatches out incubator chickens, lights fires, does the cooking and illuminates the entire house and grounds with the result of his cleverness in making the most of a small brook that flowed past his door.

It's a wonderful thing, this ability to do the unusual, and perhaps necessary, thing with the natural resources that lie close at hand. Benjamin Franklin made use of it with the aid of a thunder storm; other men have solved other problems in ways just as remarkable. Sir Isaac Newton was able to prove the theory of gravitation because an apple fell on his head (and yet there had been apples since the days of Eden). Robert Fulton utilized steam for travel when no one had ever thought of doing it before.

I KNOW a woman who is the mother of three very lively boys. They are exceptionally clever about building dams in the tiny brooks and making tunnels in the overhanging banks of dirt. They were always experimenting with mud and clay and stones and in the process they usually got very much torn as to clothing and very much soiled as to faces and hands and very much scratched as to elbows and knees.

"Oh, dear!" said the mother to me one day, "I do

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

OUR contemporary, the Nation, has just celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, which fell on July 8, by issuing a number of more than usual merit and timeliness. In these times of world-change, affecting journalism as well as other great interests, it is worth while to stop and think over the experiences of a publication with so remarkable a career. That the faith of its founders in the principles it has maintained was well grounded is shown in the fact that the Nation is today the premier in its class, with a power and influence among thoughtful minds that have grown steadily with the years. In the semi-centennial issue, the record of its past is reviewed by a group of distinguished contributors, including Count Bryce, Henry James, Henry Holt, Oswald Garrison Villard, Judge Charles C. Nott, Arthur G. Sedgwick, George Iven Putnam, William Roscoe Thayer and others, whose articles are full of entertaining reminiscences of the days of Edwin L. Godkin, the founder, and of the brilliant group of men who were associated with him in the upbuilding of the Nation. Their united contributions form a history of this country covering half a century. A veteran in the field, the Nation's mission is helpful, constructive, enlightening. May it long continue to enjoy the confidence and approval of the American people.

SAFE AND SANE FOURTH GETS NEW IMPETUS. The fact that 19 persons are known to have been killed and nearly 100 injured in celebrating the Fourth this year, as against much smaller numbers last year, will doubtless be used (as it should be) as reason for greater effort during the next twelve months to devise a form of celebration free from danger to life and limb.

ENDEAVORERS THINK IN MILLIONS. The Twentieth International Christian Endeavor Convention, which met in Chicago July 7-11, was urged by President Francis E. Clark to work for a million new members, a million dollars for missions, a million new church members, a million signers to a peace petition, and a million volunteers to help make this a peaceless nation by 1920. Delegates came from many foreign lands, including those at war. The war was declared to be a mighty summons of God to reflection, so that the members might examine themselves to see whether their conduct is in agreement with their prayers: this was the message from Rev. F. Blecher of Berlin. The convention re-elected Rev. Francis E. Clark president, and William Shaw general secretary.

THE CHICAGO WAY. Two strikes of huge proportions have recently been settled in Chicago by the same drastic method: the leaders of the opposing factions were locked in a room and left there until they reached an agreement. The first strike was by street car men, and the new method was introduced with prompt results by Mayor William Hale Thompson. The second was the strike by carpenters, affecting the entire building industry. The conferees saw nothing ahead but idleness—until the doors were locked. The carpenters' strike has been settled by compromise, the carpenters to get an advance of five cents an hour and the closed shop, and to require no restrictions on the source of building materials, a three-year peace agreement has also signed by both sides.

NEW POLITICAL PARTY PROPOSED. With expectation on the part of the churches, the woman suffrage vote, various civic war organizations and other congenial elements, the Anti-Slavery League of America has suggested the possibility of uniting with the National Prohibition forces in the formation of a new political party that will have the numerical and financial strength of either of the two great parties now in the field. Political plans are being canvassed, and among them is said to be the formation of Bible class units which will urge the right and duty of Christians to stand for civic righteousness as a paramount issue in politics.

ARRANZA'S TURN ON TOP. For the moment General Arranza has the upper hand of the fighting in Mexico, having succeeded in taking Mexico City July 19, where he immediately sent his forces at police duty to put down all rioting and looting and to assist the authorities in getting food to the half-starved population. In the meanwhile General Huerta has been granted the preference of being removed as a prisoner to Fort Bliss rather than give his promise not to cross the border. There he will be guarded by United States deputy marshals until his trial at San Antonio in December, unless some other disposition is made of the case.

GOVERNMENT SEIZES RADIO STATION. Although censorship assigned by the Navy Department have been on duty at the German wireless station at Sayville, L. I., practically since the outbreak of the war, the Navy Department on July 8 took entire possession of the plant in the interests of strict neutrality, as intimation by officers of the German military forces, even under censorship, has come to be regarded at Washington as likely to lead to complications. This is one of the biggest radio stations in existence. It is said that for the duration of the war no more communications will be allowed to any vessel at sea from this station.

GUN-CHIP ON EVERY MAN'S SHOULDER. As a result of the old-time boyish custom of placing a chip on one's shoulder and daring an erstwhile chum to knock it off and get punished for his insult, the National Security League now urges every American workman of every class to put a gun across his shoulder and see if some European nation, Germany for example, will dare to knock it off. The league has sent out a call to employers, especially big concerns, urging them to encourage their employees to enlist in the militia and naval reserve, and requesting the names of concerns that comply. By this process the league aims to secure also the names of firms at corporations who do not put themselves out to encourage their employees to become soldiers. It all depends upon the ulterior motive of the powerful men behind this league, what use they will make of these two lists: in other words, what influence they may bring to bear to induce employers to see that by increasing the militia enormously the business of making guns and other military equipment will correspondingly increase, etc.

THE NEW ORIENT. Japan is proceeding with her far-reaching plans to bring China under her protection and direction, with the view, according to students of the situation, of eventually merging the yellow races in one great nation in which the Japanese shall be the dominant power. The tremendous significance of what is taking place is little understood by the general public in Europe and America, chiefly because the succession of events taking place are crowded out of the news of the day by the European war and kindred interests.

A Call for Help from China

THE State Department at Washington on July 12 received the following cablegram from the American consul general at Canton, China, F. D. Cheshire: "Unprecedented floods. Great distress among the Chinese in the interior of Kwangtung and Kwangsi. Many lives lost. Shameen flooded two and three feet. There is a total cessation of trade and railroad traffic. Contributions to suffering humanity urgently needed at once. Kindly inform the Red Cross and the Christian Herald." This message was promptly wired to the Christian Herald at New York by Secretary of State Robert Lansing.

Shameen is practically a foreign settlement, with few resident natives other than servants, the population being composed of Americans and Europeans, whose serious situation, of course, will make instant appeal to their fellow countrymen everywhere. The periodic floods of China, sometimes appalling in their devastating work, were some time ago made the subject of study by a commission of engineers sent to China from this country by the Red Cross organization, and a plan for overcoming this natural foe involving an expenditure of some twenty million dollars was presented to the Chinese Government and accepted, but thus far operations wait upon the government to finance the undertaking. We have no other particulars than those given in the above cablegram as to the extent of the present disaster, but it is significant that the consul general cabled an appeal through the State Department to the two foremost organizations in America for world-wide relief in times of famine, and we are sure the readers of the Christian Herald will not let this appeal go unanswered.

LOOK TO OUR DEFENSES. Upon the initiation of Secretary of the Navy Daniels, a Bureau of Invention and Development is to be created in the Navy Department, composed of civilians who will bring to the problem of meeting modern advances in naval equipment and construction the best engineering and inventive genius of the country. Thomas A. Edison has accepted the secretary's invitation to join this advisory board as its head, and commends the idea highly; he suggests a department of experimentation, where all ideas suggested both in and out of the service may be given a thorough testing, and advises that the project be gotten under way immediately. Secretary Daniels believes that the best inventive minds in the country will be glad to assist the government along these lines.

ULTIMATUM TO RUMANIA. The press of July 13 states that the Austro-Hungarian minister at Bucharest has presented to the prime minister of Rumania alternative proposals which Rumania may accept, on the one hand remaining neutral in the war, on the other joining forces with the German-Austrian Alliance, and a term of one month is fixed within which one or the other arrangement must be agreed to. The attitude which Rumania will eventually take is a matter of great importance in the European conflict.

LABOR LEADER FIGHTS SENTENCE. Upon denial of his appeal for a new trial for the charge of murder in the first degree for the death of a deputy sheriff in October, 1913, during the fight between mine strikers and guards in the Colorado war, John R. Lawson, a labor leader, under life sentence at hard labor in the state penitentiary, read a statement in court declaring that the judge was a tool of the coal operators and had been appointed a judge solely to try his case.

SPAIN PUTS UP LIGHTNING RODS. The Spanish Government is feverishly increasing its war munitions, according to press accounts, even erecting new factories to produce them, and also laying in a supply of submarines, not in order to enter the war, but to prevent the war's entering Spain, her statesmen professing to see perils to Spanish possessions in the final peace terms between the belligerents.

DOES THIS PHILANTHROPIST COURT UNPOPULARITY? After doing an immense amount of good with the opportunities afforded him by the prosperous business of manufacturing a moderate-income class of automobile, not the least of his beneficences being a successful experiment to find a cure for drug users and alcoholics, Henry Ford now has started out to make the public eat less. No doubt he means well, yet suspicious people may think that he merely is trying to reduce the average weight his cars must carry and thereby make them more efficient without additional cost to himself. We are not of that opinion, but we tremble for Mr. Ford's popularity if he persists in this new line of altruism. He says he is trying his theories on himself with excellent results in increased efficiency and good health, and that in his efforts to produce a generation of 100 per cent. efficient workmen he includes a restricted diet as a very important factor. Thomas Edison is pointed out by Mr. Ford as eating less and doing more than any other man he knows.

AN ECHO OF THE HOLT CRIME. Just after Frank Holt, who attempted to kill J. P. Morgan, committed suicide, word was received from his widow by the authorities that she had received a letter from Holt declaring that an explosion would occur July 7 on some steamship leaving New York July 3 and carrying munitions of war. By order of the Navy Department warning was immediately sent by wireless to all steamships which could be reached, and replies came back that searches failed to disclose the presence of bombs aboard. Nevertheless on July 7 fire was discovered on board the steamship Minnehaha of the Atlantic Transport Line, which had sailed from New York July 4, though scheduled to sail July 3, carrying immense quantities of ammunition and explosives but no passengers. She had touched at Halifax on her way to London. The vessel immediately put back for Halifax, and sent two wireless messages of her condition; and until her safe arrival at port, fears were widespread that she was doomed. The fire was put out before it reached the ammunition. The Minnehaha carried thousands of cases of loaded shrapnel shells, cartridges, trinitolol (see page 738 of this issue) and great quantities of other munitions of war, besides stores of wheat, wheat flour and preserved foods. She had a crew of 158 men. Although for a time requisitioned by the British Government before the war, the ship has since been released for general freight service and has already made two trans-Atlantic trips, on each eastward voyage carrying munitions of war. Her officers state that the fire was caused by a tremendous explosion, presumably of a bomb concealed in her cargo. No similar accident was reported by other ships. A second similar warning has been received by the Navy Department from an alleged "pupil" of Holt, and this has led to a repetition of the former wireless message to steamers at sea to examine their cargoes for concealed bombs. J. P. Morgan has safely recovered from the attack by Holt.

HUGE CLOTHING STRIKE BEGUN. The clothing workers of America may become involved in a strike inaugurated July 12 at New York by 8,000 members of the Pantsmakers' Union. Should the demands of the strikers not be met by the manufacturers, some 80,000 workmen may stop work. The situation is complicated, the clothing workers have a number of demands to be rectified, among them being a system of contract work at cut prices which makes for low rates of pay and employment of far fewer workers than normal methods would take care of.

GREATER NEW YORK ASPIRES TO BE STILL GREATER. The constitutional convention now in session at Albany has rejected by a vote of 92 to 32 New York City's plea for representation in the senate on the basis of population, instead of by territorial apportionment as at present.

You know this trade-mark
through national periodical advertising

THE man who puts his brand on the goods he sells sets his light where it will "shine before men" because he is not afraid to have it shine on him.

He wants it to shine on him as well as on his goods because he has nothing to fear and everything to gain from the glare. When he adds to the illumination of the trade-mark the full light of national advertising you may be sure he is certain of his goods—sure that you will like them. He is willing to risk his fortune and his business future on the chance of your approval.

He would not do this if there really were a risk, because he is a hard-headed business man. He has taken the risk out of his business by putting quality into his goods.

Deal with the man who is not afraid of the light. Buy the goods that bear trade-marks and are advertised nationally, because these are the goods that it is safest and most economical to buy—safest because you know who is responsible for them, most economical because there is a lower selling cost included in the price of nationally advertised goods.

Trade-marks and national advertising are the two most valuable public servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while lowering prices and stabilizing them.

HUNGER IN MEXICO

THERE is hunger in Mexico for two reasons. The first is because the selfish military chieftains will not let the people work the land. The second is because a large number of the people, who for three years past have led a soldier life, would rather keep on leading that life than go back to the fields and the factories.

The women and children suffer most. Many of the families have lost husbands and brothers and fathers through the years of revolutionary warring. Others are deprived of their support for the time being because the husbands and brothers and fathers are enlisted in one or another of the numerous bands of troops which call themselves armies. These men are paid in the paper scrip, whose value today may be twenty cents on the dollar, and tomorrow five cents. Even if they were inclined to send this money to their families and the means were provided for sending it, the sum would purchase very little of the necessities of life.

The principal cause of the hunger is that the constant warring of the different factions has almost stopped the cultivation of the land. In consequence, this year there is very little to harvest.

The military chiefs do not want the peons to go back to the land and begin raising crops, because their own forces would be weakened so that they would have to give up the little authority that they possess. On the other hand, very many of the peons have found that the army life, with its loose discipline and its chance to pillage and ravage, is pleasanter than hard work in the fields. So they prefer to keep up the business of killing one another.

Sometimes there are desertions of large bodies of men from one commander to another. This is the sign that peaceful life has no attractions for the class which was supposed to be fighting for a principle.

Mexico in peaceful times raised enough food to supply the mass of her population. Corn is the staple product. It is used in a dozen different ways. Raising corn is comparatively easy, and ordinarily a good crop is assured without excessive labor. Beans and other vegetables also form part of the diet. They are cultivated with more care.

Wheat is grown in the best agricultural sections of the country, and is made into flour by the native flour mills. The great mass of the country inhabitants are not, however, accustomed to wheat. It is too much of a luxury for them, but in the towns the families of the artisans and factory workers are able to buy a little bread.

Had corn and wheat and beans been sown last season at the proper time there would now be crops, and the deficiency would be only a temporary one, which could be tided over until the harvest was gathered. For full a year food supplies will have to be poured into Mexico from the United States in large quantities.

The situation today is something like it was in Cuba seventeen years ago when the Spanish troops and the insurgents had brought about actual starvation for scores of thousands. There was a difference, however, in that Cuba's leading crop was sugar, and that the proceeds of the crop ways had been used to buy food supplies, especially flour. Cuba was unlike Mexico in that she could raise cereals to feed her own people. The island was too tropical for that.

There was also a difference in the number of people affected. Cuba had a population of 2,000,000. Mexico has more than 14,000,000 inhabitants. There is no question that when Klopsch began the Christian Herald relief work in Cuba 250,000 persons had died from starvation and the maladies incident to it. If the same proportion obtained in Mexico, it would mean the death of nearly 2,000,000 persons.

I do not mean to intimate that anything like this number are in danger of dying of starvation in Mexico, even under the worst conditions. Yet there is great suffering, and there is bound to be loss of life.

If relief measures on the part of the United States are to do any good there must be very large quantities of food systematically distributed in widely-separated sections of the country. Possibly this can be done without the actual intervention of the United States, and possibly not.

Heretofore the food supplies distributed have been seized by the various military chieftains and used for their own troops. They may now co-operate in distributing the food among the non-combatant population. Many persons believe that before asking the American people to contribute food supplies the Washington Administration should stop the different military factions from buying arms and ammunition in the United States. They can buy the munitions nowhere else.

To stop the supply of firearms would reduce the ability of the different factions to fight one another. It would not entirely end guerrilla warfare, but would seriously impair the power of the military chiefs to force the peaceful peons into the army ranks, because, without arms or ammunition, these so-called soldiers would be useless and would return to the fields.

CHARLES M. PEPPE

THE MIGHTY HUNTER

BY LOUIS E. ORCUTT

ABOUT the time I was ten years old I became enthusiastic over hunting, as only a boy of that age can be. I had found an old single-acting revolver of my father's, a relic of a burglar scare in the town; it was corroded and rusted and stiff with age; but I rubbed and polished and cleaned and oiled it until it really would shoot—after a struggle. I had to hold it in both hands and pull on the trigger with two fingers to release the hammer; but I fired it, and once in a while I hit a shovel at thirty feet. Constant target practice finally limbered up the old gun so that it became fairly accurate in my hands, and I carried it proudly. I even dared to brave the darkest paths in the woods at night, carrying the gun cocked and ready, and almost hoping my fears of attack would be justified. Every boy of ten is a potential hero at heart, and I feign a soul on heroics to the limit of a very active imagination; but I couldn't tag a cottontail or a canvasback, and the Bob Whites mocked me unharmed. That would not do. I must have a shotgun. I thought, talked and dreamed shotgun.

My father and mother met my hitting talk with a lot of fine language about the rights of the birds and beasts to their happy lives, and the moral iniquity of indiscriminate killing for sport. Such language only disgusted me. They dwelt at great length on the dangers incorporated in every gun, and were careful to repeat to me every story of dead or maimed hunters which they had heard

ard. I was indifferent to danger. Finding that I was determined, after the accustomed manner of American parents they gave me a double-barreled shotgun the Christmas before I was twelve. They also gave me a Thomas open-face watch—the lar had not then been made famous. I do not know what else I got that Christmas; but I do know that I was premedly happy for once. I could hardly wait for Christmas dinner to over. I almost skipped "hard sauce and puddin'" because it took so long to wait for it. When the dinner was all over I got my rubber boots and a new gun and watch, filled two pockets with shells and went to the woods with my chum. The snow was deep and the walking would have been very hard if we had been on an errand; as it was, we might have been the possessors of the seven-league boots for all we noticed the drag of the snow.

WE THOUGHT we would try the new gun on a white oak tree in a certain clearing. My chum refused a generous offer to give him the first shot, and we had quite an argument over it. I think we were each about equally anxious to have the second shot. Of course we weren't afraid of anything; we just naturally had an explainable preference. When I found that I had to do it, I went ahead with the first shot myself. I shoved the shells home and snapped the barrel up into position. Then I sighted carefully along the channel between the barrels. But I was holding the gun too tensely, and the muzzle wavered until it finally got so wobbly that I had to lower it for a new start. My chum was greatly tempted to show me how to do it; but he manfully restrained himself. After a short rest and a deep breath or two, I again raised the gun, and this time it was sader. I yelled, "Look out!" and pulled a trigger. Nothing happened. My chum snickered and advised me to get a gun that would shoot. I ignored him, and calmly cocked both hammers, inwardly half-scared for fear they would slip. This time I pulled both triggers.

When, after much struggling, I expected myself from a snowdrift, I discovered that the tree was still there. My chum laughed and laughed until he couldn't stand, then he laughed until he had to hold his hands over it; but he stopped laughing when I reminded him that it was his turn. He had already looked the gun over carefully from heel-plate to front sight; but he found another inspection necessary.

He practiced throwing the gun into position and looking fiercely at the tree, until he did it almost well enough for a movie actor. He placed and replaced his feet and braced himself in various positions, explaining to me all the time that my somersault was the result of standing improperly; but he didn't shoot. At last I put in one cartridge, held the gun fit to his right shoulder and pulled the trigger slowly. When the hammer fell he went back quickly a step or two, and called for another shell. He again brought the gun to position several times; then he decided to see how it would work left-handed. He was steadier this time; and I took a lift from his book of instructions and a better with my next shot. We shot until the shells were gone, gradually seeing smaller and more distant targets. We began to feel really proficient in arms, and to pity the rabbits which would be abroad after the next snowfall. We might well have saved our pity, for we got much more exercise, infinitely more, on our expeditions than we did game.

I had had the gun nearly two weeks before I brought down anything but bark and twigs. Then a flock of crows startled me and gave me great cause for offense. They mocked me from tree-top to tree-top, keeping just out of range. I determined to humble these crows. At last one of them threw all caution to the winds. He was in the very top of the great oak, on the swaying tip of the highest branch, and his "caw-caw-caw" rang out a mighty challenge. The rest flew on, but he stayed until I was right beneath him. I pulled my gun to my shoulder, took careful aim and fired. A black bundle came bumping down through the branches and fell in the snow at my feet. I looked at it in triumph.

Then the outstretched wings, the half-open beak, the glazing eye began to accuse me. By what right had I done it? I felt very guilty for a minute or two, until I remembered that my aunt had asked me to get a couple of crows' wings for her hat. I cut off the wings and went home with my trophy very much in evidence. My aunt had asked me to get the wings in a tone of voice that indicated little faith in my ability to fetch them. Let him—or her—who dared, now say I was no hunter!

FOR some time after the crow incident the gun was a lot of company for me on my tramps; but it had little taking of life to answer for. In the fall my chum and I went quail shooting. As we had no dog we took turns running up the game. I flushed a bevy for my chum; but the birds whirled out of sight and were lost in the hazel brush before he even got the gun to his shoulder. He was disgusted; he said I came on too fast and scared the birds. I had to admit that they had appeared to be in an awful hurry. When my turn came I got a good bead on the birds, but did not notice a slender sapling in the line of fire. The tree fell, mortally wounded. Then we surprised about a score of birds in the hollow stump of an old tree. They were cuddled down together with three or four speckled heads lifted up to keep watch. Neither of us cared for such a pot-shot; it was too much like sheer murder. While we were discussing how best to give them a chance for their lives, one of the birds gave the alarm and the shot was lost.

I went home. That evening I had the stockless barrels in my hand looking through them at the light to be sure they were thoroughly clean. I did not notice that my father was sitting in the window, right in range; but he noticed it, jumped away from the window and remonstrated with me at great length. I assured him that the empty barrels were utterly harmless; but he insisted that a gun, even without lock, stock or barrel, was a dangerous weapon. With the memory of that last shot in mind I could hardly bring myself to consider my gun as dangerous in any form; it seemed to have an unlimited capacity for failing to inflict damage.

WHEN the ducks began to come back in the fall I tried it again. This time I rented a boat and poled out into the lake. The whole lake was grown up with wild rice, through which boat-lanes had been kept open. Here and there was a small spot of open water around a muskrat house, and the boat-lanes ran between these open places. The growth was too thick for rowing, and the boats had to be poled. I had poled up and down the lake a couple of times before I got even a chance at a shot. Then, just as my boat was slipping out of a lane into one of those clearings, some hunter on the western shore started a couple of big mallards.

They flew low directly toward me. I grabbed my gun and stood ready, with both hammers cocked and my fingers resting against the trigger guard. The ducks were just getting into range, and I was just ready to bring my gun into action when the boat stopped suddenly against a muskrat house and I went sprawling on my back. The jar, when I landed, jerked my fingers across the triggers and both barrels fired point blank at the square stern of the craft. It was an old boat and the boards were rotten. The shot tore away all the under-water and a hurried scramble to the very nose of the boat to lift the tear out of the water was all that saved me from an immediate bath. I had been holding the gun loosely, and the recoil had badly torn the thumb and two fingers of my right hand.

I pulled the gun and ammunition down into my end of the boat and, with all the weight concentrated there, the hole rode well up in the air; but the boat could not be poled from that end. I tried it, but the harder I tried the more hopelessly I got entangled in the weeds and wild rice. I was a quarter of a mile from shore, as an engineer would measure it, and about three-quarters of a mile as the boat-lane ran. Part of the way the water was over eight feet deep. If it had been clear water the swim would not have bothered me; but I was not equipped for wading through eight feet of water thickly grown up with wild rice.

My watch told me that it was six o'clock. I had told the folks I would be home by that time. My father usually began worrying about me about an hour before I was due home; and on every previous occasion that I had overstayed my time as much as half an hour, I had reached home to find that he had gone in search of me. I thought of staying where I was until he came; but he could hardly reach the lake before dark, and it would be slow work hunting me through that maze of boat-lanes. I finally decided that I would have to get to shore myself; so I took off my shoes and stockings, rolled my pants up as high as they would roll, lay on my stomach on the bow of the boat and began to pull it along the lane by grasping at the weed stalks with my toes. My hand had stopped its bleeding, but not the pain; it throbbed and ached clear to my shoulder; but I had to use it to hang onto that boat, so I used it, although I was tempted more than once to let go and try wading for it. . . . When I at last reached home and pushed open the dining-room door the first thing I saw was my father's happy and untroubled face fairly distended with beefsteak and potatoes.

He greeted me with a jocular inquiry as to the number of my ducks and said they were sorry that they couldn't wait to have one for supper. Then he saw the bloody rag on my hand, and noticed that I sat on my chair utterly exhausted, and he began at once to do all the worrying he ought to have been doing before six o'clock. As I told the story of the afternoon he worried even more, and he roundly upbraided himself for allowing himself to rest in peace of mind when his boy was in danger; but he always returned to the same conclusion: the reason he had not worried this time was that I had always come home safely before. We had all made so much fun of him for needless worrying that I really believe he never quite forgave himself for missing this one opportunity. However, he never had another chance to worry about me and that gun. I had had enough. When I went hunting again it was with a kodak—but that's another story.

In every bushel there are little oats and big oats, starved and plump. The puny oats lack flavor. Rich oats are less plentiful. But in Quaker Oats we use the fine grains only, getting only ten pounds from a bushel.

Those queen grains, heat-treated, steamed and rolled, develop into large, white, luscious flakes. They are clean and inviting. They have fragrance and flavor.

Quaker Oats is this vim-food at its best. In millions of homes it has fostered the love of oats. Yet, with all this extra quality, it costs no extra price.

LIFE IN A BORNEO JUNGLE

BRUNEI, IN BRITISH BORNEO, BUILT ON POLES AT SEA'S EDGE, AND AT HIGH TIDE SURROUNDED BY 8 TO 10 FEET OF WATER

AN OCCASIONAL correspondent of this journal sends the following interesting letter from the jungle of British North Borneo, telling of the effects the European War is producing in that remote section of the Far East:

"Our settlement is composed of fourteen Americans, all in the employ of the Standard Oil Company. We are located in the jungle of British North Borneo, forty miles from the village of Labuan. Excepting a touch of malarial fever, most of us have been enjoying the best of health throughout the past two years, or since we started the work here. Half a dozen men have been forced to give up the work, however, on account of the malaria.

"This, I think, is one of the finest hunting territories the world affords. We find here plenty of deer, wild boars, crocodiles and many species of wild pigeons. Before we started work here, this section had been hunted over only by the natives, whose weapons were snares, blowpipes and spears.

"So far the only way in which we feel the effects of the great European War is in the advance of the price of provisions and the slow transport of material. The cause of the latter is that before the war started the Germans controlled practically all the shipping trade to Borneo, and now they are replaced by tramp steamers belonging to the English and Chinese.

"On February 15 a mutiny was started in Singapore by the Fifth Light Infantry and the Malay States Guides. A number of Chinese merchants were killed and also thirty-six English, while ten English were seriously wounded. There are a number of Germans held as prisoners in Singapore, and at the time of the mutiny the jail was thrown open and seventeen of the prisoners made their escape and so far have not been caught. Among the escaped are one officer from the renowned Emden, and the manager for Behn Meyer & Co., formerly the largest German business concern in the East. The cause of this mutiny is uncertain. Some claim it was caused by the promotion of officers not being satisfactory to the troops. I think, however, that Mohammedanism was the real source of the trouble.

"At the present time there is a good deal of talk throughout the East about the likelihood of war between Japan and the United States. We greatly dislike the idea of the United States going to war at all; but should Japan receive all she has demanded from China, it would probably be a matter of only a few years before she could defy any nation on the globe.

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA VISITS SOLOMON

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 1. 1 KINGS 10: 1-10, 13.

A Contrast Between Solomon and Christ

By Edwin Whittier Caswell

THE Queen of Sheba, attracted by the fame of Solomon and the name of the Lord God, who had given him such wisdom and majesty, made the journey from Arabia, fifteen hundred miles, to see for herself and to hear from his lips the answer to questions that troubled her soul. When she gazed upon the magnificent temple, the kingly palace, the billions of wealth, the rich banquets, the gorgeous chariots, and when she learned of Solomon's alliance with and power over other nations, she exclaimed with breathless astonishment, "Behold, the half was never told me."

Those who come to Christ in this day can well exclaim, "A millionth part was never told me." After the queen had bestowed her presents upon Solomon, including one of three millions of dollars, he gave to her all she had asked, and afterward gave of his royal bounty, which meant according to his kingly riches. It is thus Christ gives, exceedingly abundantly, above all we can ask or think. When our Lord gives pardon and cleansing, he gives from his royal bounty all things richly to enjoy, and has in reserve prizes for his children throughout eternity. He would bestow more of the riches of his kingdom upon us,

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Wisdom is better than rubies." Prov. 8: 11.

Taking wisdom as merely intellectual, there are many who would choose the laurels of the student's toil before the gold of the millionaire or the glory of the soldier. Give them the pittance-meal of scholarship and its freedom from the fret and rush of human life, and they will be more than content. Their chosen bride is knowledge, and though she be a poor one, they are satisfied. But wisdom means more. It includes that knowledge of God which begets reverence, self-control, courage, purity and faith; and surely these are better than the rubies that were ever stolen from the secret chest of nature. Young sisters, you may have no rubies—and if you have not the real ones, whatever you do, don't wear sham ones; but if you have a noble character, you are well adorned. And, young brothers, when you come to make your life-choice, do not look out for the rubies. Seek rather the wise, strong, pure soul who will be dearer at sixty than at twenty.

only our hands are so full of dust. Mankind today comes to bow before a greater Solomon. True, Jesus only had a carpenter's cottage, or a fisherman's hut, while Solomon dwelt in royal palaces. Jesus had not a penny of income, while Solomon's resources were almost measureless. In Christ's cabinet were only twelve poor peasants, while the great of earth were in the assembly that encircled Solomon.

But Solomon's was a borrowed genius, while Christ is the great original. Solomon was wise, but Jesus was wisdom. Solomon spoke the truth, but Christ is the truth. The Proverbs are wise, but "never man spake like this man."

Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like Jesus on Mount Hermon, when divine beauty illuminated his person. Solomon's throne and wisdom dazzled queens and kings, but Christ's words from the mountain side have swayed all future ages. One day Solomon is a saint; the next day, a sinner, while Jesus is the same yesterday, today and forever. Solomon's strange words in Ecclesiastes often leave hearts confused and troubled, but Jesus speaks what all men understand. "Ye believe in God; believe also in me." Jesus is the Healer, Solomon the patient. Solomon said in his sorrow, "As the beast dieth, so is man," but Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions. I am the resurrection and the life." Solomon was man-choly in his majesty; Jesus the source of hopefulness in the mighty sweetness of his omniscient vision. Solomon saw ruption in the tomb, but Jesus conquered death and opened the gates of immortality to men.

No one ever said to Solomon what he blind and suffering said to Jesus. "Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me whole," or "Hosanna in the highest!" blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Solomon never said to him, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." He built the most costly temple ever erected by man, but Jesus growing a temple that will far outlive it. Solomon's banquets were on plates of solid gold, but none ever ate there the bread of life, or felt the power of divine cleansing or knew at the banner over them was divine love.

Solomon's name was soiled; his temple and kingdom lie buried in the dust of centuries, but Jesus' name is above every name and his kingdom abides on forever.

Solomon's beautiful dream at Gibeon was like a glorious morning, dawning on his young manhood, but much of his after life was like a dream in the darkness of heathenism. We believe he awoke again, became disenchanted with the glamour of gold, the influence of power, the influence of strange gods, and exclaimed to the world, "To serve God and keep his commandments, this is the whole duty of man." Solomon had penetrated nature, knowledge, wealth, pleasure, philosophy and government, but found no peace of soul among any material thing. Over all he inscribed the awful epitaph, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!"

When we bring our heart's treasures to Christ, he gives us all our heart's treasure in this life and with his Royal bounty gives the wealth of worlds, the throne of kingdoms and the mansions of splendor in Jerusalem the Golden, for the life everlasting.

Henry Kirke White, who had but a few more weeks to live, while walking through a flower garden, found a card pinned to a plant, on which was written this verse:

To think a spring is yet to come
That I am not to see:
To think a flower is yet to bloom
From dust that I shall be.

He immediately wrote on the back of the card words which should touch hearts:

To think when months and years have fled,
And times and seasons o'er,
When all that can die shall be dead,
That I shall die no more.
Oh! where shall then my spirit be,
Where shall I spend eternity?

Every one should settle the question of the soul's residence for the unending life, by leaving the far country and worshipping at the feet of Christ.

The Search for Truth

By Arthur H. Howland

THE caution must be repeated more than once, as we follow the Old Testament lessons, that we must not be misled by the glamour with which the Old Testament writers surrounded certain persons, events and circumstances which New Testament writers would have viewed quite differently. We have seen, for instance, how warlike measures, leading even to the extermination of certain populations, were sanctioned and even glorified, and we have needed to take the viewpoint of Jesus in considering these things. In the gorgeous reign of Solomon, his chariots, his horses, his golden throne, his bursting vaults of treasure, his splendid table services, his slaves, his members of the old Canaan tribes on whom he "levied a tribute of tithes"—all these things we must consider not from the viewpoint of the proud Jew who glories in the splendor of these ancient Jewish splendors, but from the point of view of Jesus, the carpenter, the friend of sinners, the compassionate ally of the common people.

Be careful, then, in teaching this lesson, not to overemphasize and overpraise the splendors of Solomon's kingdom. Do not make the gold and jewels seem attractive. Remember Jesus' strange and baffling words: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." Remember Peter's confession, which became almost a boast, as he faced the lame man at the temple gate: "Silver and gold have I none." Remember Paul's earnest warning: "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition."

Think rather of the sweat of the men who dug from the mines the gold that Solomon used; think of the wounds of those who were hurt at their work for him or who died in his battles; think of the tears of the widows whose husbands were drowned on his voyages; think of the bond-slaves who bent their backs to his yokes; think of the privations of families in his own and other lands which made possible the luxuries of his palace. The Old Testament observer condemns Solomon for his pagan wives and for his joining with them in their pagan worship. The Christian condemns him also for his vast and needless accumulations of wealth and his vulgar display of it, for the stupendous luxury of his life and his court and for his oppression of the people, for although the queen of Sheba praised his justice, his son Rehoboam in announcing that his own oppression of the people would be like chastising them with scorpions, acknowledged that his father's oppression had at least been like chastising them with whips.

But in the midst of the semi-pagan, brutal, ridiculous glamour of Solomon's court there still shines out at least one real and abiding truth. Instead of believing in a multitude of gods, Solomon believed in one, at least until his heart was turned away by his pagan wives. And it was this message that the queen of Sheba came from her far palace at the other side of the desert to hear. Her mind and soul felt the yearning for the true God, and what she had heard of Solomon made her hope that from his lips she might find the truth. And she did. Although not all was true that Solomon believed about God, the God he believed in was true. And we may believe that the queen went back to her distant palace with the conviction in her soul that there was but one God, and that he is an eternal Spirit.

The relation of this visit of the queen of Sheba to the later developments of religion in Arabia or in Ethiopia are matters of interesting but unsatisfactory study. Abyssinia holds the tradition that the queen introduced certain phases of Jewish thought into the life of the people and that this preparation of Judaism made the way for the establishment of the Christian church of that country. The Abyssinian Church is one of the most ancient of all Christian communions and has an uninterrupted history. The matter of connecting the influence of the queen of Sheba with Candace, a later queen of an Arabian kingdom, whose chamberlain heard of Jesus from the lips of Philip, is also an interesting though difficult line of research. But it is not too much to say that in all probability the queen of Sheba did attempt to spread the truth she learned from Solomon, and there can be little doubt that by some channel or other that truth reached through the centuries, refreshing and guiding the people and preparing their minds for the message of Jesus, the greater than Solomon, God's true Messiah.

To search for truth; to find it; to sift it from accompanying error; to be true to the truth; to spread it, these are our tasks in this later day.

Well Pleased With His Bibles

The Bibles ordered recently have been received. They are duplicates of one received six years ago, and which has been subjected to the toughest kind of use, but which has stood it well, while a Bible of a similar purchase for our son only a year ago, shows signs of decay. Thank the Christian Herald for putting out such a book at that price.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS FOR AUGUST 1

A Promise of Protection

Epworth League. Ps. 91

THE ninety-first Psalm is one of the wonder chapters of the Bible. The way into that "secret place of the Most High" where the soul may "abide under the shadow of the Almighty" is open for all. He may be for every life the "refuge" and the "fortress." While we are trusting in him we shall be delivered from the "snare of the fowler and the noisome pestilence," the "terror by night," the "arrow by day"; the "pestilence in darkness" and the "destruction of noonday." No matter what calamities befall those who do not trust in Jehovah, no real calamity can touch the life that is abiding in him.

How, then, can we explain the apparent disasters which seem to overtake God's saints? The only explanation and the true explanation is that so long as he is abiding in Jehovah, what seem outwardly to be disasters are in reality blessings.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

AHAPPY mother has written us of the conversion of her son. She says: "The Prayer League with the help of our heavenly Father has helped my dear boy and stopped him from drink and brought him to Jesus." Mrs. M. A. P. writes: "Some time ago I requested prayer for the conversion of two sons in California. Praise God, one has found Christ and is wonderfully saved." L. S. writes: "I asked for prayers through your League for my conversion and later for assurance and a deeper work of grace. I acknowledge an answer to our prayers. I was baptized at the close of the revival at Crane Creek Baptist Church the 14th of this month." Mrs. L. L. Y. writes to tell us of the result of a revival in her town. She says: "I asked, some time ago, for the prayers of the League for God's blessing upon a revival to be held at West Chester. The prayers were abundantly answered. Many were converted and many renewed their vows. The unity of spirit was beautiful."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

Mrs. J. E. M., Portland, Ore. (for saving son's life through two serious operations); Mrs. E. H. N., Winchester, N. H.; M. F., Muskegon, Mich.; Mrs. E. A. T., Lawton, Mich.; H. P., Silver Point, Tenn.; N. H., Milan, Mo.; Mrs. A. J. R., New London, Conn.; R. L. W., San Diego, Calif.; Mrs. H. K., Norristown, Pa. (for restoration of health); Miss A. B., La Pryor, Texas; Mrs. W. E. S., Freeport, Ohio; Mrs. L. W., Olympia, Wash.; Mrs. E. J. B., Sweetwater, Tenn. (for the removal of a great burden); Mrs. A. G., Oswego, N. Y.; M. A. W., Hambleville, N. Y. (for restoration of health to her niece).

The following letter has just been received from Mrs. J. A. Hardy, the mother of the Prayer League: "Dear Members of the Prayer League: Will you please unite with me in prayer that if it is God's will he will restore my daughter to health? She is very ill and expecting to be carried to the hospital in a few days. Special prayers are asked for the speedy recovery to health of Rev. H. F. Reynolds, general secretary of the Missionary Board of the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene."

Since the above paragraph was written a telegram from Mrs. Hardy brings a still more urgent request for prayer for her daughter's recovery.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Coatesville, Pa.; Worcester, Mass.; Tioga County, Pa.; Burns, Kan.; Silver Point, Tenn. (that many may be saved during the revival there, including ten friends and five brothers of a member of the Prayer League); Alden, Mich.; Laurel Branch, W. Va.; San Diego, Calif.; Hillsboro, Ohio; Springfield, Ill. (that the saloons and cigarette business may be closed in this town); Orlando, Fla.; Monmouth, Iowa; Olympia, Wash.; Birmingham, Ala. Prayer is requested for all those who believe in false religions in our nation, that they may be converted, also for the unconverted membership in a church in Lexington, Va. Mrs. S. J. S. requests prayer that a church may be built at Laurel Branch, W. Va.

Little Every-Day Kindnesses

(C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Eph. 4: 25-32. (Consecration Meeting))

THERE are in reality no little kindnesses. Any kindness that is done a friend may be the last we shall ever have the opportunity of rendering him; any opportunity of serving him that we neglect may be the last opportunity. And such a thing as sudden death shows us how big these little things really are, for they can bring such great regret if they are neglected, or such great joy if they are not forgotten.

The little kindness you do to some one may lead him to do a great kindness to another or many kindnesses to a multitude.

BUILT A MONUMENT

The Best Sort in the World.

"A monument built by and from Postum," is the way an Illinois man describes himself. He says:

"For years I was a coffee drinker, until at last I became a terrible sufferer from dyspepsia, constipation, headaches and indigestion."

"The different kinds of medicine I tried did not cure me, and finally some one told me to leave off coffee and take up Postum. I was fortunate in having the Postum made strictly according to directions on the pkg., so that from the start I liked it."

"Gradually my condition changed. The old troubles disappeared and I began to feel well again. My appetite became good and I could digest food. Now I am restored to strength and health, can sleep sound all night and awake with a fresh and rested body."

"I am really a monument built by Postum, for I was a physical wreck, distressed in body and mind, and am now a strong, healthy man. I know exactly what made the change; it was leaving off coffee and using Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:
Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Cornless Feet

Are Very Common Now

A few years ago they were not. People pared corns and kept them. Or they used an inefficient treatment.

Then the Blue-jay plaster was invented. That ended corn pain instantly for everyone who used it. But it also gently undermined the corn, so in two days it all came out. And this without one bit of pain or soreness.

One told another about it, until millions came to use it. Now those people never keep a corn. As soon as one appears, they remove it.

We urge you to do that. Prove Blue-jay on one corn. If you hesitate, let us send you samples free. If the pain does stop—if the corn does go—think what it means to you. It means a lifetime without corns. Your own friends, by the dozens, probably, know that this is so.

NEW MODEL HUDSON SALES

FIRST TWO DAYS, 1041 SOLD
FIRST TEN DAYS, 3480 SOLD

See How Hudson Sixes Are Selling It Breaks All Sales Records on Class Cars

The deluge of demand for this new-model HUDSON has amazed every man concerned.

The Opening Days June 14th and 15th—packed every HUDSON showroom. In those two days men paid for HUDSONS over $1,400,000.

During the first ten days 3480 cars were sold. There has never been anything known to compare with it in the records of high-grade cars.

Records of 21 Months

This new-type HUDSON, bear in mind, is only 21 months old. Before that, men who bought high-grade Sixes paid $2250 up. And their cars weighed up to 4500 pounds.

The first model of this new-type HUDSON sold for $1750, and weighed under 3000 pounds. It cut fuel and tire cost in two. Never once on that model could we catch up with orders.

Next season we doubled production and brought the price to $1550. That model last summer was 4000 cars oversold.

Now again we have doubled production, and brought the price to $1350. And again the demand exceeds output.

Now Everybody's Choice

Now this new HUDSON, among high-class Sixes, is nearly everybody's choice. No real rival is in sight. And this type of car—the Light Six type—dominates the quality field.

There was a time when many a car claimed to be "much like the HUDSON." But the HUDSON kept adding refinements. Within 20 months it brought out 51 distinct improvements. In the same time it dropped $400 in price, because of the multiplied output.

Now no car is like HUDSON, and nobody thinks so. There is not today, in the whole field of Sixes, a comparable value. That's the reason for this HUDSON flood.

Three More Innovations

This new model brings out three more big attractions:

The Yacht-Line Body
Lustrous Finish
More Room and Luxury

One means the handsomest body lines ever shown in a car. One means a finish brilliant and enduring. In the finish, exclusive to HUDSONS, every coat is baked on in enormous ovens. The equipment for it cost us $100,000.

The tonneau is roomier, the rear seat is wider. There are two seats which disappear. The cushions are deep and comfortable. The upholstery is enameled leather. A leather-bound top-piece surrounds the whole body.

These complete 51 refinements made since this car came out. And they place this new HUDSON among the finest cars built.

Pick Your Car Now

The time is surely coming, if this sale continues, when men who want HUDSONS can't get them. It has come again and again in the past 21 months. And this season, in this class, you will find no second choice. You will find nothing to satisfy after seeing this HUDSON. If you want early delivery on a new car, now is the time to decide on it.

Series 8—Franklin Car

Another Franklin Achievement—a Full-Size Five Passenger Touring Car, weighing only 2,675 pounds, $1950

ONE of this country's greatest industrial men said: "The man who bets against the informed opinion of the American public will lose."

This is particularly the case with the automobile situation today. Intelligent motorists are no longer taking their standards from the man who "doesn't care about expense."

What has happened is this: The automobile is finding its place as a matter of service. Buyers are looking for simplicity, for more comfort, for efficiency in gasoline mileage, in oil mileage, in tire mileage, less depreciation and lower upkeep.

In place of "selling features" they are demanding proofs, and judgments are formed only after a full investigation of facts.

These informed buyers are making this the biggest year in Franklin history, with interest and inquiry growing every day.

Consider the facts—

Franklin owners average 9,000 miles to a set of tires.

They average 500 miles to a gallon of oil.

In a National test, 96 Franklin Cars ran 100 miles on low gear without stopping the engine.

On May 1st, 1915, 137 Franklin Cars in all parts of the country, running on all kinds of roads and regardless of weather conditions, made an average of 32.1 miles to a gallon of gasoline.

Investigate the second-hand value of any Franklin Car.

Motorists nowadays are learning how to interpret such facts as these and use them as a standard of comparison in judging a car. Not merely its operating cost, but its capital value as an investment.

A few years ago, Franklin Economy in tires, in oil, in gasoline, was likely to be regarded only as a matter of cutting down operating costs.

The buyer sees further than this today. He knows that Franklin high tire mileage proves scientific light-weight—the smooth-running, easy-riding quality of the Franklin Car.

That the Franklin Low Gear Run is the most searching test that could be devised for the Franklin Direct-Air-Cooling System.

More automobile buyers every day are using the Franklin Facts as a standard of comparison.

These facts are at your service if you are interested in judging your car, or any car, on the basis of efficiency, convenience, comfort.

Any Franklin Dealer will give them to you. He is ready to show you the Series 8 Franklin, with the new bodies.

The Roadster weighs 2,587 lbs.; the price is $1900. The Sedan weighs 2,970 lbs.; the price is $2850. The Coupe weighs 2,810 lbs.; the price is $2600. The Berlin weighs 3,200 lbs.; the price is $3100.

DO you know a little house-mother—or a big one—whose appetite is a bit droopy in hot weather?

There's always a refreshing appeal in Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes with ripe fruits or berries—a little cold milk poured in at the side of the dish, and sprinkle the berries with powdered sugar—but not the golden flakes. All by themselves they have the coaxingest flavor.

There is a thought here for all of us perhaps—breakfast, luncheon or supper, or before going to bed—better than so much meat these summer days.

And remember, please, you don't know corn flakes unless you know Kellogg's—the original Toasted Corn Flakes—with the pride of the maker to keep the delicate process complete.

Then too there is the WAXTITE package that keeps the fresh, good flavor in—and all other flavors out.

A World Cries—Peace!

By Emil G. Bofz

The time has come—the time is now.
O Nations of the Warring World,
To gain your meed of laurel bough,
And brand the flag too long unfurled
The glory's gone, the glamour's gone,
We only see the blight, the woe,
The graves unwept, the hearts forlorn,
The dripping flesh of friend and foe

The time has come—the time is now.
O Nations of the Warring World,
To wipe the blood-sweat from your brow,
To quench the flames of hate that curled
Across the sky. The trappings bright
Have lost their luster, lost their glare.
We see but vultures on the height,
Only the sightless sockets stare

The time has come—the time is now.
O Nations of the Warring World,
To clinch your Vikings stern and prow
And hellward have them pitched and hurled.
Too many hearths have dined with death,
Too many fields are gnarled and bare;
There's charnel stench upon our breath,
There's carnal taste upon our fare

The time has come—the time is now.
O Nations of the Warring World,
To smash the saber, grip the plow,
To bridge the stream of blood that swirled,
For God glares down with vengeful eye,
While earth gropes, restless with dismay,
God give again a chastened sky,
A hallowed day!

Questions and Answers

Miss L. C. P., Cohasset, Mass. The epistle of Paul to Philemon is linked very closely with the apostle's epistle to the Colossians, and both were carried by the same messenger, Onesimus, who was the slave of Philemon and a fugitive from justice. Under Paul's teachings he was converted to Christianity, and being induced to return to his master, was made the bearer of this letter, in which Paul recommended him as no longer a mere servant but also a brother in Christ. Apphia, mentioned in verse 2, was the wife of Philemon, and Archippus, the Colossian pastor, is supposed to have been a near relative, dwelling in Philemon's house. The epistle was regarded by the ancient church as the unquestioned work of Paul himself. It was written, as authorities believe, by the apostle early in the year A.D. 62, during his first captivity in Rome, and its whole object was an appeal for the restoration of Onesimus to Philemon's favor. While the longer epistle to the Colossians was dictated to an amanuensis, this message to Philemon was wholly in Paul's own handwriting. The last line "Written from Rome to Philemon, by Onesimus, a servant," does not mean that Onesimus was the writer but the bearer. It was as though a letter-writer today should write on the envelope, "To Mr. So-and-So, per kindness of Mr. Smith."

M. P., Salem, Mass. The incidents in the first two chapters of Nehemiah are the record of a series of events which show how the narrator had found a way providentially opened to him to state the request he wished to make to the king. He was cup-bearer in the royal palace. The queen referred to was probably Esther, whose presence would doubtless tend to encourage him in making his request, as it was known throughout the kingdom that she exercised great influence and was in strong sympathy with any movement for the benefit of the Jews. The monarch was Artaxerxes Longimanus, then in the twentieth year of his reign, or about B.C. 437. Josephus, the Jewish historian, relates how Nehemiah, while walking around the palace walls, overheard several persons talking in his native tongue, and, finding that they had lately come from Judea, he spoke to them and learned all about the unfinished and desolate condition of Jerusalem and the helpless state of the returned exiles. It was this knowledge that made him sad before the king.

C. F. B., Iola, Kan. Exaggeration is a habit which, if encouraged, may become a besetting sin. There are many people who can hardly converse without exaggeration, and to such it becomes a second nature. There is, it is true, a certain kind of exaggeration which is simply intended as humor, and the very absurdity of which prevents it from being accepted seriously. Still, even such humor may have its drawbacks, and often leads unconsciously to chronic exaggeration amounting to falsification or lying. If we follow the Scriptural advice and avoid "vain words" and "babblings," we shall do well. There are various degrees of lying; but all lying is bad, and we have Bible warrant for saying that a lie, of whatever degree, is hateful in the sight of God.

Subscriber, Alton, Cal. The expressions "kingdom of God," and "kingdom of heaven" are used in different senses in the Scriptures. At times the "kingdom of God" is meant to include the whole universe; again, the "kingdom of heaven" is applied to the celestial regions, where divine Majesty sits enthroned. In the Jewish Church it was taught that there were various degrees or heights in the heavenly kingdom (see II. Cor. 12: 2). The old rabbinical doctrines made the distinction of three heavens, viz., the firmament, the starry heavens and the "heaven of heavens," which is the abode of the omnipresent God and of the highest of his spiritual creation, and it is this latter heaven which Christ called "the house of his Father." (John 14: 2.) Still further, the phrase "kingdom of heaven" is frequently used in the Gospels as meaning that wherever the rule of Christ is set up in the hearts of men, "the kingdom of heaven is within you." When we pray "Thy kingdom come," we look forward to the time when the ends of the earth will acknowledge God's supremacy and his rule will be universal.

F. M., Petersburg, Ohio. 1. The Pentateuch is the name given to the first five books in the Bible. It means "the five-fold book." 2. The kings of Israel were: Saul, David, Solomon, Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Jehoash, Jeroboam II, Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, Hoshea. 3. The prophets are sixteen in number: Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Jeremiah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. 4. The patriarchs were: Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, Shem and Noah. 5. The judges, during the four and a half centuries from the death of Joshua to the accession of Saul, were fifteen in number: Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Samson, Eli and Samuel.

G. E. H., Millsboro, Del. There is no definite scale laid down in the Gospels for our gifts toward the Lord's work, although there are various passages on the subject. Many good people even today adhere to the tithing system and find satisfaction in it, while others, who give "according as God has prospered them," find that where love stimulates their generosity, their gifts are blessed to themselves and others. If we lavish all our prosperity on ourselves and our families, leaving little or nothing for the Lord's work, we are "robbing God." It is well, therefore, to make him a partner in all our increase, and a sharer in all our benefits. Since everything we have comes from his hands, we should not hesitate to acknowledge it by a generous return. We know of several worthy people who systematically plan to devote a good share of their income to the church, to missions, to charities, and to various philanthropies. One of these friends carries a list of some sixteen missionaries in foreign fields, whom he supports, and with whom he is in more or less regular correspondence. Nor does he let other good causes suffer, although the one dearest to his heart—the spread of the Gospel—may receive the largest share. Another person devoted a large percentage of the profits of an immense business to the support of a chain of home missions. He did not neglect church work or other causes, and prosperity always stood by his side. We believe in systematic giving, however much or little may be our gift, and whatever we give let it be done without ostentation, but modestly and gladly, and it will not fail to bring a blessing.

D. M., Fertile, Minn. 1. It is a mistake to dabble with the productions of false teachers, simply to indulge curiosity. Write to Rev. I. M. Haldeman, 389 West End Avenue, New York, for booklet on the teachings in question. 2. The passage in Matt. 18: 17 means that if, after we have taken all the steps enumerated in the previous verses to reach an agreement with an offending brother, we still find him obstinately and defiantly resolved on his own course, we are no longer to regard him as a brother Christian, but as one outside the church in the same manner as the Jews regarded Gentiles and publicans. This, however, is a radical measure and one, fortunately, which is extremely rare. An offense must be flagrant indeed to call for such a penalty. We are told to forgive our brother not seven times, but "seventy times seven," the meaning being that we are to keep on forgiving and praying and working and believing that God in his own way will bring the matter out right.

C. S. C., Rutland, Ohio. Conversion is the "turning" of the sinner to God, following the conviction of sin by the power of the Holy Spirit, bringing a change in the thoughts, desires, dispositions and life of the sinner as the result of the exercise of a saving faith in the atonement by which he is justified. In a more restricted sense, the word "conversion" is often used to mean "the voluntary act of the soul consciously accepting Christ in faith as Saviour." "Regeneration" is the creation of a new condition of the heart and is not a personal act of man, but that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart. It is being born anew "from above" (John 3: 7), a "renewing of the mind" (Rom. 12: 2), "a putting off of the old man and a putting on of the new" (Eph. 4: 22, 24). The change in regeneration lies in the recovery of the moral image of God in the heart—"a condition which enables us to love him supremely and to find our highest joy in his service." You do right to believe that one who is willing to do God's will and to give up everything to him—one who holds himself and all he has at the Lord's disposal—is regenerated and ready to be used by the Lord in his work.

Reader, Sackville, N. B., Canada. We have repeatedly given through the Mail-Bag the orthodox view concerning labor on the Sabbath. No work that can and should be done on other days, should be carried over to the Lord's Day. Only such labors as may be properly regarded as works of "necessity or mercy" are justifiable on that day.

G. E. S., Indianapolis, Ind. 1. Many floral varieties produced by skilled horticulturists are named after well-known people, which is a very graceful way of paying a compliment. The case you mention was of this class. 2. The hymns you quote will be found in many of the older collections, but hardly in those in vogue today.

I would say that Jesus' words to Pilate were 'Thou couldest only as it is given thee from above.' God is in Israel a stumbling-stone. Why? So could fulfil God's plan in giving the world a Saviour. SHORELINE OF BAIÆ, PUTEOLI

VIEWING ACROSS THE BAY FROM PUTEOLI TOWARD NISIDA

PUTEOLI THE DEGENERATE

CONTINUING THE NEW SERIES "IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL"

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

IT IS thought by some that Paul's defective eyesight may have prevented his appreciating natural scenery. However that may have been, seems impossible that he should not have been impressed by the splendid views that day was sailing past of Sicily through the Straits of Messina along the south Italian shore enjoys. He would indeed at first smiling, vine-covered hills; and when he had gone far, glowing delta, snow-capped or, and of the year, would have appeared in view, less wreathed with its own sulphuric vapors, as mortal as Fujiyama itself and covering a far wider base.

None of his letters Shelley tells us that man who surrounds the city of Naples is more cheerful than any within the reach of civilized man. Personally I should hesitate to endorse the extravagant dictum of the poet, for I think there are several other harbors, Rio Janeiro, London and Sydney for instance, that rival him in beauty and grandeur. But allowing for the enthusiasm of a poet, his statement is not far out of the way, and all of the journey up the Italian coast as far as Naples is a fitting prelude to the ends of the Bay of Naples.

A ver-changing panorama delights the eye until none to Reggio, the ancient Rhegium. Alas, a little sight there greets the traveler today. Mediterranean side of the narrow strait and Reggio on the other were both wrecked almost beyond recognition by the disastrous earthquake of 1783. On the Italian shore one sees great masses of little wooden houses, many larger than hen houses, where the portable bungalows were transported from their ready-made, to relieve the sufferings of the homeless people. They are not adapted, for little has been done to build up the ruined cities.

The Authorized Version of the twenty-ninth chapter of Acts says in sailing St. Paul's journey from leaving Syracuse, "and when we had a compass came to Rhegium." An older story is told of an incident he is said, mentioning the words, that now he had read the Bible to be a lie, some of the back of Acts it was said to say for a compass. Paul's ship, and every day saw that this was long before a compass was invented. The Revised Version has taken in and out of the inadequate latitude scale, he speaks, however, of having seen the harbor of Rhegium. And from Rhegium he made a cruise, and arrived at Rhegium." Here St. Paul's ship evidently waited for one day, perhaps to discharge some cargo, or possibly waiting for a fair wind, which was blown, for we are told that "after one day with wind strong up, and on the second day we came to Puteoli." Puteoli lies to the north of Reggio. Shortly after leaving Reggio we pass between Scylla and Charybdis, the fabled monsters of antiquity, the rock and the whirlpool, which have been called of all their names since their origin, come to know the world, and to make the travelers' hearts and dangers light. Soon after, the active volcanic mountain of Stromboli, one of the Lipari Islands, is seen, and all the way along the gorgeous south Italian shore reveals itself, spotted mountains near their heads in the near distance, their sides clothed with vineyards and olive and orange orchards far up their slopes.

As we approach the Bay of Naples the scenery becomes constantly more entrancing. We see the promontory of Sorrento across the bay of Salerno, and soon Capri with its two green islands in sight on the left, and Ischia, with its constant plumed of smoke on the right. These wonderful natural objects must have been surely the same to St. Paul's eye as to ours, though perhaps Vesuvius was not then the giant, lava-lashed monster that it is today, but was dotted with green vineyards and sunny cultivated slopes almost to its top. No one could imagine even in a nightmare the terrible destruction which in less than a score of years has so much forth from the center of the sleeping giant.

Sailing across the Bay of Naples, past the spot where the notable city of the present day is situated, a place which was then comparatively insignificant, port travelers came to Puteoli, or Puteoli, as it is now called, at present a decadent suburb of Naples.

This miserable and dirty town of some 15,000 inhabitants, as it now is, is connected by railway and steam railway with Naples, and is often visited by the modern tourist who wishes to see the remains of the ancient temples and amphitheater and the mighty mole which still tell of the ancient glories of Puteoli.

Near by, too, is the volcanic field of Solfatara, not a mountain, but a flat plain, the crater of a long volcano, into which one can thrust his cane in many places and find smoke and sulphurous vapor issuing from the hole as he withdraws it. Probably there are few more dreary or despicable places in Italy than this modern suburb of Naples. It has one or two decent palaces, which somewhat relieve the worst signs of Naples, but is a squalid, unattractive town of the worst type.

It is difficult to realize that at one time might have been called "the Liverpool of Italy," that here was the Lucrine Lake, which supplied the numerous Romans with their famous gardens, and that the same bay was covered with the beautiful yachts of the fashionable elite, who were here just before the most noted result, as it was called, for the invincible and fashionable allies of Rome.

There were famous springs here, which attracted the sick from many countries, and it is said that the famous bath came from the sulphurous steam which they emitted. Puteoli is no longer a fashionable watering place, but from other causes the same name might be applied to the modern Puteoli.

Yet here we can look back upon the things which St. Paul saw and saw, and from which we can see the modern hills, no less beautiful in their spring greenness than in their spring day when Paul stood within their protecting arms. We can see the ancient part of the great mole which stretched far out into the bay, with those slender masts anchored in the Alcantara (the bay in which Paul had arrived). Today we can see the ruins of the temple of Serapis, or the splendid market-place as it is now thought to be, which very likely was in its pristine glory when Paul landed, and we may even see some stones belonging to the ancient monument of Tiberius, which in Paul's time was crowned by a statue of the emperor.

Tens of thousands of travelers from many lands sail into the famous harbor of Naples every year, but comparatively few of them realize how near they are to the footsteps of St. Paul, and how, after a short trolley ride from the city, they can plant their feet where he trod.

Let us take the electric car from Largo Vittoria, where the beautiful park, Naples' famous promenade and Rotton Row, begins; a park that stretches for nearly a mile along the water front. Soon, however, we get beyond the fashionable quarters and the innumerable hotels. The car makes its slow way through a slummy region where the air is rent with the raucous cries for which noisy Naples is famous, and the nose is assailed by more than the seventy odors of Cologne.

Shortly a tunnel is reached under the green hills of Posilipo, a tunnel almost as ancient as Naples itself, for it was dug by the Romans to avoid the steep climb over the precipitous tufa rocks of Posilipo. Seneca, we are told, grumbled at the dust and darkness and the odors of this tunnel, and they have not been improved since his day. The noise is deafening from the clatter of horses' hoofs, the patter of herds of goats, the grinding torture of the electric car wheels, and above all the brazen throats of the Neapolitans who urge on their donkeys with an indescribable noise, guttural and grating, which seems to come from the innermost parts of their anatomy. Imagine all this noise, duplicated and reduplicated by the resounding arches of the tunnel, and one can have some idea of the grotto that leads him to Pozzuoli, the ancient Puteoli of St. Paul.

Another slum awaits us at the other side of the grotto, followed by vineyards and orange groves and truck farms, until, after a ride of four or five miles, the last part of which affords glorious views of the bay and its islands, which never lose their charm, we at last find ourselves in another slum, more hopeless than any we have yet seen on the way, and find that we have at last reached the old Puteoli, and that the electric car leaves us but a few steps from the spot where the great apostle must have come ashore.

As we step off the car we are followed by a retinue of ragged guides offering their services for a franc, to all the points of interest. But Baedeker is a better guide than any of them, and we can carry him in our pockets, where we would be very slow to

The modern pier, built over the ancient mooring, is a truly magnificent one of solid cut stone, which runs far out into the sweet, clean water, and by going to the end we get beyond the reach of the inordinate touts. If one can forget the approaches to the pier, he can here enjoy the enchanting scenery of sea and shore, while his mind is stimulated by memories of the mighty past.

But the volcanoes have brought blessings as curses, for the ash which they pour forth comes in a few years a soil of incredible fertility, like the volcanic soil of the Yakima valley on our own Pacific Coast, where the magnificent apples of Washington are raised.

Another product which the volcanoes vomit forth is called Puzzolana earth, a name derived from the same Pozzuoli, where we find ourselves, and from which a cement is made which apparently will last throughout all time, for though the ones imbedded in it thousands of years ago may be largely worn away, yet the cement remains harder than the rock itself.

But let us turn our eyes seaward for a moment, and imagine that it is nearly a hundred years ago, and at a great Alexandrian corn ship is coming into the harbor. The arrival of the first corn in the spring was a notable event. "The fleet of traders was preceded some way," we are told, "in advance by light sailing ships, which heralded its coming. They could be seen a long way off, for they sailed through the narrow straits between Capri and the mainland with topsails flying, a privilege allowed to none but ships of Alexandria. Then all the town (Puteoli) made ready to listen to the water's edge to watch the sailors dancing on the quays, or to gloat over the wonders which had traveled thither from Arabia, India, and even from Cathay. . . ."

In such a corn ship came, as we have seen, to Puteoli the apostle to the Gentiles, a man whose stature perhaps, but great in spirit, and whose message mighty for the pulling down of the strongholds of evil and for building up the citadels of righteousness.

ISLAND OF NISIDA, WHERE BRUTUS ONCE HAD A VILLA. NOW A QUARANTINE STATION

put anything belonging to the two-footed guides.

The immediate surroundings of the great pier where St. Paul landed are as filthy as any other part of Pozzuoli. Indescribable old hags leer at us from the doorways; ragged and dirty children, wholly unacquainted with the use of a pocket handkerchief, swarm around us. Several small fishing boats are drawn up on the shore, and a little church, called St. Paul's Chapel, stands immediately behind the ancient mole.

THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE CONVENTION

BY FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

THE Anti-Saloon League forces, eight thousand strong, held their sixteenth convention at Atlantic City, N. J., July 6 to 9. The three days of the week preceding were devoted to a superintendents' and workers' conference of the Anti-Saloon League field force from about every state in the Union. On July 6, in the afternoon, there was a business men's banquet which was addressed by former Governor Eugene N. Foss of Massachusetts, Governor George A. Carlson of Colorado, Rev. Dr. P. A. Baker, general superintendent of the National League, and Rev. Dr. Howard H. Russell, founder of the league, who presided. It was determined at this banquet to raise a fund of $2,000,000 for campaigning for a two-thirds majority for the national constitutional prohibition bill in Congress, and in the interest of its ratification by three-fourths of the states.

The convention proper opened on the night of July 6 at the Million Dollar Pier, exercises being held in the auditorium and the hippodrome simultaneously, with the same speakers passing from one to the other. Those who looked out into the faces of the eight thousand representatives who had come from all parts of the nation and heard the powerful addresses said they believed no such meeting against alcohol had ever been held in the world. The meeting in the auditorium was opened by Bishop Luther B. Wilson, D.D.

Dr. P. A. Baker, the national superintendent, made his report to both meetings, in which he referred to the nine states that have joined the prohibition column and three more, South Carolina, South Dakota and Ohio, which, he said, had a good prospect of reaching the new emancipation before the snow flies. He referred to the Webb-Kenyon interstate commerce amendment bill, which it is thought destroyed a third of the saloons of the nation, and to the wonderful vote on the Hobson-Sheppard prohibition bill in Congress, with its eight majority, under the handicap of the opposition of Mr. Underwood and Mr. Mann. He pointed with pride to the eight hundred people employed by the Anti-Saloon League, to the 40,000 pulpits opened annually to its representatives, and to the million and a quarter dollars the churches of the various denominations give to the support of the cause.

FORMER Governor Eugene N. Foss of Massachusetts, in his address Wednesday morning, said the business men in Massachusetts are lining up for prohibition, because it is an industrial state, and the manufacturer has no more use for the saloon than the church has, and prohibition is good business. He said the liquor business had damaged the output of the industries in Massachusetts, and the business men were now engaged in fighting it through the Anti-Saloon League.

Governor George A. Carlson of Colorado said, "When our strike came, the state's first action was a military standpoint was to close the grogshops." The governor bore testimony to the efficient work of the women's votes in making Colorado dry. He said that without their votes he did not believe the Anti-Saloon League forces would have succeeded.

Mr. Charles Stelzle claimed the workingmen of America is rapidly joining in the warfare against the saloon, feeling that it is his greatest enemy. He told of having met thirty labor members of the British Parliament in a conference, who expressed sympathy for the world-wide war on alcohol of whom were themselves total abstainers.

At the closing session, the committee on solutions recommended the removal of District of Columbia excise commissioners; the modification of civil service laws to permit government employees to take part in local option and prohibition campaigns; barring intoxicating beverages from interstate commerce; barring newspapers and periodicals containing liquor advertisements from the mails; prohibition for the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Alaska, Porto Rico and the Philippines by congressional enactment; and the submission of a national prohibition amendment to the people.

The Anti-Saloon League has proceeded upon the policy of the interdenominational and non-partisan elimination of the saloon by the participation of the members of the churches at the ballot box. Today, almost all of the church and temperance organizations are working in harmony with it. In its development from the beginning there has been singular ability and integrity. This great convention of eight thousand representatives was only an expression of the magnitude of the movement, which in twenty-two years has seen the removal of the saloon from two-thirds of the geographical area and more than one-half the population of the country. All of the speeches and actions of the convention were optimistic in the extreme, and full of faith that in 1920 there would be a saloonless nation through a national prohibitory law.

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

WHEN this article falls under the eyes of my readers, the war in Europe will have been going on for practically one year. It will perhaps be instructive to cast a retrospective glance over some of the results of the past year, before taking up the happenings of the past week.

The results of the military operations of the year may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. The commerce of the Teutonic Allies has been completely swept from the seas, and all the German colonies, except one, are at this writing in the solute possession of the enemy.

2. Great Britain has gained complete naval mastery of the seas, and is exercising same, being unable, however, to insure her maritime commerce entirely against attacks by the enemy, owing to Germany's efficiency in the use of submarines.

3. In land the Allies have possession only of four comparatively small portions of the enemy's territory: In Galicia, 7,000 square miles; on the Italian-Austrian frontier, 4,000; in Alsace, 400 square miles; and on the Gallipoli peninsula, 35. Except the last named, these territories have neither strategic nor economic value of importance.

4. The Teutonic Allies are in possession of approximately 100,000 square miles of territory belonging to the enemy, much of it of the highest strategic and economic value.

5. The French and the Germans, of all the combatants, are putting up the most scientific and well-organized fight, both in the field and behind the lines, and probably will continue to do so; Great Britain is showing a lamentable lack of power of organizing and maintaining a land force in proportion to her strength in men, money and resources.

6. In the week ending July 15 Great Britain's premier, Mr. Asquith, made the announcement in Parliament that at the present time there was no question of possibility of any peace negotiations with Germany. Much of an interesting nature, of a semi-diplomatic, semi-military character, occurred in Great Britain during the week in connection with the strained relations existing between Lord Kitchener on one side and Sir John French and Lloyd George on the other, and on the subject of Haldane's attitude to the cabinet, vehemently opposed by Lord Curzon (Harmsworth) and his chain of newspaper. Mr. Asquith refused to reply to all questions put to him in Parliament as to the relations between Sir John French and Lord Kitchener, and on the subject of munitions of war, as in his refusal on the ground that any discussion on these subjects now would be against public policy.

A most serious strike in the coal industry in South Wales began late in the week, which is important in that it affects the supply of coal for the navy and for the munitions factories, some of which later will be obliged to shut down, if the strike continues any time, for lack of fuel. About 100,000 miners went out, and this directly in the face of the application of the Munitions of War act to the coal industry, by which act striking under the existing circumstances, is made a crime.

A considerable sensation was created by Lord Landsdowne's admission in the House of Lords that the strength of the British forces on the frontier is only twenty-two or twenty-three divisions, 420,000 to 500,000 men, and not the million or more which the general public understood were there. The admission made a discussion on the pending conscription act, which is understood to be an essential preliminary to an adoption of the policy of conscription.

Austria has made a formal protest against the import from the United States of arms and munitions to the Allies. This protest is intended to lay the foundation for a claim against the United States after the war, which, if made, would probably be heard by a body somewhat resembling the Panama Commission. Turkey is also to protest, it is said.

The battleship Koenigsberg, which last fall took refuge in the Rufige River on the East African coast, where large vessels could not reach her, has finally been destroyed by the British. Two of the monitors, the Severn and the Mersey, which a while ago were operating on the Belgian coast, were sent all the way to Africa for this purpose. Owing to their light draught, these monitors were able to get near enough to destroy this 3,300-ton cruiser.

The presence of British troops in Serbia is now officially admitted, though no details are given as to their numbers, etc. Greece, Bulgaria and Rumania figure little in the week's news, in spite of the fact that the date for the meeting of the Greek Boule is close at hand. The Greek attitude, however, appears to have been considerably modified by the activities of Italy in Albania, and by the Greek suspicions of Italian designs in Asia Minor. Bulgaria and Rumania apparently are perfecting some understanding which will enable them to act as one in the near future.

The Emden, which was sunk off Cocos Island last November, is to be raised and taken to Australia, if possible, and the Australian Government is asking for tenders for that purpose. If the operation is successful, the ship, it is said, will be repaired and added to the Australian forces, presumably as a trophy, as she could not have much fighting value.

The latest British loan has been unquestionably a great success, and the present chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. McKenna, who introduced several novelties in the manner and the terms of subscription, is entitled to be proud of the result. There were over 1,097,000 subscribers in all, and the total of the subscriptions reached the colossal amount of $3,075,000 in money, besides the stock which is to be issued for conversion purposes. The loan is for approximately three billion dollars.

People wonder why the development of the Italian campaign against Austria is so slow. Before her campaign, in the broad sense of the word, can really begin, she must be in control of the Pusterthal, which leads from Trent southward to her border. The strategic value of this valley was proved beyond question in the campaigns in Northern Italy in 1796, and until in her control the movement across the Isonzo cannot succeed, because she would be moving an army from west to east, while a hostile force is in strength to the north, and therefore would be undertaking that very dangerous and very rarely successful movement known as a flank march.

This, therefore, is the real reason why the attack on the Gorz-Gradisca-Montefalcone line is not pushed with all possible vigor and a serious attempt made to advance on Trieste, nor will any such attempt probably be made until the Italian forces sufficiently control the Pusterthal to prevent any Austrian offensive from being launched from that quarter. Hence, for some time, because the Pusterthal will not be conquered rapidly, as it will have to be won foot by foot, the Italo-Austrian campaign is likely to remain to a large degree colorless.

On the water, an event of some interest in the naval campaign between these two countries was the sinking by an Austrian submarine of the Italian armored cruiser Amalfi in the upper Adriatic. This vessel, a sister ship of the Pisa, laid down in 1904 and of 10,118 tons displacement, was one of the two newest, largest, most heavily armed and fastest of the Italian vessels of this class. The loss of life among the crew is stated to have been small.

In the Dardanelles the week was quiet both on land and sea, and there appears to be little prospect of the deadlock which has been reached here being speedily broken. Such fighting as takes place, in proportion to the length of front and the number of men engaged, seems to be the bloodiest in any field.

The campaign in the east for the last week has been a puzzle. Here were two enormous armies facing each other on a front extending from near Wiridan on the Baltic, southward to the Rumanian border, some 1,400 miles, and during seven days neither side reported a single movement except an occasional petty skirmish in the district between the Niemen and the Vistula. Day after day the German and Austrian bulletins dismissed this campaign with the brief statement that there was no change in the position of their troops, and the Russians only issued two official bulletins during the whole week. What the cause of this inaction at this season of the year is is unknown to us. Many theories have been advanced, but none seem satisfactory.

Finally, on July 15, the Germans came to life and attacked and captured Przasnysz in north Poland, and took a number of prisoners in so doing. Full details lack, but from the location of this place it may be inferred that a general attack on the Russian lines in north Poland is about to begin, with the object of breaking through and attacking the Warsaw-Ivangorod line from the north and from the rear. If this theory is correct an attack on the Lublin-Cholm line in the south, along which front the army of General von Mackensen is in readiness, will be made at the same time, and we also look for activity in Galicia to the east of Lemberg from Busk south to the Rumanian border.

The German forces defending the German colony of Southwest Africa, comprising 3,923 men and 204 officers with seven field pieces and twenty-two machine guns, surrendered to General Botha during the week. The general will, it is said, now proceed to Europe with a force of South African troops.

In the west fighting was concentrated in three regions, the district north of Arras, the Argonne forest, and the Vosges. At Souchez the Germans made quite an important gain, recapturing about half of the ground lost by them in the preceding weeks.

In the Argonne region the army of the Crown Prince made a determined effort to close the twenty-five-mile gap in the circle surrounding the fortress of Verdun, and met with some measure of success. In the Vosges the French, in a connected series of small attacks kept up nearly all the week, gained a considerable amount of ground and captured about a thousand German prisoners.

JOHN BARLEYCORN'S PARTNERS

BY MARIETTA HOLLEY

MY PERSONAL knowledge of the doings of John Barleycorn & Co. is necessarily limited. My home is in the pleasant country between two villages, one two miles and the other about three miles away. The larger village has several factories, a creamery, where very excellent butter is made and shipped to New York and other cities. A large factory makes medical appliances, and gives employment to a good many people, their wages, of course, helping other business concerns in the village. There is a canning factory, also helping the community by its purchase of country produce. There is a smaller factory, two banks, dry goods stores, groceries, mills, etc.; and, of course, churches and schools. No broken heads or hearts and no evil effects have ever been traced to these industries and institutions.

And now to tell some of the workings and effects of the rum business and what John Barleycorn has done for this little community. This statement is absolutely true, and I would warn the reader that it is not pleasant to listen to.

When I was a little girl (and my hair is pretty white now), I remember having listened with child-like horror to the story of how an old woman, living about a mile east from us, got intoxicated and fell off a steep bank and was killed, her dead body being found in the morning, lying stiff and cold on the bank of the stream far below. At about the same time I remember hearing of an old man, who lived about two miles south of us, being found in the yard of a sawmill, frozen, his whisky bottle beside him.

And I remember, as one of the wondering sights of my girlhood, how an old man, with bloated face and bleared eyes, would stagger along the road from the old-fashioned country tavern where he got his whisky, and how his wife took in washing to support herself and him; and I remember hearing it said that this old, staggering, sodden-faced man began life as an unusually promising and intelligent business man, and he and his wife commenced married life with the brightest of prospects. Looking upon them in their crazy little hovel, which stood about half a mile from my home—she bent with trouble and toil, he a bloated wreck—it seemed like the wildest romancing to picture them as ever being young, and prosperous, and happy. But that was before John Barleycorn had enticed him into business relations with him.

IT WAS about this time that I used to see another old gentleman, with snow-white hair, who lived near us, face blood-red, eyes encircled with a red, watering rim, but dignified and courtly, and always using the choicest language, even in his cups. He spent every penny he could possibly raise in the same country tavern, and left his family practically starving and naked, kept from destitution only by what his wife and little children could earn, and the kindness of the neighbors who, out of pity for his wife—one of the best of women—and sympathy with her efforts to keep her bright little children fed and clothed, did what they could to help her.

I remember how I used to hear it said that this man's education and natural ability were such that he could have filled any position, had he not gone into partnership with John Barleycorn. After his children had left home disgusted, and his broken-hearted wife had laid down her grief and burdens in the grave, he did stop drinking, overcome by a too late remorse and despair, and he said to my mother: "Mary, I am not going to die a drunkard."

But so firm a grip did the drink habit have on him that the effort to free himself was too hard for him, and he passed away, one of the grandest victims John Barleycorn ever held in his relentless clutches.

Of course I have only related bare facts. I cannot reckon up the amount of bodily and mental suffering, the grief and shame and vain remorse and agony and the loss to the world. There was no gain in this business partnership, but a greater loss than my pen is able to describe.

As I grew older I saw many promising young men drawn into this business, and in no case did I ever see one iota of good to compensate for the countless evil. It was always a dead loss; always sorrow, shame and want to the new member of the firm and the community. Two young brothers went out one day in a boat on a small pond near us, John Barleycorn going with them. He drowned them in the noon of a sunny day, and then reached the shore in safety, looking out for new victims to draw into his net. Not long after this a married man with a houseful of little children committed suicide in a drunken frenzy, leaving his wife with a baby in her arms, and her brood of little children to suffer and struggle on as best they might. Not two months before, this man was a good workman at his trade, considered an affectionate husband and father.

Ever since I can remember hearing of rum-drinking and its effects, up to the present time, John Barleycorn has never stopped in his steady work of enticing and drawing new recruits into his business. In a town a short distance away, on a cold winter night, an old man started to cross the field on his way home after spending the evening at a hotel with John Barleycorn. His frozen body was found in the morning. Within the past two or three years a successful business man was thrown by John Barleycorn from an automobile near us and killed instantly. Another young man was thrown from a motorcycle by him and killed! Another was crushed to death underneath the wheels of a passing car.

Within that same time a man from a most respectable family, a married man with seven children, after a drunken carousal, lay down on a railroad track, about half a mile from home, and a train passed over him. Only months later another husband and father was on the same railroad track, leaving his work out by the week, with one baby tugger skirts, three other children supported Orphan's Home, and the rest of the little entered around in different families.

THERE are many more cases as heart-breaking as these I have mentioned. Besides the John Barleycorn has caused, he has done a fine business in debasing and demoralizing by destroying property, ruining homes and breaking hearts. And if so much has occurred in this settled place, what of his business in cities and thickly settled communities? For the life I cannot understand why this business is to flourish in our midst, why it is protected by government, or how good men can help by votes to perpetuate and prolong the reign of this ghastly monarch.

As I said, there have been many more true in this vicinity I have not spoken of. The memory of a young man, the handsome, brightest of his family, amiable, intelligent, generous. I saw his face gradually change from intelligence and good nature to the sodden, dissipated animal look John Barleycorn brands on his partners, marking them as his own. But I better describe the change in the bright, happy of this promising young man; the change in his habits and character, from bright promise to ruin, than I can describe the heartaches, the efforts to save, and the final despair of the loved him.

And for this and for all the other reasons named, and for many I have not named, I owe John Barleycorn a lasting enmity, and vow to that as long as life endures I will wage war against him. It has been a hopeless antagonism the past, by reason of a woman having no and efficient weapon to use against him. I have hopes now that, with the strongest weapon which I see just beyond us, and which we are reaching for, we may do better work, and join forces with the good men who with heart and soul are trying to rid the world of this evil force.

KINDNESS

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

They say: "Be kind to animals,
Don't pull the pussy's tail—
An' pat the horsie on the nose,
An' fill his dinner pail!
Don't slap the doggie when he barks;
In kindness never fail."

They say: "Do deeds to other folks
That you would have them do
If they were here to fill your place,
An' bein' nice to you!"
We learn a text at Sunday school
'At tells it straight an' true.

So when I get a sugar lump
(Or maybe two or three),
I give 'em to you, Mister 'Coon,
So you can plainly see
What I would like—if you were I,
To have you do to me.

But my! you're big an' awful rough,
Your face is like a moon,
So round, and oh! so scary, too . . .
Your growl is out o' tune!

Oh please don't jump (I'm bein' kind!)
Don't bite me, Mister 'Coon!

Women May Save the Day for Peace

IF PEACE is maintained in this country—if this country takes no part in the European war—it will be largely because of the tireless interest and activity manifested by the women of the United States. As already pointed out in the Christian Herald, there are a number of peace movements, and while the names of men of calibre have been placed at the head of lists of them, it is, after all, the women of the country who are working most actively to maintain the status quo.

Some remarkable instances have been brought to notice of the earnestness and self-sacrifice of women who desire, at all hazards, that war not come to this nation. Women in various parts of the country have been banded thus together and have taken upon themselves the raising of questions in the matter of procuring signatures on petitions which are being and will be sent to Washington for the attention of the President and Congress. Women of influence have given up their spring shopping and have devoted the money which they would have spent thereon to the expenses of the campaign. Children, also enthusiastic about the work, have denied themselves many coveted pleasures so that stamps might be purchased for the cause.

The Organization of American Women for Strict Neutrality, located in Baltimore, has now over 300,000 signatures, which will be presented to President Wilson as soon as may seem expedient. Some of the individual petitions sent in contain hundreds of names. One of these was three miles long and contained 912 names. It is said that literally millions of signatures have been poured into Washington and will continue to pour in for the interest of peace.

The Organization of American Women for Strict Neutrality protests against the exportation of arms and munitions of war from this country. Copies of this protest, with ruled space for signatures, can be obtained from Miss N. Miller, Roland Avenue and Elmhurst, Baltimore, Md., upon request. It is the hope of the organization that women over the United States will obtain the protest, secure signatures and send the completed documents back to Miss Miller for presentation to the President.

Glimpses of Mont-Lawn, the Christian Herald Children's Home

At the top a bit of Sunshine Alley in front of the dormitories, flanked by a good nurse and a baby, sister. Below, a boy in a quite natural attitude and an end of the show in business. Views of the boys and the girls marching from Fort Plenty to class. These, looking out of the school play room at Fort Plenty, and at one side a group of girls, fresh from the shower baths, and another group awaiting to be doused. At the foot of the page the children grouped in front of their Troop, with a couple of boys on one side and the beginning of supper at the other. Please note the women of these scenes, for they will reveal the physical and moral and mental development of children who, all but those few days of the year, are confined to the four walls and streets of New York City. If you find no such scene, why not visit a world of it at home for just $3.00? It will cost you only three dollars.

CONFESSING CHRIST

AN UNPUBLISHED SERMON BY THE LATE D. L. MOODY*

TEXT: "Let every one that confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven. But he that denieth me before men, I will also deny him before my Father which is in heaven." Luke ix. 26.

IT IS difficult for Christian men and women who, perhaps, have been silent for a long time, to begin to bear witness for Jesus Christ. In some parts of China, when a man becomes a Christian, or gives up his old religion, the government has made arrangement that such a one does not have to pay taxes to the joss house when the tax collector comes around because he is a Christian man, and the collector makes the man preach to prove his claim to being a Christian. There are many here who, if they could take off their taxes by preaching, would preach.

But what we want is to testify—to be ready at all times, if we are true children of God, to give our testimony and not be ashamed of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Many years ago, there was a young lawyer who went home one day and told his wife that he had become a Christian. They were going to have some company that evening, and he said, "After supper I want the servants to come into the drawing-room, and I'm going to read and pray." His wife was a professing Christian, but she said, "My dear, you know that these lawyers who are coming to dinner are scoffers or skeptics, and it will be very embarrassing if you should not succeed in your attempt to pray. Don't you think you'd better put it off until after they are gone, or go out into the kitchen and pray with the servants?" She seemed to think it would be well to pray with them. The man thought a little while, and then said, "Well, wife, it's the first time I've taken Jesus Christ into my heart, and I feel that I should ask him into the best room in my house." And, after supper, he said to the gentlemen there that he had that day accepted Jesus Christ and would like them to go with him while he prayed. They went into the drawing-room and the young man led in prayer. That was Judge McLean, one of the finest judges of our Supreme Court, who stood for Christ constantly over forty years. Wasn't it a grand confession? Would to God that we could have men coming out like that now! Let our young men start out like that and declare that they will be on his side; it would help turn the spiritual tide of any city.

Two Bible Characters Contrasted

I want to call your attention to two Bible characters. When I take up one, I think he is the finest character, and when I take up the other, I think he is. One was on the bottom round of the ladder—none poorer. The other on the top round, socially, as high socially as any man. Both lived in the same city. Men say, "If I were a man of wealth and culture and influence, I could do so much for Christ." But God can take a tramp and make him worth more than a wealthy man for Christ. John Bunyan was worth more than all the wealthy men of his day. If we had wanted some one to write a book more precious than all other books, aside from the Bible, we should have gone to some great seat of learning, some world-famed university; but the Lord converted a drunken tinker and he wrote the book. The Lord can pick up a tramp here in any locality in America and make him shine not only in our day but in eternity. All men want is to be illuminated. I hope the Lord will light us up today.

This first of the two characters I speak of was blind and a beggar. In Jerusalem there are blind beggars at the gate now. I suppose they have been there ever since. And the Lord met this man and asked him if he wouldn't like to receive his sight, and he said he would. Never had any man asked him that before. And the Master spat on the ground and anointed the man's eyes and sent him to the Pool of Silcom to wash, and, while he was obeying, he received his sight.

When he got back where he lived—I suppose in one of the back streets of Jerusalem—the whole neighborhood was out. There was a great sensation over the wonderful event. Everybody was talking about it—a man born blind who had been made to see. Half of the people believed he had got his sight, and the other half believed it wasn't true.

I want to tell you I don't believe the Son of God has ever done a work on the earth since that time over which the community wasn't divided. I'm always glad when I hear of a division; then I know the Lord's at work. When I begin to get abusive letters, I always say, "Thank God! The Lord's at work now." These letters always show signs that somebody's stirred up. Now, if that blind beggar had belonged to a school of men such as we have nowadays, he probably would have said: "Well, I've got my sight; I'll just keep still. He's got many enemies here. I've got my sight, and that's all I care for. I'll just keep out of it, and so do nothing." He would have been what we call a "trimmer." But when the discussion over this strange case got very hot in Jerusalem, or somebody pointing to the beggar said he wasn't the man, while others held as stoutly that he was, he laughed at them and said, "I am he." He cut their argument right off. "I'm the man that was born blind," he insisted. And they said, "How did you get your sight, anyway?" And he told a straightforward story. It's not the most eloquent or most flippant man that has the greatest influence with the jury. It may be a stuttering man. Let a man go into a court and let him show off his eloquence, and the judge will stop him and say: "We've lawyers to do that for us; you just tell what you know." That's what a witness is for—to tell what he knows, not to air his theories or opinions. This man told a plain, straightforward story. It was enough to put out a man's sight to fill his eyes full of mud; but when the Lord is going to do a work, don't you try to dictate! One says this thing and another that. And they took him to the Pharisees.

A Straightforward Testimony

"Well," they said to the young man, "what do you think of Christ?" He might have dodged the question, and said, "I've not made up my mind yet; I've not seen him since. I'd like to see him before I make up my mind." But he didn't do that. He said, "He's a prophet; that's what I think." "Tell us how you got your sight." "Well, I told you once; if I tell you again, will you be his disciples?" He was trying to make disciples of those old Pharisees! Those whom Christ could not reach! I never saw a man grow so fast in my life! They said, "You are his disciple." And they began to sneer and jeer at him. "We've got Moses and the Law." "Well," says he, "there's one thing that I know: whereas I was once blind, now I see." He has got assurance! I pity these Christians who are born blind and don't know whether their eyes are open or not. It's a good thing to know that you've got sight—to know that you're saved. And this man said, "There's one thing I know; whereas I was once blind, now I see." And there weren't enough Pharisees in Jerusalem to beat him off that rock. Could they make him believe he hadn't got his sight? It was disheartening for the Pharisees when he said: "One thing I know: never since the world was fashioned did a man born blind get his sight. If this man were not the Christ of God he could do nothing. He must be God." That was a good sound theology. Thank God for such a witness! Do you know, there's more room given in John to that blind beggar than to any other character in that Gospel. He has a whole chapter given to him—and yet we don't know his name! When I get to heaven, I'm going to inquire for that man.

Nineteen hundred years have rolled away, and preachers without number have preached about that man who was born blind. His testimony has come down the ages, and has cheered and put courage into men. May it put courage and life into you to come out and stand for the Son of God, and to confess him. Do it today and keep doing it as long as you live, and you'll grow stronger and stronger.

One of the few men in the Bible who have nothing recorded against them is Joseph of Arimathea. Every one of the evangelists has a good word to say for Joseph. One says he "was an honorable counselor," another that he "was a just man," another that he was "a rich man," another that he was a "secret disciple." Only two of the evangelists speak of the birth of Christ; but all four of them erect a monument to Joseph of Arimathea. When he became a disciple we are not told. Dr. Andrew Bonar of Scotland says he can just imagine that Nicodemus may have been moved by Joseph of Arimathea to believe in Christ. At all events, Nicodemus didn't come out very bold self; he didn't get his discipleship out very early. They were both members of the Sanhedrin; it is evident that none knew that Joseph was a secret disciple until a certain night. It may have been that, after a stormy session in which many bitter things had been said of Christ, Nicodemus took Joseph by the arm and led him out in one of the courts of the Temple, and said, "Joseph, I was up last night to see that Prophet of Bethlehem, and had an interview with him extending over an hour or more." "Did you? What did you think of him?" "I think he's the most remarkable being I've ever seen. He told me something that shook my heart. I never spent such a night. I told me that 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life that he was the Son of God, and that he had come to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. And I asked his disciple, John, if his Master often talked like that, and he said he talked so generally.'"

The Boldness of Joseph of Arimathea

Joseph that night might have become a disciple; but if he had come out and confessed Christ, he would have lost his seat in the Sanhedrin, and his rank and title, and would have been ostracized from society. It cost too much. The sacrifice was too great.

Do you know what brought out Joseph of Arimathea? To me it is one of the splendid things in history. It got noised around in Jerusalem, perhaps at nine o'clock at night, that Christ had been arrested in Gethsemane; that Judas had succeeded in turning him over to the officers. The Sanhedrin was summoned—they sent out messengers to get them to come—but I don't think they invited Nicodemus. They knew he never would consent to the death of Jesus; and so, perhaps, he wasn't invited that night. But they didn't know that Joseph believed in him. And so, that night, as the case was brought before the Sanhedrin when one witness after another had been summoned and put under oath, and the Sanhedrin was questioned as to what they thought, the verdict ran tough the hall, "He is guilty of death." But there was a great surprise! Away down at the end of the council chamber, this rich man, Joseph of Arimathea, sprang to his feet, his face having a deathly pallor. Agitated, but with a clear, ringing voice, he says, "I never will give my consent to that just man's death." Thank God, he got his lips open at last! Long ago, a secret disciple! Didn't it cost him something to take courage that night, when the verdict was universal, as they supposed, and when almost a universal hiss was going up in Jerusalem against Christ?

I can imagine Joseph leaving that council chamber. He saw that he was powerless to save the life of Jesus. He had done all he could; but he knew that Christ would be crucified. And I can imagine that he had a faithful body-servant who had been in his family for years. And the next day he says to this man: "I want you to keep watch on what is going to be done. I can't bear to go to Calvary and see him nailed to the cross; but I want you to come and tell me all that takes place." It may be that Joseph thought that God would intervene and save Christ. I can imagine the next afternoon, about four o'clock, the servant coming back all out of breath, and pale, and saying: "He's dead! He's dead! I've just come from Calvary. I've just heard him as he uttered his last words: 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' He dropped his head upon his breast. He's dead. I heard the centurion say he was dead."

Joseph arose, and he "went into Pilate's judgment Hall boldly." How I like that word "He went boldly" to Pilate, and begged that body. I can imagine Pilate saying, as he gave permission: "What! this honorable counselor from Arimathea a disciple of Jesus? I would to God I hadn't given my consent to that man's death." Then I can see Joseph and Nicodemus, with some of their servants—I see them drawing the nails out of his hands and feet; and they take that mangled body down and wash it in clean water, and wrap it in fine linen. And just a few weeping Galileans follow him to his resting-place. They put him in Joseph's sepulcher, which was to become the most famous sepulcher in

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Spring at the Hill

SUNDAY, August 1. Psalm 110: 7. "He shall drink of the brook in the way." "I beheld when that they all went on till they came to the foot of the Hill Difficulty, at the bottom of which was a spring. Christian now went to the spring and drank thereof to refresh himself: and there began to go up the hill." There is never any all where that spring may not be found. Whenever life's goings pass from the easy level to the steep gradient the Lord provides the refreshing spring. There are still waters just where he begins to lead me to the climbing and difficult "ways of righteousness." Samuel Rutherford used to say that whenever he found himself in the cellars of affliction he began to busy himself in looking for the King's wine. And whenever a pilgrim of Jesus finds himself face to face with some exacting duty on the highway of the Lord it will be his wisdom to look out for the springs of inspiration which the Lord of the way has most surely provided.

On the reverse side of every duty may be found a corresponding gift of grace. Every call of the Lord is complement in spiritual equipment. Every commandment is an inverted promise. All the demands of our God may be interpreted in the terms of his love. The measure of the one is the revealer of the other. A great calling means an equal bounty. If his commandment is exceeding broad it is because his love is exceeding deep. "As thy day so halcyon strength be." Reckon the hardness of the task as the index of the endowment. Turn the uttermost and think of them as the invitations of grace. Is there a steep hill before me? Then what spring there must be! Is there hardship before me? Then what intimacies of divine friendship must be calling me? Is it to be a long, long road? Then what brooks I shall find by the way!

Our trouble is, we see the hill and forget the spring. We take our task as a duty and not as a communion. And so life becomes a statute and not a love. There is obedience but no devotion. Yes, there is duty but no piety, which means that we accept the hill and reject the spring. And yet the spring is there! "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!" "He shall drink of the brook in the way." J. H. J.

The Transforming Power of His Presence

MONDAY, August 2. Isaiah 41: 15-29. "Rivers in the bare heights and fountains in the midst of the valleys." Life is not easy for any of us, whether we live on the heights or in the valleys. The sight of publicity and outward rank are bare, and the views of obscurity and lowly position are often alleys of Baca, dry and barren. But directly we are God's secret, though outward circumstances be as before, rivers begin to flow from the heights, and fountains spring in the rock-strewn vales. It is no likely that the pilgrim-hosts, as they returned from Babylon, really saw any transformation in the river. The outward aspect of nature must have been much the same as seventy years before. Yet that vast difference there was between those level and monotonous plains, seen through the tears of suffering, and beheld again by their children when the path was filled with laughter and the tongue with singing. The Lord had turned again their captivity, and that made all the difference. Still the tiny room of poverty and the wasting illness; still the monotony and loneliness of a desolated and bereaved life; still the strained lot and the dreary hope. But the eye of faith has lenses of so great a character, that all things are bathed in a glow of hope and love.

Therefore comfort thy heart. Do not look at God through circumstances, but at circumstances through God. Put him next thee! Wait patiently. He will have her way! Hope to the end for the voice be brought unto thee! Ponder all things in the twilight of eternity till, in thy case also, what is a secret to others shall become a Land of Beulah to thee. F. B. M.

Conclusion of Sermon

The world's history. They have given Jesus a kingly burial. They roll a great stone to the door, and they lie away with sad and aching hearts. Their twelve years roll away, and Joseph is lying in his death-bed, his dying couch! Man! Woman! I haven't got a great while left to confess my sins. Do you know it? We have but a little time before the cross down here; the crowning time will be on me.

"He Reminds Me of Jesus"

TUESDAY, August 3. Acts 4: 13. "They took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus." In the last analysis, persons are the great powers of influence in our world. The written word is mighty and the thoughts and ideals of great artists in verse or marble or painting have stirred many thousands of human beings to nobler purpose and achievements. Architecture of beautiful form and music have softened and enlightened humanity; but the human voice, the touch of the hand, the presence of a dear one by our side, these are the powers, par excellence, in human existence.

We once saw Dr. Howard Kelly, the great surgeon of Baltimore, beloved and almost revered by students because of his life as well as his skill, walk into a student meeting at Johns Hopkins University. The meeting, which had inclined to drag and be devoid of interest, seemed a new thing, touched with the presence and the personality of a great and loved man. There was only one thing the students thought of; it was to hear Dr. Kelly speak to them. When he arose the applause that swept the room was only the reflection of the light and interest that shone in the eyes of the undergraduates. Personal influence was at work that day.

Out of our personal presence men go to be better or poorer because they have taken knowledge of us as the people did of Peter and John. What is the character of the influence that men take from our lives? Is it possible, is it likely that people are saying, "There is something about him that reminds me of Jesus"? Is there something about our presence that can not be explained in any other way than by saying, "He has been with God"? C. S. C.

The Hidden Meaning of Suffering

WEDNESDAY, August 4. John 11: 1-16. "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God." To the Lord's hidden retreat in Perea the breathless messenger brought tidings of the sickness of his friend. We would have supposed that he would risk all peril and hasten to his side, but instead, he tarried where he was till he knew that Lazarus was dead. That dread close of his sufferings was permitted, not as a permanency, but as presenting an opportunity for setting forth the glory of God. You cannot have the rainbow spray of color apart from the black thunder-cloud on which the light breaks.

The sisters had never known Jesus as the Resurrection and the Life if Lazarus had not died. Thus our necessities and sorrows, when looked at from the divine standpoint, give us new lessons of the variety and fulness of God's resources. Every stormy wind as it rushes past utters a new name of Christ. Every wave washes to our feet a casket in which is hidden a deeper revelation. It is at the Cross, when the earth rocks with convulsion, that the veil is rent.

But, apparently, the Lord allowed the sisters to suffer because their pain offered a platform on which he could perform a miracle that would help myriads of souls throughout the ages. This idea was not foreign to heathen philosophy. "Accept," says Marcus Aurelius, "everything that happens to thee, even if it seem disagreeable, because it leads to the health of the universe; for God would not lay on any man that which he suffers, if it were not useful for the continuance and perfection of the whole." Let those who live to suffer take heart! In some way that passes human thought they are fulfilling a useful and blessed ministry to the entire family of man! F. B. M.

Immortality

THURSDAY, August 5. Job 19: 26, 27. "With thee my flesh shall I see God, whom I, even I, shall see on my side, and mine eyes shall behold, and not as a stranger." When the Lusitania went down, Mr. Charles Frohman is said to have remarked to a friend, as he stood quietly upon the deck of the sinking ship: "Why fear death? It is the most beautiful adventure in life." We can not know of what this quiet, brave soul was thinking when he spoke these words, but to the Christian, to the man who, like Job, knows in whom he believes, death should be without terror and the grave approached as "One who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams"—because he is sure of God.

To Job the sense of immortality lies in the fact that it satisfies not merely a future existence of rewards and compensations. It meant an existence with God, whom he already knew as a close personal Guide and Friend. As we go to a dear friend's house, not to see his furniture or look at his pictures, but to see him, to be with him, so the Christian thinks of heaven as a meeting-place with God, who perfectly understands him, who has followed him with loving care through all of his earthly journeying, who has helped him over the hard places, and is waiting for him with a welcome and not with a reproof. The sense of our future world depends upon our knowledge and acquaintance with God in this present world. Whittier's lines are Christian lines:

I know not where those islands lift their fronded palms in air;
I only know I can not drift beyond his love and care.

Death is indeed a beautiful adventure. It is even more: a certainty of things to come that eye hath not seen and ear hath not heard, revealing the love of the God the Christian knows. C. S. C.

The Passion for Soul-Winning

FRIDAY, August 6. I Thessalonians 1: 13-20. "Ye are our glory and our joy." How tenderly pathetic this epistle is! The apostle describes himself as a gentle nurse cherishing her children, and as willing to impart his own soul, because they were so very dear. Here his converts are his hope, his joy, his crown. We are deeply condemned, as we read these expressions, since our hearts are comparatively unmoved by the condition of others. We do not seek them, or tend them, or account them as our all-sufficient prize. We pray in cold blood. We are more anxious to get to heaven ourselves than to get others there. We cannot say with Baxter, that each soul we win will make another heaven for ever.

But how contagious Paul's passion for souls has been! St. Catherine cried, as she stretched forth her right hand: "Promise me, dear Lord, that thou wilt save them. Oh, give me a token that thou wilt." And in answer Jesus seemed to clasp her outstretched hand and gave her the promise; and she felt a piercing pain as though a nail had been driven through the palm. One who knew W. C. Burns, the friend of McChesney, who took his church during his absence in Palestine, gives this reminiscence of the great soul-winner: "Mr. Burns went to his room, and whilst we waited for his coming downstairs to dinner, we heard a heavy groan. Thinking he was ill, his hostess ran upstairs and found him lying on his face on the floor, groaning before the Lord. He had gotten such an overwhelming sense of his responsibility for the souls of that people; that he could think of nothing else." Let us also recall those memorable words of Henry Martin, on reaching the shore of India: "I desire to burn out for my God." To acquire this passion, let us look at men from Christ's standpoint, and imagine how much one straying sheep means to his shepherd-heart. The saved are his joy and crown. F. B. M.

The Angelic Ministers of Childhood

SATURDAY, August 7. Matthew 18: 10. "In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." The ministering angels of the children are in the front ranks. They stand nearest the throne. They are the favorites of the infinite company. We therefore should not forbid the children, but gladly open the way for them to come early to Christ. "For except ye become as little children, ye can in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." Children are the favorites in faith, trustfulness, willingness, hope and love. Let them into the kingdom. Their angels convey their prayers as they say, "Now I lay me down to sleep," and minister to their needs as they awake in the morning. Wings, wings of angels, fly for their succor and relief, bearing them gently through life, or upward to their own blessed company. How beautiful in our heavenly Father to send his protecting angels, who shall keep thee in all thy ways, bear thee up in their hands, and at last convey thee to thy native skies!

The heavenly worlds are brought near by the angels, who are ministering messengers of love, especially to the children. Let no one hurt or slight these little ones. If he do, better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he drowned in the depths of the sea. E. W. C.

LOST, FOUND AND CLAIMED

By Margaret E. Sangs

"MARY," said the stout woman in the seat next to me, "Mary, don't tell me you've lost the lunch-box!" Her tone was tragic. The girl, equally stout, blushed and put a chubby hand over her eyes in a rather shamefaced manner.

"Now, mommer," she stammered, "now, mommer, don't talk so as the whole car can hear you!"

"But," insisted the stout woman, "but, Mary, you did lose it, didn't you? 'Cause you ain't got it. Where—not that it will do any good—where do you s'pose you left it?"

The equally stout girl sighed dolefully. "I ain't never sure where I leave things, mommer," she murmured, "but it must have been in the subway."

"Tain't no good to look, then," said the stout woman snappishly. "You won't find it. I declare to goodness, I believe you'd lose your—your head, if it wasn't fastened on!"

If the stout woman and her equally stout daughter had known something about the subway in whose car they left the lunch-box, they need not have worried. Few people, however, do realize how efficient the lost-and-found system of the subway is. If I had known (for I only did learn the particulars a few days ago), I would most certainly have told them to go to that department of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Probably they would have found the lunch-box safely stored away in the midst of a very treasure trove of articles, some valuable and some worth only a few cents, some that folk are searching frantically for and some that nobody will ever dare to claim.

For twenty-one years the Lost and Found Department of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company has been under the care of Mr. John Charlton. If an article bears any hint of the owner's identity, said owner is at once informed of its safety. If there is no obvious sign of ownership the lost article is carefully put away and taken care of, be it a thousand dollars in bills or a live and squealing baby. If at the end of six months it remains unclaimed, there is an auction at which it is sold to the highest bidder (with, of course, the exception of all unclaimed babies).

It taxes the imagination to realize how absent-minded and forgetful a person must be to lose some of the articles that wait to be claimed at the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Here is a list that will give a slight idea of the things found:

AN EXHIBIT OF ARTICLES LEFT IN THE TRAINS FROM TIME TO TIME

Radium, sweet potatoes, false teeth, dynamite (in stick), guns (shot and rifle), pistols, auto tacks, blackjacks, eye-glasses, opium pipe, guinea pigs, pigeons, money, and sets), wigs, bedsteads and bedding, musical instruments, picks, shovel, opera glasses, keys (bunches of them), policemen's badges, cocaine, satchels, tools, artificial arms, overalls, shemanscripts, overcoats, undercoats, policemen's billies, whisky, chickens (cooked), turtles, canary birds (caged), love letters, monkeys (live), dogs (in boxes), cats (in bags), baby parlor lamps, rat traps.

It is almost impossible to imagine that any one could forget an arm or leg, but such things have happened in the subway. One recently unstrapped from a aim human body and left on a seat. Two hours later the owner was cited talking to the lost-and-found office over the telephone. He was happy when he heard that his been found, but he did not know he had managed to get out of the car without it. That is a matter open to conjecture. There was a like case of a woman who lost an arm, neatly gloved, in a subway car. She managed to forget it?

Arms and legs are not the only hard thing to forget, which nevertheless are forgotten. Can you imagine any one who could walk out of a car and leave a bedstead with mattress, bedding and sheets? Wouldn't you, in a package—wouldn't you at least be conscious of your arms were strangely empty? It is the owner, evidently an Italian, four days later that he had lost it, and notify the office.

Oh, yes, if Mary and her stout mother had gone to the lost-and-found office they would probably have recovered their lunch-box! Certainly they would have seen an interesting room—almost a museum—full of curiosities. Why, if Mary had (as her mother hinted) had not been fastened on, and she had lost it, it might—in less than an hour—have been neatly shelved waiting for the owner to rush in and claim it.

LUTHERAN SYNOD REVIEWS WORK

THE English District of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio and other states, met at St. Paul, Minn., June 16-22, in the Church of the Redeemer, Rev. C. C. Kreinheder pastor. It opened with a divine service led by Rev. J. W. Miller, vice-president of the joint Synod, of Fort Wayne, Ind., who spoke on the theme, "Why we should hear, read and spread the Bible."

A telegram was sent to President Woodrow Wilson containing the following resolution in favor of an Embargo on Arms:

"We citizens of the United States at St. Paul, Minnesota, for the purpose of a Convention of the English District of the Synod of Missouri, Ohio and other States, in mass meeting, and conscious of our American lineage, as pure and as old as any, do resolve that we ask the President of the United States to place an embargo on the sale and exportation of arms and ammunitions, to the nations at war."

"Because, First, such furnishing of munitions of war is manifestly inconsistent with the proclamation issued by your Excellency, at the beginning of this war, asking for public prayers in behalf of the speedy restoration of peace, and because:

"Secondly, an embargo upon the furnishing of arms and ammunitions is entirely consistent with your Excellency's appeal in favor of the application of the principle of a 'higher humanity' in the interest of the adjustment of the issues between this nation and the nations at war."

The English District also assists in the work of home and foreign missions prosecuted by the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri. This work is being carried on in twenty-four languages. Poles, Letts, Estonians, Lithuanians, Finns, Slovaks, Jews, Hindus, Italians and many other nationalities are being nurtured with the Gospel. In Brazil the Lutherans now have one hundred and twenty-one congregations with a membership of 16,000 and only thirty pastors to supply them. A very promising mission has been opened in the Argentine Republic. The work in India, though hampered somewhat by the war, is growing. Fifteen missionaries are in charge of eleven flourishing stations. Two new missionaries have been sent to China. Another missionary has been added to the staff among the American Indians. The Lutheran negro missions are experiencing a healthy growth. The church is also enlarging its mission among the deaf mutes.

In spite of the general financial depression due to the war in Europe, the finance committee states that the total contributions for the year 1914 for missions, synodical treasury, building fund, extension fund, relief fund and benevolences showed a thirty per cent. increase over the contributions for the previous year.

Invitations for the next convention were received from St. Louis, Mo., Fort Wayne, Ind., Shreveport, Wis., and from Pittsburg, Pa. Synod decided to accept the last named city for July, 1916.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

TOPPING WAR AT ITS SOURCE. A strike of far-reaching possibilities began in the Remington Arms Company's 102-acre plant at Bridgeport, Conn., on July 13, and shows signs of tying up both that and numerous ammunition factories. The trouble had an odd origin. Millwrights working the mammoth new building now under construction to accommodate the company's huge contracts from Europe, started to shuffling. The carpenters' union claimed that this was a "sod" job, whereupon the millwrights joined the union. But structural ironworkers then insisted that the job was iron work, and the millwrights should have joined their union. Ironwork pays $5 a day against $3.75 for carpenter work, so the millwrights were nothing loath. But the carpenters refused to let them go. So the unions clashed and stopped all work. The millwrights could not do iron work, and the ironworkers' union promptly found jobs elsewhere for most of the ironworkers who were pending the settlement of the dispute, and the result was a suspension of construction on the needed new buildings. Twenty-two factories have sub-contracts from the Remington company, and various other concerns are working on parts of arms or shells, all of whom would be closed if the chief plant could not take care of their output. Close on the heels of the trouble came news of a contemporary strike by all machinists of Bridgeport, in order to obtain an eight-hour day and minimum wage scale. The Remington company, through Major W. G. Penfield, U.S.A., head of the plant, at first refused to compromise with the unions, and for a time there were reports that the strike would extend first throughout New England and then, very possibly, to all munitions factories in this country. As the Christian Herald goes to press signs of a settlement are beginning to appear.

NOT A GOOD RUNNING START, ANYWAY. After twelve years of planning and negotiations, the five-million-dollar Field Museum of Natural History to be erected on Chicago's lake front was begun July 5. It is expected that the 3,000 workers will complete the structure, the largest of its kind in the world, inside of three years. The museum will rank with the greatest, and was made possible chiefly by a $9,500,000 bequest of the late Marshall Field for buildings and endowment.

RECORD AUTO RUN. It will be necessary to travel by automobile faster than 1,000 miles in 35 hours 42 minutes with 59 minutes for stops thrown in if you would beat the record recently made by E. J. Patterson of New York in a fast pleasure run from Chicago to New York in a Packard touring car, beating his own low record of 41 hours and 17 minutes for the distance of approximately 1,915 miles.

EARNINGS OF POSSIBLE VOLCANIC DISTURBANCE. Professor Malladra, director of the Volcanic Observatory on Vesuvius, with a party of the descended into the crater on July 13 to investigate recent signs of new activity. A lake of boiling lava was beneath the party, who conducted their investigations amid showers of cinders and deafening explosions. But the secret of the volcano they did not bring away.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT SAVER OF LIFE. Dr. Joseph A. Holmes, director of the Federal Bureau of Mines at Whittington, who died of tuberculosis at his home in Denver, Colo. on July 13, was a martyr to science, and may be said to have given his life to the cause of humanity. He was a recognized authority on geology and metallurgy. He served at various times as state geologist of North Carolina, president of the Geological Association of the same state, chief of the United States Geological Survey laboratories under President Roosevelt, and head of the newly created Bureau of Mines under President Taft. As an efficient public servant he had few equals. It is due to Dr. Holmes's efforts that great progress has been made in detecting life-saving devices in mines and in lessening the danger of mining disasters. The first national Mine Safety demonstration, held in Pittsburgh in 1911, was planned and carried on by him, and the mining managers and workers of the country owe him a debt of gratitude. His principal thought in these ten years or more of actual service was the protection of life and health among the miners. His last illness was brought on by overwork and exposure to unfavorable conditions.

PRISON FAILS TO PROTECT FRANK. A convicted murderer at the Georgia prison farm, Milledgeville, attacked Leo Frank, who is now serving a life sentence commuted from death penalty, partly severing his jugular vein and placing him in serious peril. His recovery is probable, but not certain, and he protests a strenuous wish to live in order to clear his name. Rumors outside the prison of plots to reach and kill Frank have recently caused the authorities to take precautions against such attempts. The attack is not necessarily connected with those rumors. Fellow prisoners of the two men saved Frank from being killed outright.

THE GOOD INVENTION BOARD DESERVES ANOTHER. The British Admiralty is creating an Invention Board similar to the one now being formed within our own Navy Department, to be composed of eminent scientists and inventors who will focus their talents on the production of devices for increasing the efficiency of the British navy. As in this country, the best known men are being invited to join this board.

THE DEMONSTRATION OF ENGLISH WOMEN. Undeterred by rain, some 30,000 women of all classes in England paraded through London on July 17, in order to impress upon the government their readiness and even their demand to be allowed to work in support of the war. Lloyd-George, minister of munitions, in addressing the women, declared that 80,000 had already registered in response to an appeal months ago by the Board of Trade. Fifty thousand women, he stated, were now working in the production of munitions. Approximately 90,000 women were previously engaged in agricultural work. He admitted that an immediate demand for women's services was unmistakable, and that the government would have to solve the problem of providing effective employment for the great numbers who were desirous to serve their country in this way. In closing his address he said that without women victory would be tarry, and victory which tarried meant victory whose footprints were footprints of blood. The suffrage leader, Mrs. Pankhurst, headed the parade. Thousands of banners were carried and hundreds of bands marched. The route was thronged with enthusiastic people.

RHODE ISLAND INVOLUNTARILY BOOSTS THE JITNEY. The state's entire trolley car service was at a standstill for a day or two when, on June 14 at midnight, the street car men's union called a strike because the company that operates the cars refused to accept the arbitrators appointed by the union to assist in settling the demands of the men for higher pay, abolition of hand fare collecting machines and other matters. The strike was eventually called off and the arbitration of the difficulties proceeded. In the meanwhile the jitney bus established itself high in the good will of the residents of Providence and other places. There was some violence during the strike.

THE EVIDENCE IN THE CASE OF THE NEBRASKAN

THE NEBRASKAN INCIDENT CLOSED. After official investigation of the circumstances attending the sinking of the American ship Nebraska on May 25 last, the German Government advises our government that a German submarine torpedoed the ship through unfortunate misapprehension of her nationality and character, the act not being intended against the American flag, and "the German Government expresses its regret for the occurrence to the Government of the United States of America and declares its readiness to make compensation for the damage thereby sustained by American citizens." At the time it was not certain whether the Nebraska had sunk or had been torpedoed. No lives were lost. Excepting for the adjustment of damage this incident, which threatened further to strain official relations with Germany, is now settled to the satisfaction of the American Government.

MACHINISTS SHOULD NOT PLAY WITH EDGED TOOLS. The advertisement of the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company in the American Machinist of May 6 is still worrying a good many people, the manufacturer and the publisher not excepted. The Washington Times declares that President Wilson on his return to Washington "is expected to direct the Department of Commerce to write a letter to the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company, sharply criticizing the officers of the concern for permitting the American Machinist to print" the advertisement in question. Wide spread attempts are being made by the culprits and their friends to prove that the advertisement does not mean what it says, and even does not say what it says; the perpetrator of this outrage claim that the advertisement does not say that the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company makes poisonous shells, or even that its machines will make them. Just a word as to this latter contention

(no one has ever said the Cleveland concern actually makes shells). The advertisement filled two facing pages, one of which contained a reproduction of blue prints of the advertised lathe, also of a "13-pounder high explosive shell" and an "18-pounder high explosive shell." The advertisement began as follows: "On the opposite page we show two sizes of high explosive shells which can be produced on our machine." Then: "On this machine we can finish a 13-lb. shell all over as it appears. . . ." (Appears where? on the opposite page? Of course.) "And the 18-lb. shell in thirty minutes." Then: "When you figure about one dollar a day for operating this machine you can then arrive at the actual cost for producing a piece. . . ." What piece? the shells showed on the opposite page? Of course. Then follows what the advertisers claim was merely a news item having nothing to do with their advertised product, and in the first paragraph of this news item they say: "The following is a description of the 13- and 18-lb. high explosive shells which are now being used so extensively in the war to replace common shrapnel." Yet they would have us believe that they are now talking of entirely different 13- and 18-lb. high explosive shells than those expensively reproduced "on the opposite page." If words mean anything they mean in this advertisement that the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company wished to attract buyers of its lathes by describing an inhuman piece of ammunition which their lathes could manufacture "at one dollar a day for operation." If sharp tools are good for anything it is for cutting, and not even machinists can safely play with sharp tools even when they are but words.

WE LOSE ONE MEXICAN.* General Pascual Orozco, who was arrested with General Huerta on July 2 at the border and released under $7,500 bonds, failed to appear to answer charges of conspiracy to violate our neutrality laws, and his bond was declared forfeited. In view of his capabilities for making mischief in Mexico, Orozco might better have been regarded in America as a desirable undesirable citizen, and been attached to us by stronger bonds. There is no important news of reliable character on developments in and about Mexico City as yet.

THE FLOOD IN CHINA. The first reports of the recent flooding of the district about Canton, including Shameen, an island in Canton Harbor where foreigners are localized, hardly did justice to the disaster. Shameen is under ten feet of water, according to advices, and elsewhere in the district thousands of natives have been drowned. Tens of thousands were forced to housetops for safety, and starvation set in on a wide scale. Two American gunboats have been rushed from Hongkong to the scene to render what relief they can. Fire did much additional damage in Canton. The American mission between Canton and Wuchow is reported as either destroyed or badly damaged. No Americans have been reported lost. Communication between the towns of the affected region was cut off by the floods, which are practically over all the province of Kwangsi, drained by the West River, now in flood. The distress caused to foreigners in China by this calamity is acute, while the native population is of course in utter misery throughout the flooded districts.

"HARVESTS AND DIPLOMACY." The following is an extract from an interesting item in the New York Evening Post: "During at least three months, all the world has been wondering why Rumania and Bulgaria did not make up their minds which side to take in the European struggle. Definite action has repeatedly been rumored, but nobody yet knows what the decision is. But, meantime, the people of both nations are harvesting the crops. Seventy per cent. of Bulgaria's inhabitants make their living from agriculture, and wheat alone makes up 20 per cent. of the country's exports. Rumania's annual export of cereal products is four times as great as its export of all other goods combined. In other words, the harvest is for these two states the national wealth. Under present conditions it is not only the basis of foreign credit in war time, but the sole assurance that army and people will be fed, in these days of European foodstuff scarcity. Why should Rumania and Bulgaria call their farm-hands to the front before the harvest, when they can wait as well as not? But this very fact makes the inquiry interesting, whether something will happen when the grain is secured in the bins. Even last year, the interval between the archduke's murder and the ultimatum to Serbia was harvest-time in Austria and Hungary."

NOTED EDITOR DIES. Dr. St. Clair McKelway, who had been editor-in-chief of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle for 31 years, died on July 16 at the age of 70. Dr. McKelway was widely known for his educational views as well as for his work as a journalist. He served on several papers before becoming the Eagle's editor, and his mind dominated the latter paper until illness and age compelled him to abandon editorial duties. He was a member in various societies, and several institutions of learning conferred high degrees upon him.

SUBMARINE ATTACKS WESTWARD-BOUND STEAMER. On her arrival at New York, officers and passengers of the Cunard liner Orduna told of an attack by a submarine while the vessel was off Queenstown, on the morning of July 9, just starting on her westward trip. There were 192 persons aboard, including 227 passengers, 21 of them Americans. The ship's officers were made aware of the attack when a lookout man, at 6:05 A.M. detected a torpedo, which passed just ten feet clear of the rudder. Eight minutes afterward the submarine came to the surface and gave chase to the steamer, which was then maneuvered to escape. Shells were fired after the Orduna, but without effect. Wireless calls for aid were sent out and a small armored yacht responded, but by the time she appeared the danger was over.

Diplomacy and Peace

DIPLOMATIC negotiations often try the patience of the American people. The exchange of notes between governments sometimes becomes a by-word, yet when such exchanges keep open the path of honorable peace they are to be borne with rather than criticized.

Mr. Bryan has been credited with saying that there is no last word between friends. Unfortunately, this is not so. Occasions sometimes arise when it is necessary for friends to say the last word to each other. This is when there is an absolute conflict of opinions, and when national honor is involved; although Mr. Taft, when he was President, took the ground that even questions of national honor could be made the subject of arbitration.

The benefit of prolonged diplomatic negotiations and exchange of notes is that sometimes they prevent the continuance of practices to which one nation may object although the other nation may be asserting theoretically its right to continue those practices. That is about the situation in regard to Germany's submarine warfare.

PRESIDENT WILSON is standing for certain principles. Germany, while not denying the abstract justice of those principles, is maintaining that the starvation policy adopted by Great Britain justifies their modification. In the meantime she sacrifices no more American lives in her submarine attacks, and the discussion of the general subject goes on.

In the heat of the controversy, sometimes it is lost sight of that the President, through the Department of State, is seeking to secure recognition of certain principles from Great Britain and the Allies as well as from Germany.

These principles relate to neutral commerce. They involve property rather than lives, and for that reason there is less popular indignation at their violation by the Allies, yet fundamentally the question is the same. If new doctrines concerning neutral commerce and neutral property can be set up, contravening all previous international usage and what was supposed to be international law, the same contention may be set up regarding the lives of neutrals.

Clouded as the issue has been, the simple fact is that both sets of belligerents have boldly set aside all the progress that it was supposed had been made in humanizing warfare at sea, and safeguarding neutral commerce and neutral lives.

ON THE part of Great Britain and the Allies, the bold assumption has been that their national necessities justified them in assuming complete control of the high seas. Their action in regard to neutral commerce has been based on the assumption that they ruled the ocean. The protests of the Scandinavian and other small neutral countries have been ignored. The protests of the United States have received more attention, because the United States is too powerful to be ignored. Nevertheless, the needs of the Allies, as England interprets them, have been the only rule of action that has been followed.

It also has been assumed that because certain practices were convenient for Great Britain they must therefore be convenient for the rest of the world. For example, in justifying the use of the American flag by British vessels, Great Britain explained that she permitted foreign countries to use her flag in order to escape capture by enemy vessels. She therefore assumed that this practice should be accepted. But Holland, which, while not as great a nation as England, is nevertheless a maritime nation, adopts the contrary rule. She expressly forbids the use of the flag of Holland, and takes steps to punish vessels which misuse the flag of the Netherlands.

England also has assumed to reverse the principle—which was supposed to be settled international law—that the burden of proof that a neutral vessel's cargo was contraband was upon the belligerent which sought to confiscate it. Instead, the assumption has been that the burden of proof of non-contraband cargo was on the neutral, and this assumption has been rigorously enforced.

AERICAN commerce has suffered from the action of the Allies in making their own needs the rule of interpretation of international law far more than it has benefited from supplying munitions. American industries, which have been paralyzed by the action of Great Britain in preventing the commerce in dyestuffs and other raw materials, have been subjected to a greater loss doubtless than has been gained by the industrial plants which make arms and ammunitions.

All these matters have been the subject of energetic diplomatic representation on the part of the United States to Great Britain and the Allies. The representations are still going on in the form of the exchange of diplomatic notes.

While some phases of the controversy are acute, and while the President finds it necessary to restate the position of the United States in very firm language, and while little apparent satisfaction is obtained, nevertheless no one has yet suggested that the United States break off diplomatic relations with Great Britain and France as a means of securing reparation.

If the controversy with England and France can be continued through the ordinary diplomatic channels, and the rights of neutral commerce be asserted satisfactorily without a diplomatic rupture, it would seem that the acute dispute with Germany might follow the same channels and keep to the paths of peace.

The Summons to Science

IN TAKING steps to create a Bureau of Invention and Development, our government has paid a somewhat belated tribute to science. America has given to the world many famous inventors; yet it is a matter of record that some of the greatest among them have met with scant encouragement at home and have been compelled to seek abroad that practical recognition which their discoveries were denied here. Many will recall the early experiments with the submarine boat of Simon Lake. Neglected here, the principle was taken up and developed abroad, and it has revolutionized modern warfare. Professor Langley's aerodrome and the "gliders" devised by the Wright brothers, regarded here as freaks, were the forerunners of the aerial navies which have opened a new realm of conquest unimagined till now. Even the great howitzers, progenitors of the giant ordnance that crushes the strongest fortresses, are also said to have been modeled after an American design which was not even seriously considered when submitted for approval some years ago.

And now our government has called a group of leading inventors to the service of the nation—among them Edison, Graham Bell, Peter Cooper Hewitt, Lewis Nixon, Simon Lake, John Hays Hammond and Orville Wright—in order that their united inventive genius may be at the country's disposal should it be needed. Science, however, which is simply trained and organized common sense, cannot be hurried. Those who have been disposed to interpret the administration's new step as a war measure will find themselves mistaken. These men of great talent cannot be urged and driven, like those who feed the flames of strife. Orville Wright says that two years at least will be needed to supply 2,000 aeroplanes for army and navy use, and that "it would be folly for the United States to engage in war today with any of the European powers, owing to our utter unpreparedness in the line of aeronautical equipment. We are far behind the rest of the world." The same verdict, though perhaps in somewhat different measure, may be looked for from the others. It is true that we have been so long at peace with all the world that we have lagged in the armed race; yet this is hardly a matter for regret, since on looking around us we see that those nations which are most fully prepared are invariably the first to become involved in war.

On the whole, therefore, there is nothing in the call of the scientists to disturb the country's tranquillity. It may be regarded rather as a step toward peace than war. They are conservative and whatever they do will be done with due deliberation. May their united efforts redound to the peace and welfare and prosperity of the American people.

"Religious Dementia"

DR. SUSAN A. PRICE, of Williamsburg, Virginia, at a recent gathering of medical experts in Chicago, is said to have declared that "religious dementia" is one of the worst disorders with which alienists and neurologists have to cope. She is reported further to have asserted that "church revivals, camp meetings and Billy Sunday revivals always bring an increase of those thus affected."

There is nothing new in this sort of talk. Long ago objectors said to One who spoke good words and did good deeds: "Thou hast a devil." A little later some disgruntled onlookers said of a group of people who had grown strangely and somewhat riotously happy after spending many days at prayer in the temple: "These men are full of wine." Still later, a Roman ruler cried out to a great enthusiast whom later centuries record as one of the master minds of the world: "Paul, thou art beside thyself!"

It has frequently been said that while many people die from sudden or prolonged grief it is seldom indeed that one dies from even a great and sudden joy. Just so the mental harm that may come to certain people through what some might consider "too much religion" is negligible compared to the mental harm done to people because they have too little religion. It is not religion that puts people into the insane asylums. Since that. As for the special claim that revival meetings and camp meetings increase "religious dementia," it is usually the case that if mental disorder seems to be produced by such gatherings it has really existed in the patient before and the religious excitement has simply given it outward expression; or some other form of mental disorder previously existing has been given a new twist by a religious emotion.

The immeasurable good wrought by evangelistic services, whether in mission halls, churches or tabernacle revivals or at camp meetings, cannot be offset by the suspicion that mental harm may come to a few.

But after all, there may be a wholesome warning for evangelists in this warning of the alienist. In evangelistic preaching as well as in the formal pulpit, we do not hear sufficiently the notes of joy and grace. Christ is the joy-bringer. The first fruits of the spirit are the "love, joy, peace." The Christian Church was born in the burst of joy that fell from heaven on Pentecost. The human soul hungers for joy and demands it. If America's groves could ring again with the notes of purling joy that broke from the lips of the multitudes who were blessed at the old-fashioned camp meetings; if our cities and towns could hear all more notes of praise from the lips of those who have been blessed in tent and tabernacle or in open air, there would come with the new and multiplied joy new peace, new clearness of vision, new sanity to face life's problems, new strength to lift its burdens, new hope to carry us through trials to the land of never-waning joy.

New Laws for Old

JUSTICE MILLER of the New York State Court of Appeals, writing for the court the opinions of cases involving the constitutionality of the recent Workmen's Compensation Act of that state, said:

This subject should be viewed in the light of modern conditions, not those under which the common law doctrines were developed. With the change in industrial conditions and the development of a new system of providing compensation for industrial injuries to employees, as a substitute for wasteful and protracted damage suits, usually unjust in their results either to the employer or the employee, and sometimes to both.

While it is matter for congratulation that the Workmen's Compensation Act has thus been upheld, there is cause for still greater satisfaction if another jurist has publicly recognized the fact that our present system of common law was developed under conditions which no longer prevail. It is one of the most serious tasks of the present day to modify and interpret these laws which have been inherited from another age that they shall adequately meet the practical needs of the complex life we are living today.

There is scarcely a town or village in the United States in which there are not some tragic stories of lost life or maimed bodies, a widow left desolate and impoverished, children fatherless and unprovided for, because the law has not made adequate provision for compensating the workman and his family for injuries received at his work.

Justice Miller's suggestion that the whole question of compensating laborers for such injuries, or their families in case of their death, should be dealt with in the light of present and practical needs is most wholesome and is an added note of promise that the time is drawing near when justice and reason shall take the place of tradition and prejudice long enthroned.

Another Yellowstone Park Robbery

THREE highway robbers held up twenty-five tourists in the Yellowstone Park the other day and took their money from them. It is claimed that the men who committed the crime have been caught. Just about a year before, in July, 1914, one man held up a score of stage coaches and robbed the passengers. The first robbery caused great indignation, and an appeal was made to the government authorities for better police protection. The repetition of this crime arouses still deeper indignation and the demand that the authorities give a better guarantee of safety. Such things as black blotches on the sublimity and beauty of the scene where "every prospect pleases, and only man is vile." They also tend to spoil with alarm the enjoyment of one of the most glorious trips on earth. In 1891 our system of national parks began; now there are thirty of them. The system began with President Harrison by proclamation set aside a part of the present Yellowstone as the first national park. It comprises 2,142,775 acres, and, including the surrounding forest reservations, it covers eight million acres. The summit of the Rockies, the canyon of the Yellowstone, the gorgeous geysers, the hot springs, the geysers and other things are beyond the power of words to express. From the earliest times there have been highwaymen who have taken away property by force. Christ makes reference to them: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves." (Luke 10: 30.)

Bomb-Throwing

THE insecurity of human life in America is appalling. In some cities there is a murder every month, in others one a week, and in one of the cities it is claimed that there is a homicide for every day in the year. A few years ago the throwing of a bomb was the rarest event; now it is a crime so common as to occasion little notice or comment. The summit of criminal audacity was reached when one of these diabolical, death-dealing machines was set off in the national Capitol at Washington to deceive and defile it, and a few days afterward one was exploded in the police headquarters in New York in the room underneath the Detective Bureau, causing much material damage. Fortunately, no loss of life resulted in either case. The explosion at the New York police headquarters was significant, as it occurred the day after the anniversary of the death of Arthur Caron, who was blown to pieces by a bomb he had made for the destruction of some rich men against whom he had a grievance. The authorities ought to be more vigilant and firm and put an end to this form of crime. Of such the Book says: "Their works are works of iniquity, and the act of violence is in their hands." (Isa. 59: 6.)

Dyestuffs in this Country

GERMANY, having reached the perfection of art in the manufacture of dyestuffs, furnished this country with most of those products used here. The sudden war left the United States with little or no dyestuff and with no provision for manufacturing. The United States is undertaking to use coal tar products to supply the need, with little success thus far. Before the coal dyes were invented, the people took the bark, the roots, the nuts and wood of trees and made dyes not so brilliant as the aniline, but good enough for practical purposes. For some of the colors necessity may drive the manufacturers back to the forests for their supply of material. Yellow coloring matter is produced from the yellow oak, which secretes it in the thin layer under the bark; and from the butternut found in the Northern Southern and some of the Western states. Dyes are also made from the black walnut, whose shade is darker; from the roots, bark and wood of the Osage orange; from the staghorn sumac (used in coloring leather) and the locust, much like the tree in China which gives such a brilliant yellow to their silk. Red dyes have been produced from the alder since the dawn of history, while the dogwood roots yield perhaps the most brilliant American dye, which the Indian warriors used to color their eagle feathers and buckskin clothes. Other colors are found in different trees. If the war shall continue long enough (which may God forbid) it may be expected that American genius and enterprise will find coloring matter in the old substances, and will also discover new sources of supply for the national need. Dyes were in practical use among the ancient Hebrews. There is this reference to it: "And this is the offering which ye shall take of them: blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and rams' skins dyed red." (Ex. 25: 3-5.)

GOVERNMENT FISHERMEN'S FLOATING HOSPITAL.

UNDER an act of Congress, the United States coast guard cutter Androscooguin was fitted up as a hospital ship. Early in January, sailed from the Boston Navy Yard for the fishing banks of the North Atlantic. The ocean hospital, first advocated by Dr. Thomas W. Salmon of the Marine Hospital Service, is provided with every essential for efficient medical and surgical treatment. The medical part of the ship is under the care of a commissioned officer of the Public Health Service, Surgeon D. W. Cox. Patients requiring long treatment are transferred to hospitals in Halifax, Portland, Gloucester and Boston. Heretofore a French hospital ship has been sent to care for the French fishermen in the North Atlantic, and has cared for our sick and wounded fishermen also. Now the war is on and the French ship cannot appear, and our American hospital ship will in turn take care of the French fishermen who are prostrated by disease or injury. More and more nations as well as individuals, in the progress of medical and surgical care, are copying the spirit and example of the Great Physician of whom it was said: "And he healed all that were sick." (Matt. 8: 16.)

Burns Trying to Save Mother

IT IS seldom that so pathetic a story is told as that of Catharine Reiss, who died in the hospital at Jersey City the other day. The mother uncorked a naphtha bottle near a lighted oil stove, and the explosion set fire to her clothes. The little daughter, only four years old, ran to aid her mother, and with her baby fingers tried to beat out the fire and even tried to unbutton the mother's dress and take it off her. The dress of the little pet caught fire, and she was burned to death. The mother may recover, though there is fear she will not. What heroism, so like the Christ! What love, so like his kingdom! Who wonders that Christ said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." (Mark 10: 14.)

Indian West Point Cadet

SYLVESTER LONGLANCE is the first full-blood Cherokee Indian to receive an appointment to the West Point Military Academy. President Wilson recently named him as one of the six presidential appointees to the academy. Mr. Longlance was graduated from the Manlius, New York, school recently, having graduated also at the Carlisle Indian School. What a sad mistake the white man made in his treatment of the Indian race! The educated Indian is a splendid specimen of American manhood; the converted Indian makes an excellent Christian. The cadet Longlance is likely to be heard from at West Point, and to make a good defender of the republic. The race problem has been settled by the fact of the Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man thus announced by the apostle Paul: "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." (Acts 17: 26.)

Wonderful Church in Africa

THOSE pessimists who think the Christian Church has been stricken with paralysis, and those who do not believe in foreign missions, would do well to read the story of the church at Elati, West Africa, which was organized by the Presbyterians only a dozen years ago, and which now has a membership of 2,297. It has two catechumen classes, one of 2,000 and one of 19,000. "It has 15,000 contributors, who pay by envelope. The convert must do three things: give up his fetish, pay his debts, and give up his surplus wives. Last year 7,500 persons confessed Christ, 500 of whom were won by native workers. At one communion there were 8,000 in attendance. The contributions of these Elati Presbyterians during the year amounted to $2,500 in gold. The church at Elati supports 107 evangelists and Bible-readers. It supports the teachers of some seventy village schools, in which there are 4,000 pupils, and it pays half the expenses of the station boarding-school with 900 students." It should not be forgotten that the home church, despite its weakness and sins, had love for God and fellow man, and devotion to Christ complete enough to send the very people from the United States to found that very church at Elati, and that the wonderful church is the result of obedience to this command of the Master: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Mark 16: 15.)

Work and Red Pepper

REV. DR. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON preached a sermon recently, which is full of his usual insight and common sense. The paragraph of it here quoted will meet a response in the heart of every one acquainted with the subject. He says, "As to ministers not being as interesting as they ought to be, the accusation must be confessed to have, at least in many instances, solid foundations.

But no one ought to expect a man who preaches ten or twenty years in the same pulpit to be so fascinating as a man who preaches a few weeks. Novelty is one of the elements of charm, and a stranger has a freshness which the settled pastor cannot have. But even a blazing and corruscating evangelist would become tame enough if compelled to face the same congregation for a dozen years. Soon his freshness would wither, his strings of glittering adjectives would fail to stir, his amazing periods would lose their magic, and he would become very like the dry-as-dust performances now criticized so severely. The red-pepper type of evangelist is the shortest lived of them all. There are not many geniuses in the pulpit, but there are as many there as one finds in medicine, or law, or business, or teaching, or literature. After all, God does not seem to be dependent on brilliant men. The world gets on by the plodding fidelity of men who have intelligence enough to see what they ought to do, and have grace enough to do it. To expect every minister, or half the ministers, or one minister in five to equal an exceptional evangelist of many and extraordinary gifts, is as foolish as to find fault with poets because they do not write like Browning or Tennyson. . . . A little pepper will go a long way, and is useful. The peppery men and the plodders have their place in the ministry, according to Christ's appointment: "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." (Eph. 4: 11.)

1 KINGS 12: 1-24

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." Prov. 16: 18.

"By pride fell the angels." They aspired to usurp the eternal throne, and were plunged into the nethermost abyss. It was thus that man also fell. Did not Satan whisper, "Ye shall be as gods"? It was the leap upward that overleaped itself, and fell under the bondage of corruption and the curse. The child refuses to take the father's hand on the slippery ice, and falls with inevitable outcry. The boy swims on bladders far beyond his depth and is almost drowned. The man vaunts his immunity from the swinish lusts that engulf his fellows, and is entangled by them. Nebuchadnezzar, Wolsey, Napoleon Bonaparte, and others who have vaunted themselves above their fellows have left their endorsement of these words on the page of history: "Those that walk in pride He is able to abase." You must come down from your high standing on Mount Ebal, where the curse broods, if you would escape the scathing lightning and the annihilating thunderbolt. You can only ascend Gerizim, the mountain of Blessing, by descending into the intervening valley. You must descend before you can ascend. You are only safe at the foot of the Cross. The broken and contrite heart is the home of God's Spirit. It is through the grave alone that you reach the ascension heights.

A Bloodless Revolution

By Arthur H. Howland

REVOLUTIONS are always interesting. They mean something. That is one of the deepest horrors of this present war—that so far as outsiders can see it doesn't mean anything. And the indications are that even the men who are killing and getting killed have no clear idea what it is all about. They have simply been set to work butchering one another and they are doing it efficiently.

But a revolution is different. Rebels know what they are fighting for. Certain conditions exist which they do not like and they set out to put an end to them; certain things must be won, and they set out to win them. If what is wanted can be achieved without bloodshed so much the better. Some reforms are worth bleeding for, but if sought for diligently enough a bloodless way could usually be found.

Rehoboam certainly brought upon his own head the disaster which overtook him. It is thrilling to read this narration of a righteous rebellion which took place so long ago. It is the ever-new demand of democracy. It was the cry of Moses to Pharaoh, the labor despot of Egypt who knew the value of slave brick-makers: "Let my people go!" it was the dictum of the barons to King John; it was the ultimatum of Oliver Cromwell to Charles the First; it was the threat of the French revolutionists to Louis XVI; it was the defiance of the American colonies to Great Britain; it was the same cry which we hear in our own day—in Colorado, at Calumet, at Roosevelt, New Jersey, wherever the people, the toilers, get together to plead or to demand, "Make our heavy yoke lighter!" It is the cry which stirred the soul of Jesus and led him to exclaim: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

Fortunately this revolution was bloodless, except that one of the king's commissioners, Adoram, was slain. But when Rehoboam got ready his army of a hundred and eighty thousand warriors a man of God came to him with the stern and lucid words: "Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel. Return every man to his house; for this thing is from me." What might have happened if last summer there had been in every one of the European nations bent on war one mighty man of God who would have thundered forth with a divine authority which could not be questioned nor withstood the very words which Shemaiah spoke to Rehoboam and his council: "Ye shall not fight against your brethren!"

The sad thing about this revolution is that after all it accomplished nothing. We shall see in next week's lesson how Jeroboam, the valiant and faithful leader of the people today, becomes their betrayer tomorrow, leading them away from God and the right. So the first French Revolution failed; so the Balkan courage came to naught two years ago, when the allies of one glorious campaign turned their swords at one another's throats a few weeks later and lost almost all the gains of their splendid victories against the Turks. Success is dangerous. After victory—humility. That is the safe way.

The lessons of our Bible study today are very clear: (1) The folly of oppressing the people. See how Solomon with all his first promise and all his later pomp really failed because he was unjust. He did not understand what it really means to be the leader of a people. He reigned for his own advantage rather than the advantage of the people and so lost for his descendants all but a small portion of his kingdom. (2) The fairness and trustworthiness of the people and of popular demands. This chapter is a first-class study in democracy. "The voice of the people is the voice of God." True government is by the consent of the governed. The only government which can stand is government of the people, for the people, by the people. (3) The importance of choosing wise counsel. (4) The folly of neglecting the wisdom of the past. (5) The harm of evil and foolish companions. (6) The cruelty of wealth and power. (7) The advantage of being prepared, as Jeroboam was, for a great crisis when one's services may be required suddenly and one's capacities put to sudden test. (8) The real and invincible power of the people against any sort of political or financial power when they are willing to stand together. (9) The possibility of getting guidance for national affairs direct from God so that disaster may be averted.

The Lesson in Life

By Amos R. Wells

IT IS very interesting to read the history of our Civil War, noting the fortunes of the various generals. Each has his chance. Each uses it with various degrees of ability or weakness. Each of those in supreme command meets with reverses and fails to satisfy the hopes of the nation. Each in turn is superseded by another upon whom the expectations and prayers of the nation settle. But all this time in the West a quiet, forceful man is winning victory after victory, rising slowly but steadily, until his elevation to the chief position is inevitable, and U. S. Grant finally leads the Union forces to success. Thus Jeroboam, exiled and almost forgotten in Egypt, is remembered when the need for him arises, is called back home, becomes the leader of the revolution, and speedily is made king of the greater part of the nation. Make yourself a leader, and the opportunity for leadership will soon come to you.

Baltimore's most prosperous factories were to close because the owner could not find a suitable partner to run it. He was worn out and must have a rest. He had made all the money he needed, and was prepared, for lack of a partner, to let his great business die a natural death. That is what a yoke implies—partnership. That is the secret of the failure of Solomon: he should have borne one end of the yoke, but he left all rest on the people. If he had borne one end, the people would not have rebelled. That is why working with Christ is so delightful, why his yoke is easy; he carries one end, the heavy end. It is a true partnership.

Rehoboam followed his father's proverb: "In the multitude of counselors there is safety," but he failed to observe the implication that the counsel should be wise, or at least that the man receiving it should be wise enough to choose out the wise from the unwise advice. We are learning that there is such a thing as too much counsel, leading into confusion of opinion and shifting of responsibility. Carrying out this thought, no fewer than 368 American cities have adopted the plan of commission government, placing the city control in the hands of a very few men, instead of the multiplied boards and councils of the past. Some of these have even gone farther and have engaged one man as city manager, with almost autocratic powers. In this case, Rehoboam should not have taken counsel. He should have seen that the request of the people was just and right, and have granted it on the spot. The counsel of Solomon's old advisers reminds one of the answer made by a boy who had been fishing all day and was asked about the result. "I haven't caught many fish," he said, "but I've drowned lots of worms." The advice was that Rehoboam should drown his real meaning in a flood of gracious words. He was to "speak them fair" but mean them foul. He was to promise with no intention of performing. Very likely these counselors had fooled the people in that way for years. The art still flourishes among modern politicians.

The advice of the young counselors jumped rather with the temper of youth. To adopt a current metaphor, they urged the young king to use "the big stick." "Be frank," they advised. "You mean to rule; say so. The people are born to submit; tell them so. Put down the upstarts. Send them back to their kennels." The two sets of advisers remind of Chatham's strong pleas for the American colonists in their protests before the Revolution, and on the other hand of the contemptuous rejection of those pleas by the Earl of Sandwich. King George openly censured Chatham, and Sandwich moved that Chatham's bill for colonial relief be "rejected now and forever," which was done. The government of Great Britain took the step which practically all the empire has regretted ever since. They answered the Americans as Rehoboam answered the revolutionists under Jeroboam.

The division of the kingdom as a result of Rehoboam's foolish decision was greatly to be regretted, but not so much to be regretted as would have been the servile yielding to Rehoboam. If the northern kingdom, born in a love of justice and freedom, had proceeded in the fear and love of God, the southern kingdom would soon have come over to its side and there would have been one nation again. Separation is never to be mourned when one party separates to the right, though it must leave the other party behind; but it is tragic when neither party goes to the right.

INTERNATIONAL LORD'S DAY CONGRESS

LEADERS, educators, religious leaders and scientists of America and of twenty-one foreign countries together with ex-Secretary of State Bryan; Judge Alton B. Parker of New York; Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson; Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall and the governor of a half dozen states, by special invitation of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, will attend the International Lord's Day Congress which will be held in Oakland from July 27 to August 1. President Wilson is honorary president of the organization whose chief aim is directed toward the reduction of Sunday labor in all continuous industries. Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels has written a paper on the "Sunday Schedule for the United States Navy" to be read at one of the sessions. Judge Elbert H. Gary, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation, will have a paper dealing with the minimum work on Sunday in the iron and steel industry. Sunday labor in the trades, professions and all so-called continuous industries will be discussed with a view to inaugurating a world-wide campaign for the abolition of unnecessary toil on the Sabbath day.

The delegates are expected to number into the thousands. Five sectional conferences will be held. Sunday excursions and theatrical performances; commercialized Sunday amusements; saloons, business and "general apathy," are classed as the foes of Sunday rest laws and are some of the subjects which are expected to develop vigorous arguments.

With nearly all the world at war, it is encouraging to note that of the 825 conventions and congresses meeting in and about San Francisco during the year, a large proportion are religious in character, revolving about the central idea of peace on earth.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S TOPICS FOR AUGUST 8

How Can We Promote the Temperance Reform?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. (Eph. 4: 14-21)

INVITATION.

Agitation.
Organization.
Determination.

These are the elements of temperance work. Clear the saloons out of your locality, township or county; to secure state-wide prohibition in your state if it has not already been voted to work for local option in your state; if the direct fight for prohibition is not yet on; to keep the voters of your community to bring the pressure to bear upon your congressional and senatorial vote for a Federal prohibition amendment—these are the definite tasks to be done.

Each of the actual work that must be done in your community to drive out the saloon is work that young people can hardly do. It is a work for seasoned men—a work of detecting violations of law, of compelling the authorities to act against violators, of telling plain, blunt facts to the voters of a community about what the saloon does and about the sort of moral infirmity which goes with it.

If you can make your father or your brother feel very uncomfortable if they are on the wrong side of the fight or if they are negligent and half-hearted in standing by the right side.

Find out all you can about alcohol, what it is and what it does. Get, for instance, copies of Congressman Hobson's speech to Congress, and bombard your friends and neighbors with them.

Working as Christians, keep the Christian viewpoint, the Christian motive, the Christian insistence. We are against this thing because it is destroying, not only communities and homes, but souls; we are against it because it robs a man of the image of God; it drives him away from Christ; it makes his soul incapable of containing the Holy Spirit; it prevents him of being of use in establishing Christ's kingdom on earth.

My Favorite Bible Character and Why

Epworth League Topic (Heb. 11: 32-34)

OF COURSE, this topic means your favorite character aside from the incomparable Christ. And by the way, it would be well worth while in this meeting to have some one read Sidney Lanier's great poem, "The Crystal Christ."

There is not room even to mention the various characters who might be chosen as your character's favorite. Ask a number of the members before the meeting to decide who their favorite character is, and to come prepared to defend their champion against the others.

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

MR. E. A. P., NEW YORK. We have never heard of a "guaranteed mortgage" paying 6 per cent., and if we should hear of such an offering we should not recommend it.

MISS L. M., INDIANA. The Prudential Life Insurance Company and the New York Life Insurance Company are two of the soundest and biggest insurance companies in the world, and a policy in either company is as good as gold. Both companies have general agents in your city.

MRS. G. D. B., COLORADO. We can give approval to an investment in any of the three following bonds, namely: Brooklyn Rapid Transit Secured Coupon Notes, of 1918, at par, to yield about 5 per cent. Brooklyn Union Elevated first five, at 1950, at par, to yield about 5 per cent. Interborough Rapid Transit first refunding five, 98, to yield 5.12 per cent.

REV. H. W. S., WASHINGTON. Boulder Tungsten mining stock can be called no more than a highly speculative venture with infinitely more chances against it than in its favor. Fourteen thousand, nine hundred and ninety-nine mining prospects in every 15,000 fail to earn dividends. H. L. Barber is under indictment for using the mails to defraud investors in the sale of oil stock.

MRS. J. H. H., NEW YORK. The first and refunding 5 per cent. bonds of the Federal Telephone and Telegraph Company are very speculative, and are quoted by Buffalo brokers at 60 bid, 65 offered. The 7 per cent. preferred stock is even more speculative. The stock has a par value of $100 a share, and is quoted at $8 bid, $10 offered. No dividends are paid. It has always been strange to us why this company did not make a better showing in earnings.

MISS C. K. S., OHIO. While a $500 United Light and Railway Company first and refunding 5 per cent. gold bond pays but 5 per cent. it can be bought at the present time, owing to the unsettled market conditions which affect all public utility bonds, at a price which will enable the holder to realize a net income slightly exceeding 6 per cent. interest. This bond has a broad and active market with close quotations.

W. S. R., PENNSYLVANIA. It has been alleged that the failure of the American Temperance Life Insurance is due to extravagances, including salaries paid to the officers. One of the real reasons for the concern's troubles probably is found in the fact that it was an assessment company. Life insurance based upon the assessment plan has proven in many cases to be unsound.

MRS. E. C. T., IOWA. Under the conditions specified in your letter we advise you to invest your $1,850 as follows: One $1,000 Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Transcontinental Short-Line 1st gold 4 per cent. bond at 81 1/4, and one $1,000 United States Steel Corporation sinking fund 5 per cent. bond at 101 1/2. The return from your investment will be 4.82 per cent. Both bonds have a broad and steady market.

G. J., MISSISSIPPI. We have your letter with the enclosed letter from Mr. James Doyle. Mr. Doyle is candid at least. Mark Twain said that a gold mine was a "hole in the ground with a lot of knaves around it." Twain had the faculty of forcibly saying the truth. Perhaps, however, if Twain had seen the Doyle Consolidated Mine he would not have put this property in his general classification. The Doyle stock is quoted at two shares for a cent.

MISS I. W., NEW JERSEY. Southern Railway ended the fiscal year with gross business below last June of fully $150,000, while the gross loss in the fiscal year is about $8,600,000. This does not look very encouraging for the stockholders. Still we do not believe that you will gain anything by selling your shares now. The stock is exceedingly inactive, and the market's quoted value upon Southern Railway preferred is quite a bit lower, we believe, than the stock's intrinsic worth. We should advise you to hold for better prices.

W. L. S., PENNSYLVANIA. (1) Florence Consolidated Mining and Leasing Company's stock was quoted at fifty cents bid, fifty-three cents asked. No dividends are being paid at present. (2) Black Hills Copper Company, Ltd., of Arizona is reported in the Copper Handbook, "Idle, owing to lack of funds. Property well located. Favorably considered if put in charge of competent engineer." There is no market for the stock. (3) Peerless Bullfrog Mining Company stock and Temps Consolidated Company stock are valueless.

T. R., NEW JERSEY. You state that you have six thousand dollars to invest, interest from which will be almost your sole support. You tell us your money must be invested so that it will be "absolutely safe." There is no absolutely safe investment. The higher rate of interest you seek the farther away you get from comparative safety. The first mortgage bonds of time-tried, successful public service corporations are indicated as about the best sort of security for your investment under the conditions which you name.

MISS E. W., PENNSYLVANIA. Under no circumstances would we advise you to put money into the Lackawanna Coal and Lumber Company. Regarding this company and all of the twenty-odd "Foster" companies there have been recent sensational exposures made in the newspapers. Unfortunately, however, these exposures have been made rather late in the day. The Department of Investment Counsel of the Christian Herald has repeatedly warned its readers to keep out of the "Foster" schemes. You state you have a thousand dollars to invest. You would do well to investigate the investment offerings made to our readers through our financial advertising columns.

J. F. G., PENNSYLVANIA. (1) While New York, Ontario and Western general 4s are a second mortgage bond, being a second lien on all the property covered by the refunding gold 4s, and are therefore not as strong a security as the latter, they are, nevertheless, considered thoroughly secure. The general 4s are quoted at 78, while the refunding gold 4s are quoted at 82. The range of prices the latter bond for 1915: high, 82 1/4; low 75 1/2. (2) Hudson and Manhattan refunding 5s are a semi-speculative bond not to be recommended as a conservative investment. These bonds are selling at 72 1/2. The range of prices for 1915 is, high 79 1/2, low 72. (3) The Hudson and Manhattan Railroad is owned by no other company. It is a tub standing on its own bottom. It has a traffic arrangement with the Erie and Pennsylvania railroads, but this in no wise affects its corporate entity.

REV. A. D., WASHINGTON. You take us to task for an alleged attack on the "system of Telepost," and state: "A leading United States senator, of whom I sought advice as to the feasibility of my holding on to Telepost stock, writes: 'If I owned any Telepost stock shares I would certainly hold them as being a good investment.'" The Christian Herald has never argued against the "system of telepost." We have never commented on the invention in any way. The fact is, we believe the telepost a remarkable contrivance. But that has nothing whatever to do with the matter in hand. If you prefer to take the advice of a United States senator in preference to the advice of the financial editor of the Christian Herald it is obvious that you are at perfect liberty to do so. If any one desires to call Telepost stock an investment he may do so, of course. We shall still regard it very much otherwise.

D. M. J., RHODE ISLAND. It is estimated that the various companies promoted by T. J. Foster, the creator of the International Correspondence Schools, number over a score, and have a combined capitalization of approximately $150,000,000. About $50,000,000 is believed to have been paid in by innocent investors who stand to lose a major portion of the money involved. The companies are: International Textbook Company, Technical Supply Company, Mines and Minerals Company, International Educational Publishing Company, International Correspondence Schools, International Poultry Sales Company, International Land Company, North Electric Street Railway Company, Seranton and Binghamton Railway Company, Victor Typewriter Company, Hover Incubator Manufacturing Company, Lackawanna Coal and Lumber Company, Lackawanna Coal and Land Company, Coal Lands Securities Company, DuPont Railway Company, Tippecanoe Securities Company, Crescent Coal Company, Paint Creek Collieries Company, National Limestone Company, Red River Land Development Company, United Stores Association of Philadelphia, Lackawanna Securities Company, Enterprise Coal Company and the Seranton Life Insurance Company. In addition, Foster recently organized a Domestic Science branch of the school business with a capital of $20,000,000, but did not have time to dispose of much of this stock. We are indebted to the Financial World for this list.

SERBIA'S STRUGGLE WITH PLAGUE

WORK in our hospital has been all volunteer, because in Serbia we have no trained nurses. Of course, through three wars, these volunteer nurses gained a great deal of experience; but volunteers can never replace the trained nurses. I remember the day when we received the first wounded.

It was in the heat. Our hospital has about 1,400 beds. Can you imagine the difficulties when not really organized? Well, there was a good deal of confusion when all these men were brought in as it is very difficult to run a hospital with inexperienced help. We had only one section. This man had to work day and night, sometimes till three or five in the morning. He had to work overtime. Because you know it is when a man is not operating promptly.

The most serious operations were performed without anesthetics. We were short of everything. When I sent the wounded to have fresh dressing, they were returned because there was no cloth to make bandages. Sometimes the bandages from wounded soldiers were taken away and then used for the more serious cases. In my ward I had about forty beds. But that doesn't mean that I had forty patients. I sometimes had fifty and sixty. One of the beds was used for three soldiers. The bed contains a straw sack mattress and a small sack as a pillow. Sometimes soldiers had to lie on these beds for weeks.

It was terrible when typhus broke out; it is worse even than a battle. Typhus is a plague against which you cannot take any preventive measures. I have many friends in Serbia who have died of it, including seven or eight relatives. The lady in charge of the hospital where I was working died of typhus. The son of the first vice-president of the Red Cross died. And there are many other people dying with the same dread disease. Whenever I get a letter from home, I receive quite a lot of people who have died. My own doctor died of typhus. Even people who take every precaution get this awful disease. Think of people crowding together in one room, when the conditions are such as exist today! At the gates of the hospitals there are hundreds of typhus cases, demanding admittance. Sometimes for hours they wait, thinking they can be received, longs war, since men are repaired that they may go forth to fight again. So Professor Pupin, the prime mover in the affair, conceived the idea of taking these people back to their farms.

FACILITIES for moving merchandise in Serbia have been limited to the venerable ox-cart. Railroads were out of the question. The chassis of twenty-five small automobiles were brought, it being the purpose to build up the back of the cars with platforms to increase their carrying capacity in the transport of various kinds of supplies. Then came the call for twenty-five responsible men who could run the cars, as well as generally supervise the transportation work, and this call was filled immediately by Columbia student volunteers. The next difficulty to overcome was that of the Serbian language. Interpreters were necessary and a call from the consul's office for twenty-five to accompany the expedition brought over 300 applications from all over the country. Among the interpreters are machinists, chauffeurs, cooks, tailors and grocers; and among the students are P. and S. men, sanitary engineers, journalists, New York State militiamen and some licensed chauffeurs.

Particular caution was taken to guard against infection from disease. Each member had to pass a medical examination and have his teeth put in order. A disinfecting machine and a water-distilling apparatus are a part of the equipment. Dr. Harry Plotz of the Mount Sinai Hospital, New York, discoverer of typhus anti-toxin, sailed with this expedition. Five large tents will house the men at Nish, and it is planned to make the camp as complete and serviceable as possible. Although associated with the Red Cross, the expedition will still maintain its own identity. Provision for the commissariat and for camp sanitation has been made and preliminary division of the party into working squads has already been arranged.

COLUMBIA PARTY ABOARD THE THEMISTOCLES

that they will get a bed, or at least a little bit of straw. Very often they die right there in front of the hospital.

I talked to some doctors going out to Serbia, and they said the way to stop the spread of this dreadful disease was to disinfect the houses, burn the clothing, burn the furniture, and, if need be, even the village itself should be burned. This disease is raging among non-combatants as well as soldiers. We are sending people out to certain concentration camps in cases where their homes have been burned. The Serbian Government has no means for providing hospitals for women and children.

(MILLIE) HELEN LOZANITCH.

College Men Sail to Help Serbia

COLUMBIA College songs, the Star-Spangled Banner and Serbian patriotic airs formed a part of the enthusiasm aboard the steamship Themistocles of the National Steam Navigation Company of Greece on June 26, when twenty-five students of the university sailed for Serbia to aid in the work of ridding that country of typhus and other diseases.

To repair wounded soldiers is a humane task, but it is one that pro-

AMONG THE WORKERS

THE FIRST FEDERATED CHURCHES CAMPAIGN in North Pasadena, Calif., was conducted by Ben Ostrom and his helpers, Albert Simpson Reith and Mr. and Mrs. A. W. McKee, last month. The enlisting of one hundred and forty-three young men and women, volunteering to preach the Gospel or devote themselves as missionaries, was a telling feature.

—ANGELIST HARRISON MITCHELL, Pine Grove, Calif., a worker of fifteen years' experience and an ordained minister of the M. E. Church, will conduct evangelistic services with- out charge in any community desiring the same. Entertainment must be provided.

THE SEVENTH SUMMER of Gospel work at the Boardwalk Church (undenominational), Atlantic City, is now under way. Rev. Robert A. Elwood, of the Presbyterian Church, still in charge as the founder and pastor. This work is conducted in a theater alongside one of the most famous pleasure promenades in the country.

EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGAN are meeting with splendid success in tabernacle work in Wisconsin. A great spiritual awakening has blessed Green Bay (which is the oldest city in Wisconsin). The tabernacle is often crowded beyond its capacity, and the interest has spread to nearby towns. During the five weeks there were about 1,500 conversions and about 500 consecrations of church members who had grown cold and drifted. A delegation of 145 people of Racine, Wis., chartered a special train and traveled a total distance of 222 miles to Green Bay. The evangelistic party held a meeting with the Indians at Oneida Reservation, and thirty responded to the call.

EVANGELIST BOB JOHNSON has conducted some unusually successful campaigns in Pennsylvania recently. One weekly church prayer meeting increased from 30 to 400; one Sunday school increased from 350 to 750, and a men's Bible class to 342; another Sunday school from 500 to over 900. In Brookville, a town of 3,003 population, on the closing night 813,175 was raised as a foundation for a Y. M. C. A. building, in a few days increased to $41,157.

complains of the summer. She weakens her clothes by boiling them, and spends washday in an atmosphere of ill-smelling steam and unbearable heat.

Mrs. Progress

right next door, always looks cool and comfortable, because she uses Fels-Naptha Soap on washday and every other day.

Mrs. Oldway does all her soap-and-water housework in the hard-scrub, boiling-water, most-work way.

Three times a day she washes her dishes in scalding water, making herself uncomfortable, hot and unhappy.

On washday, Mrs. Progress puts her clothes to soak with Fels-Naptha Soap. After they have soaked and she has rested and cooled off from getting breakfast cleared away, it is an easy matter to lightly rub out the dirt with her hands or on the washboard.

By early afternoon the clothes are in the sun, but she is resting in a cool, darkened room, before she prepares supper for the family.

Which would you rather? Do your work quickly, easily and comfortably like Mrs. Progress, or be always tired out, overworked and overheated like Mrs. Oldway?

Fels-Naptha makes the difference—why not use it for all your household soap-and-water work?

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

"I WISH to acknowledge answer to prayer for my orphan niece who has come back to her Saviour, and says she is going to devote her life to him," writes N. W. C. G. W. N., San Marcos, Texas, writes: "I am glad to report what seems to be a miracle. In May I asked prayers for the recovery of my sister, who was taken sick in February of pneumonia and who had three relapses, as well as being partially paralyzed, and whose recovery was despaired of by her husband and many others. She is now up and around as usual. God be praised for answering prayers."

A joyful mother writes: "I desire to express my gratitude for answered prayer. I firmly believe my son was restored to me by answered prayer, after an absence of ten years." Mrs. C. H. writes: "Five years ago I was in despair and began praying, sometimes almost without hope. Now my prayers are answered in an altogether different way than I ever thought of and much better than I dreamed of, and I have a great happiness. Love and prayer are the two greatest things in the world." Mrs. F. H.: "With deep gratitude I write to acknowledge God's answer to prayer sent to the League for a satisfactory sale of a business. The prayer has been answered, and from the very day the request was mailed a new peace and faith have been growing and an assurance that other requests for prayer will be answered. I can see that the Christian Herald Prayer League is a wonderful channel through which God is working."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. N. B. M. (for the forgiveness of sin); A Believer in Prayer, Sackville, N. B.; Mrs. L. S., Lyons Falls, N. Y.; Mrs. M. J. H., Bridgeport, Neb.; L. M. A., Moline, Ill.; M. E. B., Binghamton, N. Y.; M. O., Ashbury Park, N. J.; A Widow, New York (for restoration to health and for financial aid); S. S., Urbana, Ohio.

An ordained minister writes a sad letter saying that though guilty of no criminal or moral fault he is separated from his family. He has preached the Gospel for nearly thirty years, yet found himself wearying of the work and desiring to take a secular occupation. He fears now that he made a dreadful mistake in leaving the ministry and longs to return to the work in which he formerly had signal success. He asks our earnest prayers for guidance and that he and his family may be reunited. Another sad letter comes from a lady who has been for some years in a hospital for the insane but is now apparently cured and would probably be allowed to leave the hospital if a suitable home could be found for her. She asks prayers that some home may be opened for her.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Versailles, Ill. (in the M. E. Church); Herndon, Ky.; Westmoreland, N. H.; Dunkerton, Iowa; Rome, Ga. (at the Beach Creek Church); Commerce, Ga.; Maple Wood, Va.; Minerva, N. Y.; Sag Harbor, N. Y.; over all the state of Utah; Rice, Va.; over all the state of Nebraska; Creston, Iowa; Morristown, Minn. A Reader requests prayer for the unconverted boys and men in the European armies. E. I. W., for a world-wide revival.

Twelve friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends.

Twenty-eight friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends, relatives or themselves.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Nineteen readers ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the liquor habit.

Eighty-eight friends ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends, including one mother who asks that five sons may be saved.

Eleven friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Ninety-seven readers ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives. Fifty-one friends ask prayer for the healing of themselves.

Nine readers ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Forty friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Forty-eight friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

By Elena Burt Wilson

SEE her now—a fair-haired child coming down the hill in the early twilight, with a look of anxiety in her pale blue eyes.

I knew that she would come straight to my door with the same question that she always asked: "Have you seen father?" I also knew what that meant—father was on one of his periodical sprees, and Jennie had come to find him and take him home. He could not bear to think of his hanging around a saloon all night, or perhaps he may have started in and fallen by the wayside, too intoxicated to get up and find his way, and she could lead him home.

Jennie was one of four children, and the only one who could or would do anything with their father at such a time. The other children were too proud to be seen looking for him, and if they came across him accidentally they would turn and look the other way. Jennie was proud, too. So much so to think that her father might need her and she should fail him.

This evening I heard a gentle knock at my door and went to open it. Jennie stood before me, trembling with fear. "Mrs. Lollis, have you seen father? I can't find him, and mother says if he comes home she won't let him in the house; that she is going to take us children and go away. I do so want to find him, and maybe he is all right and I can take him home, and then mother won't care. You see it really isn't father's fault; he means to be good, but that sort of stuff he drinks makes him bad, and mother doesn't understand."

I took Jennie by the hand and went forth with her to find her father. We went across him down by the river, reel- ing forth from a scow saloon. Jennie saw him and quickly brightened up and went to him. He was past talking intelligently, unable to walk without aid, but he seemed to realize that his little helper had come to his assistance as usual. He reached out a shaking, grimy hand to her, and she took it tenderly within her own little clean, white hand. I pondered then at the evil in men. With pure, clean hands to guide them always, would they still persist in being slaves to their own weaknesses? Hands large or small, when they are pure, should make clean everything they come in contact with.

I helped lead him up the path that went to my home. We put him on the sofa to sleep off his sorrow, while Jennie and I talked over what was to be done.

I looked at him and wondered if his dreams were sweet, or whether he was in tune with the masters who had possession of his body. They must have been devils with long arms and claw-like fingers reaching out to strangle him, dancing round his prostrate form in perfect ecstasy or the thought that another victim had come to their lair for them to gloat over. But a childish face, wrapped in smiles, with pure hands outstretched, may have blotted all this out, for I saw him smile and murmur "Yes, Jennie, I'm going home with you."

"You know, Mrs. Lollis," Jennie finally said, "don't think I shall go with mother if she loves father. He ought to have one of us. Who would bring him home nights when he doesn't come alone? who would put him to bed, and who would get his breakfast mornings?"

"Perhaps your mother won't go after all," I said comfortingly.

"Of course if she does I shall miss her dreadfully, and the girls, too, and brother," said Jennie, her eyes filling with tears. "But I am going to stay with father and keep house for him. I can always be home from school in time to cook supper for him, and if he is late I shall know that he has gone to the scow, and I can get him."

IT WAS an hour later that Jennie's father stirred, sat up and said in a shamed voice that he was ready to go home. I did not question him nor offer to converse in any way. I could see that silence was golden. Jennie got up and took him by the hand, and I watched them go down the walk to the path until they were lost in the dusk.

The next day that Jennie's mother had gone, taking with her all the children except Jennie, who refused to go, and her brother, who was working in the village store. He was quite independent and decided he could help his mother more by staying.

It was several days before I saw Jennie again. She stopped in one evening to say that her father had not come home for supper, and she was on her way to find him. She had given up her school.

"Father gets worse and worse since mother left," she said sadly. "He is hardly ever home now and I get so lonesome."

She sat awhile in silence and then got up to go. I put my arms around her little body and held her close. The child needed love and protection. There was no need to tell her what her duty was or what to do. She already knew that and did it as far as far beyond her years would have done.

I watched her until her childish form mingled with the shadows, then I went in and closed the door on what seemed to me a tragedy. There was no future for the child. Deserted by her mother, and left to bear a burden that was too heavy for that mother to carry, she would grow up an ignorant, unloved child, her sweet nature blunted by the sordid life she was forced to live in order to save the man who was her father. That she would be rewarded some day I did not doubt, for the fruits of our actions come to us all if we are but patient, but would it be after her spirit and strength were crushed?

I had told Jennie to come to me every day. I wanted to do what I could for her. But it was two weeks before I saw her again. Then one morning I answered a knock on my door to find her standing before me radiant and smiling as I had never seen her before. She came in, but I did not approach her with questions. I waited for her to speak first, knowing that she would do so as soon as she could gather herself.

"Oh, Mrs. Lollis, I am so happy!" she finally said. "Father has been home every night since I saw you last. You see, I go to the mill for him now and take him right home when he is through work. We have supper, then we water the garden and play a little, and by that time it is bed time and we go to bed. At first I stayed awake for the longest time for fear he would get up and go away, but he hasn't yet, not once. Isn't it lovely?"

I could not resist taking the child in my arms and hugging her. My heart danced in tune with hers and I felt as happy as she looked.

"You know, I think father got ashamed to see me coming for him and taking him home, never scolding him or anything. I never even cried. I guess I just looked sad. But one day I told him that I wished he would come right straight home that night, and if he wanted me I would come and get him. He seemed pleased at that, and I do it all the time now. Then I take him to the mill mornings, too. It is terrible dark and lonely coming back alone that early in the morning, but I guess I'm being paid for it; don't you think so, Mrs. Lollis?"

I certainly did think so. Such loyalty I had never seen. I marveled at the child's cleverness in thinking this all out.

She prattled on and on, but finally said: "I must go now, as it's nearly noon, and I take father's lunch to him. I eat with him, too; then I know where he is during the lunch hour."

I was more amazed than ever. Surely this father would respond to the efforts of this blessed child and henceforth lead an upright life.

She stood in the door hesitatingly, then said, "You know I believe mother will come home now when she finds out that father doesn't go to that scow place any more. I am going to write and tell her when I am sure."

The day seemed brighter to me and more full of joy after the child's visit. I kept my eyes on her as she skipped down the path. She was a child again, and almost a happy one. It only lacked a mother's love.

AS THE days slipped by after Jennie's last visit I became anxious and wanted to know if she had obtained that for which she was working. I found myself watching the path and jumping at each knock on the door, hoping to see her.

At last I was rewarded. I saw her coming up the path and knew by her little rapid strides that the end had come, and at last she had not labored in vain.

"Mrs. Lollis," she said laughing, "mother is home and wants to know if you will come to see her. She wants to tell you how happy we are again. I don't have to go for father any more. He comes alone and mother meets him at the gate."

I put on my bonnet and walked with the child down the path to the street that led to her home. That path never seemed so clean to me before. It had been swept clean by little hands.

The World of Sand By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

All alone in a world of sand,
By the side of a smiling sea,
A small girl played with a wooden spade,
As happy as she could be.
The sun beamed down on her dimpled feet,
The wind kissed her ruffled hair—
And she ruled in a land, a world of sand
That was vast to her eyes—and fair!

All alone in a world of sand,
By the side of a summer sea,
She used her shoe (and her stocking too)
To fashion her castles wee.
The waves sang softly to see her there
And high where the sunbeams shone
The angels smiled as they watched the child
Who played in her world—alone.

All alone in a world of sand,
By the side of a roaring sea,
We often roam, who are far from home;
O God, that we might be free
To cast our cares on the summer wind,
To take up a spade in hand,
And learn to play, in a childish way,
In the heart of a world of sand!

THE WISDOM OF ZARATHUSTRA

ZARATHUSTRA, or Zoroaster, was one of the great teachers of the East, and was famous in classical antiquity as the founder of the widely-renowned wisdom of the Magi. The age in which he lived is uncertain, but is generally believed to have been many centuries before the Trojan War. Some of his wise sayings are preserved in the East to the present day. A reader of the Christian Herald, Mr. H. I. Collins, of New York, has sent this ancient "teaching," attributed to the sage, which seems good for us today:

"O ZOROASTER, thou hast said, 'I must pray to the Creator: Now behold I never prayed in my life! Who will teach me to pray?' I'ha' Mazda said: 'Let thy lips utter thy holiest desires, and let thy soul seek constantly for new expressions, magnifying the wisdom, love and power of Ormazd, the Creator.

Neither shalt thou take a thought in regard to rules of prayer; the rules are for the unlearned. He who inventeth a new prayer to God every day of his life hath done wisely indeed, for the glory of prayer is the strengthening of one's own soul to perceive the Higher Light.'

"Asha said: 'If a man think a prayer and use no words, is it well with him?' I'ha' Mazda said: 'It is well with him; but it is better to add words also. It is well for the Creator to think a universe, but better to create it. To begin to learn creating, thou shalt use spoken words: the perfection of creating is to have the words bear fruit. He who omitteth words of prayer will in time omit prayer also, and his soul tendeth to barrenness.'

"I declare unto thee, O man, the secret of all spiritual growth lieth in giving out the spirit."

WHETHER you bathe in stream or in tub, in cold water or in warm, morning or evening, the way to benefit most from the bath is to use Ivory Soap.

The water is carried into the pores by the mild, copious, bubbling Ivory lather instead of merely touching the surface. The excretions of the skin combine with the lather instead of remaining in the pores. The skin is cleansed thoroughly so that it enjoys to the fullest degree whatever exhilarating or soothing properties the water may have.

A SUNDAY SCHOOL TOUR IN SOUTH AMERICA

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

THE recent Sunday school tour of South America by the writer and a small party revealed the opportunity of the Sunday school and the eagerness of the people for help to make the Sunday school efficient. In the city of Peru, Chile, Argentina and Brazil, the welcome to the work of the World's Sunday School Association was voiced in large outpourings of the people. At Valparaiso a sweet Chilean girl expressed that welcome at a gathering of a thousand people.

In Buenos Aires, in St. George's Hall 1,500 Sunday school children sang splendidly "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" On the platform was the old lady 101 years of age in whose honor the first Sunday school was started in South America forty-nine years before. Penzotti was on that platform. Years ago he was imprisoned in Peru for selling Bibles and preaching, and when told that he would be released if he would discontinue his work, said: "My bones will rot in this prison."

In Rosario, Argentina, 2,500 from twenty-three Sunday schools gathered in the large opera house, sang the "Gloria Song" in Spanish, and marched afterward to the principal plaza of the city reviewed by multitudes.

In Rio de Janeiro, a national Sunday school convention was held with 1,000 in attendance, and forward steps taken to standardize Sunday schools and to train teachers. New lessons are being translated and better literature for Sunday school workers is appearing.

Dr. George P. Howard, the new Sunday school secretary for South America, born in that country, a fine Spanish linguist and loved by the people, is now in the United States, preparing for his service to the continent. He is to return in six months to the field to build up a great Sunday school enthusiasm there.

"The world is ever to be saved; it must be saved through its childhood," said Dr. F. B. Meyer. And this is our hope for South America, for this plan lies at the heart of North America's strength.

THE cutting through of the Panama Canal has suddenly brought us face to face with a brother, instead of one whom we had considered a distant relative. And this brother is bigger, in some physical respects, than ourselves. We could place in Brazil all the United States, excluding Alaska, and have 200,000 square miles' margin. Argentin tina would accommodate in her borders all of the states east of the Mississippi and the first tier of states west of that river. And a trip as long as from New York to San Francisco by water would be required to measure the coast line of Chile.

If you were to circle South America, as did the American tourists recently on the Kroonland, going through the Canal, down the long bare coasts of Ecuador, Peru and Chile, through the Straits of watered by streams fed from the snows of the Andes, and stand ere long in the presence of that line of giant peaks, snow-crowned, which ruggedly outline this backbone of a continent.

Crossing the Andes to the Brazil side, you come to vast forests rich in hardwoods and rubber, and to a watershed that feeds over ten thousand miles of rivers, most of which issue finally in the Amazon.

If you cross the mountains from the Chilean side, after leaving the station of Los Andes the railroad follows the stream in a tortuous route, twisting, turning, ever ascending, until the train halts close to a glacier-fed mountain lake, 12,000 feet high. All about are the gray, rocky, jagged mountain tops, the crevices filled with snow. Through the tunnel before us we pass from Chile to Argentina.

On the lonely summit, midway over the tunnel, is the famous monument, the Christ of the Andes, placed there by the Chilean and Argentine Governments to commemorate the peaceful settling of a boundary dispute which had brought these great nations to the verge of war. The Christ, with uplifted arm, faces the North. Carved at the base of the statue are the memorable words: "Sooner shall these mountains crumble into dust than Chileans and Argentines break the peace which, at the feet of Christ the Redeemer, they have sworn to maintain."

Are these words not an appeal to solve all differences between nations on the basis of His Spirit and words?

From the Andes the road drops down through a gorgeously colored volcanic region to the rich plains of Argentina, which, with their burden of wheat and cattle, stretch for hundreds of miles to the seaboard. The enormous productive capacity of these plains will feed several continents, and will make Argentina rich in time.

These are simply suggestions of the physical background for South America's commercial future. And that future is based upon the great staples of copper, nitrates, wheat, cattle, hides, wool, rubber, coffee, cocoa.

This great continent of opportunity is bound to rival North America's rapid growth in population. Already Europe's overflow is headed toward South America. In one province in Southern Brazil there are 300,000 Germans. In the city of Sao Paulo, Brazil, you will find 150,000 Italians. The city of Buenos Aires is more cosmopolitan than New York. In Lima,

A TASTE FOR TRUTH

A SERMON

BY
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT: "Rejoicing not in iniquity, but rejoicing with the truth." 1 Cor. 13: 6.

LET ME state at once where the genesis of this sermon was found. Some time ago I read in the columns of an influential paper an able review of a very able book. I do not know the book, nor do I want to know it, for it is evident that an open sewer runs through its pages, and rank and noisome things crowd the field of its vision. The book is said to be written with terrible power, but its brutal indecency is as obtrusive as its force. Even the hardened reviewer shies now and again at the introduction of some unusually ghastly defilement, and he seems to close the book with a gasp! But when he comes to review his unclean pilgrimage, admitting as he does the naked profanity of much of the life, and the coarse and unrestrained vulgarity of its speech, he declares this final judgment: "After all, this is nearer the truth than Ian Maclaren's sentimental saints, the odorless Dr. Maclures, who move through their days in forceless insipidity!"

"This is nearer the truth!" That is the counterfeit coin I wish to nail to the counter. I am afraid that the reviewer's usage of the word is the one with which we are familiar in common intercourse. An unclean piece of scandal is frequently justified on the plea of its "truth." We draw out fold after fold of the dirty roll, and we excuse our pruriency on the expressed assumption that it is best to know the whole "truth." Now, that usage of the word is infinitely removed from its usage in the sacred Scriptures, and if we could recover the Scriptural content we should be saved from much mental and moral confusion.

Known by the Things We Love

Let us begin the recovery here. That a thing has happened does not make it true. The happening constitutes a fact; it does not inevitably constitute a truth. The sworn and squalid statements of a police-court may represent fact; they do not represent truth. Those nauseous witnessings of brutalized life may belong to the realm of hard fact quite as surely as the sweet and tender fellowships of Darby and Joan, linked together in the serenity of a lovely eventide; but in the one case the fact is true, in the other the fact is untrue. Fact is consonance with reality; truth is consonance with the ideal. The veracious is merely what it is; the truthful is what is and what ought to be. Many things ought to be described as veracious which are often described as true. A fact is a happening; a truth is a beautiful happening. A note of the organ may get out of tune; the painful sound is a painful fact, but it is not true! A singer may sing flat; the singer is an agonizing fact, but is not true! The true fact in singing is the tuneful fact, and all discordance lacks the truth. The true facts in life are the facts that wear the beauty of the ideal, that are in tune with the infinite, and that reflect the likeness of our Lord. And, therefore, there is no such thing as "an ugly truth"; many facts are ugly, but truth always carries a winsome bloom. The truth is never deformed, never rotten, never unclean; it is always and everywhere beautiful.

I think, therefore, we shall have to raise our thought and our vocabulary if we are to come into harmony with the usages of the Word of God. We shall have to reserve the epithet "true" for beautiful happenings, for gracious and homely fact, for life as it ought to be, life at its best. The reviewer employed an utterly unscriptural usage when he described a sewage novel as "nearer the truth" than the strange and unfamiliar heroism of Dr. Maclure. It may have been nearer the facts of the common road; it was infinitely farther away from the truth. Nothing is true which is ugly; nothing is true which is discordant; nothing is true which does not bear the likeness of Christ. "I am the Truth," and everything is tested by its ability to ring true to him.

Now, according to the apostle Paul, there are some people who find their delight in ugly fact, and there are others who find their delight in beautiful truth. Some there are who rejoice "in unrighteousness," and others there are who "rejoice" in the truth. On both sides of the statement the apostolic word is intense and forceful. Some men "leap for joy" at a disclosure of ugliness; other men "leap for joy" at an exhibition of truth! Common experience affords abundant corroboration of the apostle's judgment. How prone we are to take a delightful interest in the unrighteous and the unclean! When the curtain lifts upon the unsavory, the audience is often held in keen and tense expectancy. Our newspapers know it and cater for their public. But, indeed, we need not go beyond our own hearts. Our minds are dulled by the quiet and sober commonplace; they spring out of their sleep at the suggestion of scandal! The British House of Parliament empties in common discussion; the benches are thronged for a scene! And so it is that gossip is more welcome than deep communion, and the highly spiced is more enticing than our daily bread.

"As the Hart Panteth After the Water Brooks"

But there is the other side to all this. There are souls that dance for joy at the emergence of the truth. Robert Louis Stevenson used to thrill with a physical ecstasy when he stumbled upon some exquisite literary expression which fitted the thought as the glove the hand. And in the plane of the moral life there are souls that experience a delightful lift and leap when they encounter some exquisite expression of the truth, some clean heroism, some chaste and tender chivalry, some long, reticent sacrifice of life, spending itself as Dr. Maclure's was spent, pursuing his humble ministry in the depth of dark nights, and over cold and storm-swept moors. They leap to the truth because of the loveliness of the truth, and the beauty holds them enchanted. The truth they contemplate invigorates their souls as with spiritual ozone, and they expand in a glad appreciation. They are of those whom the apostle describes as "rejoicing in the truth."

Now, suppose that ours is the taste for the ugly fact, and not the taste for the beautiful truth; what shall we do? Well, I will express my own judgment, and say that this superior taste cannot be acquired. It is not an "accomplishment" to be obtained at a so-called "finishing school," no matter whether we become pupils at the close of our youth or in the days of our prime. More and more am I convinced that we do not pass from the inferior taste to the superior taste as in succeeding standards in the same school, the finer culture leaving the meaner cravings behind; I am profoundly convinced that we can only receive it as one of the elemental powers of a recreated life.

Now, it seems to me that the primary and seminal stage of this new taste for the spiritually lovely is a taste for God. I am a little diffident about the phrase I have used, lest it should even remotely suggest the irreverent and the flippant; but there is no irreverence in my mind, and I will therefore venture the phrase, and I say that the primary condition of the highest perception is a taste for God. And how rare is the taste! Even among professing Christians how infrequently we meet with it! There are many Christians who have received the gift, but it is pitifully unexercised. They have received a seed, but it is not developed; it remains like an egg which has never been incubated, and its hidden vitalities have never appeared. On the other hand there are Christians who have exercised their supernatural senses, and they have as keen and eager a taste for God as the delightful and delightful passion of a lover for his beloved.

When first I went to Carr's Lane Church there was one of our number, an aged saint, revered and beloved, who had a surprising passion for God. To name the Lord in her presence aroused an intentness like to the intentness of a lover when he hears the name of his beloved. "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds in a believer's ear!" Ay, and it was sweet to her! No morsel ever came her way at all comparable in delicacy to those tidings of her Lord! And when she went home—and I saw the going—no bride ever went forth to meet her bridegroom with more unclouded and fearless ecstasy. She had a taste for God, and she received the gift of that spiritual sense in the gracious solemnities of the new birth. She had a taste for him who is "the truth," and "the altogether lovely," and "the joy of the world" was her strength.

Having the Mind of God

But now, a taste for God carries with it a taste for the things of God. If the poet be in you, you will appreciate the poetry everywhere. If you have a taste for him who is the truth, all truth will be tasty. You cannot have a taste for God and not the things of God, rejoicing in him who is the truth, without having a keen enjoyment in all truth expressed in human kind. You cannot have a taste for God and hanker after human filth. The greater carries with it the less, and the supreme appreciation will make you the intense appreciator of loveliness wherever found. To appreciate the "altogether lovely" will send you in quest of the lovely in man. Your supreme passion will be the constraint in your exploration. We know that minuteness of search a passionate hobby will engender; how it sends the unwearied feet on the long unending lane, and keeps the sleepless eyes in ceaseless vigilance, watching for the coveted prize! The quest of butterflies, of beetles, of birds' eggs, of shells, of coins, of curios, of pictures—who counts the miles when passion sits at the heart? But here is another crusade, inspired by a passion for God, an exploration of the territory of man for human loveliness, a quest for the truth-facts hidden there among the rubbish-hops, the very gold of the kingdom of God. Who will belong to such an exploring party, a party that shall go out praying, searching, delving for human loveliness, and "rejoicing in the truth"? What a crusade! Ay, and what discoveries, and in most unlikely and slandered places!

The other day I found an exquisite clump of sweet violets hiding in the very heart of a bed of nettles! And I think this discovery gave me more pleasure than those I found in the protev company of the harmless ivy! That is what Froude tells us he found in Thomas Carlyle. That is what we should find in one another, if only we had eager, patient, and love-washed eyes. Human life is not all nettles; to affirm it is the pervading judgment of the cynic; they who have a passion for God will find the Godlike everywhere; they will find the violets of moral loveliness even in the midst of the noisome waste. And when they have found them their fellow searchers shall have an exultant shout, and they shall come together, and in the gracious discovery there shall be a common "rejoicing in the truth." My brethren, a taste for God will make us experts in the discovery of the lovely. "He, the Spirit of Truth, . . . will guide you into all truth."

Song of Hate

By C. Whitlock Cole

A SONG of hate is our song today,
Hatred of war and the price we pay.

Forty thousand lives and more
Is the daily price and the deadly score.
Forty thousand lives a day
Is the price of war that the world must pay
Hatred and horror when hearts are wrong
Hatred that clings and climbs among
Rich and poor through the world today,
Hatred of war we hear all say.
Hatred of slaughter, when hearts are wrong
Hatred of misery on each tongue.

Forty thousand lives and more
Is the daily toll and the deadly score.
While a world is bowed in grief today,
It hates the high cost of war, I say.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

Large Standing

SUNDAY, August 8. Psalm 18: 19. "He brought me forth into a large place." That is always the end of the Lord's leadership. He brings us out of narrow places, where we have but little standing, and he sets our feet in a large place. He gives us big ground to stand upon. We have been cramped in a small expediency and he leads us into the enlargement of a spacious purpose. Or we have been cribbed in a petty rule, and he brings us into the air of a splendid principle. Or we have been dwelling in little sentiments, and he leads us forth into vast and holy love. Or we have lived in party pride, and he has brought us into a comprehension of truth. This is the way of the Lord. It is a gracious will that the soul should have fine staling, and should move in the glorious liberty of the Son of God.

It is easy to tell when a soul has been wonderfully led into a large place, as it is easy to know when a soul is held captive in a tiny cabin. In politics it is the difference between the politician and the statesman. In religion it is the difference between the ecclesiastic and the saint. It is the difference between the poetic and the prosaic, between severely conventional living and a large life of spiritual vision and aspect. Who does not know the difference between a man who takes up a thing from small motives and the man who stands upon big grounds in all his enterprises and ambition? It is the difference described by our Lord: some are "from above," and others "from beneath."

The man upon big ground alone can tackle matter of tremendous moment. He alone can endure the dark and cloudy day. The very largeness of his staling protects him from the fears which are brief unproportioned thoughts. He looks out upon affairs with a true and fine perspective, and he does not confuse the early battle with the long campaign. He does not fear "when heat cometh." He has the calmness which is the offspring of magnanimity. He has the fear of the Lord, and in that fear no other fear can breathe.

For God is the God of the large places! It is the wonderful privilege of the believer to sit in heavenly places with Christ Jesus, and to think and labor in the very mind of Christ. J. H. J.

The Christian Life Is One of Joyous Service

MONDAY, August 9. Isaiah 42: 1-12. "Behold my servant, whom I uphold." Our Lord fouled on the same night two great sacraments. On the Lord's Supper, is practically universal; the other, that of service, is observed literally only by one or two denominations. The Pope washes the feet of twelve beggars once a year. But the spirit of that last expression of Jesus' love has passed into Christianity. When our Lord took on himself the form of a servant, girded himself, and began to wash the feet of the disciples, it was no new service that he performed. The life of God is ever one of service, of ministry. He rules all, because he serves all. The lowly services of Jesus to lepers, to the blind and sick were but a revelation of the life that God has ever been living in the blue depths of heaven. He thus revealed the model and ideal on which our own lives should be framed.

There is no doubt as to the application of this passage to our Lord. The Holy Spirit directly refers it to him in Matt. 12: 18. Let us ask that he may be so incarnated in us that we may be upheld by the same hand, that God may find delight in us, and that we may be anointed and endued by the same unction. As Dr. Peabody puts it, "The sagacious, thrifty view of life would say: make the most of yourself, reserve yourself, put your power only to the largest uses; do not waste your force on insignificant occasions. But Jesus teaches us to find glory of life in stooping to humblest tasks." We cannot forget the old legend of St. Francis, who alighted from his horse to kiss a leper, cleansing his wounds, and ministering to his need. Having accomplished this, he mounted and rode away; but on looking back beheld the Saviour standing there in dazzling glory. Do not be discouraged; you cannot fail if you have finished the errand on which you have been sent. F. B. M.

Sunday—a Preparation Day

TUESDAY, August 10. Exodus 34: 21. "Six days thou shalt work, but on the seventh day thou shalt rest." As a command of God, and as a requirement of our human nature, this principle needs constant consideration. Phillips Brooks said that we might read the injunction, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," by saying, "Remember the Sabbath day and it will keep you holy." The way one uses Sunday determines, more than we sometimes realize, the drift and the power of the entire succeeding week.

Sunday should be a preparation day—a day in which we get ready for the coming six days when there is naturally less time to consider. The person who allows himself to be stampeded with a multitude of friends and outings, losing his mental grasp on himself in the confusion of throngs, may get a change on this day, but he hardly lives up to the spirit of this law; neither does he fulfil the intent of this day when he packs it with a busy round of duties, even though they be church duties, which give no time to be alone and to add to his moral and spiritual reserve.

One day in a real sense belongs to God and to our higher nature. The great question is, "What does Sunday do for us?"

A man of our acquaintance, a lawyer, reads through the Bible three times yearly, by using his Sundays for this purpose. His great reputation as a lawyer he attributes to this use of the Sabbath.

Sunday is not kept by action only, it is kept also by thought and by personal devotion. We grow in grace and power by ideas as well as by service. C. S. C.

God's Love the Strength of Our Life

WEDNESDAY, August 11. John 11: 17-36. "If thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Jesus seems sometimes to tarry. His stages of redemption are so deliberate. But his love is dealing more wisely in its delays than its haste. It is hard to wait when heart and flesh are failing, but God will be the strength of our life, and will stop the trial as soon as the heart gives signs of weakness and failure. He sees the eternal weight of glory which must follow on our affliction, and knows the nearest path that leads to it.

But what blessings result from these weary hours of waiting and suffering! Suffering at first isolates us; but afterward it links us in closest bonds with all who are sitting on the hard benches of the school of sorrow. We learn to comfort them with the comfort with which we have ourselves been comforted of God. A simple-hearted Christian girl who had heard God's call to the mission field felt keenly the pain of leaving her lover in a great manufacturing city. She said, "I cannot bear to give anything to Jesus grudgingly," so she spent the whole night in prayer for help to make the gift with a smile, and afterwards came to her minister to say: "I don't love Jack less, but I love Jesus so much more that it is easy to go."

Above all wait to see "the end of the Lord." He is very pitiful; human in his tenderness. Though he slay thee, trust in him. He knows the thoughts that he thinks towards thee—of good, not of evil—to give thee a latter end of hope. F. B. M.

Making Our Religion Real

THURSDAY, August 12. Isaiah 29: 13. "With their mouth and with their lips do they honor me, but have removed their heart far from me." Max Müller said: "There is one quality which is essential, without which no really great life is ever lived, without which no really great work is ever achieved—that is Truth, Truth in the inward parts. Look at the really great and good men! Why do we call them great and good? Because they dared to be true to themselves, they dared to be what they are."

The Christian must ring true. He must speak truth with no semblance of subterfuge, with no suggestion of deception. His religion, especially, is a place where he is closely watched. A devoted Christian scholar once told the writer that he made it a rule of his life never to talk beyond his experience, never in public or in private to express religious thoughts in terms that he did not fully understand, or that had become unfamiliar to the man "on the street."

A bishop of one of our large churches in examining some candidates for the ministry said: "Never preach a sermon on Sunday that you could not or would not give to a business man if you were sitting alone with him in his office."

Not only in our words should we be real and natural, but in our hearts; as the old prophet says, we should be an honor to God. Down deep in our hearts are we true? Out of the abundance of our hearts our lips speak, and a man of untrue or false heart cannot long conceal it by his speech. The fierce "woes" of Jesus were pronounced against men who spoke fair and religious words, but in their hearts he saw sham and an hypocrisy more blameworthy than the sins of the flesh even.

Fortunate is the man or woman who learns that Reality pays. To be known to be the real thing—that is character! It may not always be capable of fine speeches, but its power weighs tons.

God's Honor Calls Us to Noble Living

FRIDAY, August 13. I Thessalonians 2: 1-12. "Ye should walk worthily of God." Another rendering of this remarkable exhortation is: "Implying you to live lives worthy of fellowship with God, who is inviting you to share his own kingship and glory." It should also be noticed that this beseeching exhortation was addressed to "each one of them." We can judge something of their social position from the references made by the apostle in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, where he speaks of the proofs of affliction and the deep poverty of these Macedonian believers. They were very poor, misunderstood and persecuted, scorned alike by the Jews and Gentiles, with but the slightest knowledge of Christianity, since the apostle's stay among them had been limited to a few weeks, and yet were told that God invited them to share his own kingship and glory, and that they must behave themselves worthily of their high calling.

But if this exhortation was true for them, how much more for us. The right-minded son of a great and noble father, whose name and character are held in universal honor, refuses to stoop to anything which would bring a stain or reflection on his father's honor. "No," he says to himself; "whatever other men may do, I cannot do this thing, or condescend to aught that is unworthy of my father." We are bound to take a similar course with regard to God. He imputes to us the responsibility of maintaining his character in this world. We are called upon to glorify him in the eyes of men. The question with us is not merely: Is this wrong? Is this course likely to impair my standing or my fortune? but, Is it worthy of God, and of my union with him, and of the nobility of character which becomes his child and heir? How many sins and mistakes should we be saved from, if this were always our first inquiry! F. B. M.

Looking Forward to the Finish

SATURDAY, August 14. John 19: 30. "It is finished." In this world, life has its beginning and ending; its rejoicing bells of birth, its tolling bells of death. The evening should be as glorious as the morning was bright. The words of the Master, "It is finished," are a triumphant exclamation, meaning, "God's will is obeyed; man's redemption is secured; immortal victory is won; heaven is opened to man; the gloom of the funeral, the hearse, the coffin, the grave is changed into the glory of resurrection and ascension with Christ."

What will your life be when it is finished? When you wind up all your affairs in this world? Blessed will you be if you can look upward and say, "Father, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." If you have lived merely for the gratification of sense and self, what an awful review of the past your last moments will reveal! What an awakening when the last day of your life is being finished! One hour would have been enough to have claimed by faith Christ's finished work, to have entered into partnership with him in this life, and in heirship with him in the riches of his eternal life. E. W. C.

COME ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Oh, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord.

THE CHICAGO RIVER HORROR

A NEW date was added to the too long list of water tragedies when at Chicago, July 24, the excursion steamer Eastland, packed to the limit inside and out with picnickers, mostly women and children, capsized at her pier in the Chicago River at the moment of starting, and over 1,000 of her merry-making passengers were drowned within a swift six minutes. Less than half of her cargo of 2,600 souls escaped the terrible fate which befell this first of a fleet of five steamers chartered for the annual picnic of the Western Electric Company's employees and their friends.

The disaster happened at about seven o'clock in the morning of Saturday, July 24. Five steamers had been engaged to take the excursionists across Lake Michigan to Michigan City, Indiana, for a day of rare festivities. Seven thousand tickets had been distributed, and the occasion had been looked forward to for weeks. Whole families go on these annual picnics, and employees of the Western Electric make it a gala day for their friends and themselves. Hundreds upon hundreds of children and little babies were on the Eastland or with their parents among the throngs that were gathering to go by one or another of the other four boats.

The Eastland was built in 1903 for fast passenger service on the Lake. She was 265 feet long, 38 feet beam, about 1,900 tonnage and had three decks. Also, she had a bad record. The vessel has changed owners several times. As an excursion boat, she repeatedly ran aground or did other things that caused considerable anxiety at the time, but without loss of life. Two or three years ago she was overhauled and made more trustworthy, according to her new owners, and was pronounced in perfect condition by the local Federal inspector in the spring of 1913. She was chartered as a safe boat, and no thought of danger entered the minds of the picnickers as they took possession of every available foot of room aboard her, and watched the other steamers making ready for the trip, and watched a tug hitch a line to the Eastland preparatory to giving her a hand out into the stream. The Chicago River is but a stream, though with considerable current.

BUT the Eastland never so much as cast off the stout hawsers that held her to the pier. Her passengers had begun to mass on the side farthest from the dock. The boat began to list. She was designed to be kept even by water ballast, and one report has it that at the first indication of listing, she was righted by the pumps. Another report states that the passengers were required to distribute themselves more evenly. The exact facts are still to be learned, excepting the established fact that the Eastland finally did begin to tip to one side and then continued slowly to careen away from her pier, straining her hawsers until they tore the pilings from the dock.

Slow to sense their real peril, the crowds aboard made a joke of the difficulty to keep their footing at first. Then children began to cry and to cling, frightened, to their mothers. Then the women took alarm, and screams arose. Men shouted warnings and directions. An impulse to flee across the boat came just too late. The crews of the tugs and steamers near by and the thousands of people spread along the docks and on the bridge across the river suddenly became galvanized by terror. For there before their eyes the big steel boat, filled with human beings on pleasure bent, was quietly, steadily rolling over on her side, her priceless freight already beginning to slip into the waiting water.

One moment the narrow little river was alive with gaiety, with waving flags, with friendly shouts of greeting, with everything that goes to make up the start on a joyous outing. The next—the very lips that were shouting back from the river's sides became stiff with horrified amazement, for those to whom they shouted were in the grip of death.

AS the Eastland turned over on her side, her decks dropped their human freight like flies into the stream. Struggling, grasping at every object and at each other, mad with fear and horror, mothers and their little ones, fathers, young men and young women plunged into the swirling waters below. "The water was thick with them," said a deck hand who escaped. "They were going under and coming up and snatching at each other and hollering—men, women and children, all over that part of the river. The current carried some of them, those that could keep afloat, up-stream some distance. Most of them, it seemed, could not swim, or were dragged down by those that could not. The river over there opposite the ship must be full of bodies."

BUT fearful as was the scene upon the surface of the water, a far more awful one was enacted within the fated steel hull. There many hundreds were trapped. The cabins were filled at the moment the Eastland went over. As she lay on one side more than half submerged, her other black side loomed like a tomb above the water, and beneath it those wretched mortals gasped out their last few agonized moments. It was necessary for mechanics to cut away portions of the steel side with gas flames, before the work of rescue and the recovery of the dead could begin. Few were taken out alive, and such as were had passed through experiences almost worse than death.

On the river itself, heroic rescue work began almost as soon as the Eastland was seen to capsize. The first moment of stupefaction was quickly over, and instantly tugs and small boats were in among the struggling mass. From piers and steamers all sorts of floating objects were cast into the stream, for the help of those who could seize them. But the nature of the catastrophe was such that comparatively few survived the first frantic moment in the water.

On shore, along the docks, upon the bridge, up along all the streets leading to the river, multitudes stricken dumb with horror, pressed in about the terrible scene. The fire department sent men to assist the police in the work of taking care of the dead. Hospitals sent every available doctor and nurse and ambulance to the scene. Hundreds of private automobiles were put at the service of the rescuers. Every warehouse in the neighborhood was turned into a temporary morgue. And all too soon their capacity was taxed. The vastness of the calamity began to be felt by the city when endless rows of the dead were seen. And by nightfall Chicago was a city of mourning, and the nation mourned with her.

Sunday was a day of grief and gloom in Chicago. Hundreds of families and thousands of friends of the picnickers were still without definite knowledge of the fate of their loved ones. The scene of the calamity drew unprecedented crowds of sightseers, besides those who were seeking news of friends and relatives, and the police of the city had a sad and hard task on their hands. Every point of vantage, including the windows of the warehouses facing the river, was occupied throughout the day. The grim work of searching the interior of the hull for the bodies had continued throughout the night, by electric light, and as kept up all Sunday, a crew of divers and many workmen with pikes, which they thrust into the hold in search of bodies, performing the grewsome task.

THE latest returns, as the Christian Herald goes to press, are that 80 persons went aboard the Eastland of whom 1,002 are known to have escaped death, 892 are known to have perished, and 586 are still unaccounted for, the probability being that they are dead. Of the total on board, 2,508 were excursionists, 72 were members of the crew. Apparently the legal capacity of the boat was 2,500 persons.

The New York Times states that in Cleveland, when the Eastland was inspected some years ago, it had such a reputation as a tipsy craft, built for speed, that it was permitted to carry regularly only thirteen passengers. It could carry 653 passengers in the excursion trade as long as it did not venture more than five miles from shore, and was permitted to keep 2,000 aboard only as long as it remained in waters not deep enough to submerge it. When the Eastland, after some changes in its superstructure, entered the excursion trade, the local inspector gave it a license in 1906 to carry 3,000 passengers.

The state authorities were prompted to begin a thorough investigation of the disaster. The captain of the Eastland, H. Pedersen, Chief Engineer C. Erickson, and other officers, thirty of the crew, were held for examination. Every official of the Indiana Transportation Company, which leased the Eastland for the excursion, was ordered under arrest. Federal Judge K. M. Landis has ordered a Federal grand jury investigation of the catastrophe. President Wilson has ordered an inquiry by the Department of Commerce.

DRAGGING BODIES FROM THE RIVER WITH CANT-HOOKS

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Matin and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE military center of interest during the week ending July 22 has been the enormous movement in Poland and Galicia, probably involving more men and stretching over a longer battle line than any previous military operation in the history of the world. The battle line begins at the Gulf of Riga and runs to the northern boundary of Rumania, a distance as the crow flies of about 800 miles, but, measured along the curving battle line, over 1,200 miles.

On this line about 6,000,000 men have faced each other in deadly combat the whole week, about 2,500,000 Germans and Austrians against 3,500,000 Russians, and, strange as it may seem to many of my countrymen with their almost inbred belief in the infallibility of a majority, in this instance the minority has been steadily dragging the majority backward.

The battle line, though really one continued movement, can be divided into three closely connected campaigns. The first of these divisions may be called the Courland-Dubissa River campaign. Here events have succeeded each other with great rapidity. Starting from Goldingen, northeast of Libau on the Wiridan River, one German column moved to the northwest along the river and early in the week occupied Windau on the Baltic, after which the bulk of his force marched directly to the southeast towards Riga, finally joining the column next referred to.

His next column moved northeast from Goldingen, and by the middle of the week had reached and occupied the town of Tuksum, just south of the Gulf of Riga, at which point it was joined by the column coming from Windau, and the united forces began a moment eastward towards Riga, overcoming such Russian resistance as was offered. At the time this record closes, this German force had reached and taken the town of Dubbelin, located on the Gulf of Riga, less than twenty miles from the city of the same name.

Riga is one of the most important Russian naval ports, besides being the fifth city of Russia, and its occupation, Libau being already in German hands, will leave the Russian navy with no ice-free port the coming winter on the Baltic. It looks as though the capture of this place cannot long be avoided.

A little farther to the south the town of Minsk has also been taken by the Germans, and their army operating in central Courland now stretches in a straight line from a point a little east of Minsk southward to the east of Schawli, and thence to the east bank of the Dubissa River, which in a general sense it follows until the junction of that stream with the Niemen. All of the province of Courland to the west of this line is now in full possession of the Germans, with the Russians retreating everywhere along the line to the eastward, in more or less disorder. The Russians have lost heavily in men, in artillery and in supplies and munitions of war.

The Niemen River divides the Courland campaign from what may be called the Warsaw campaign, which stretches of Novogeorgievsk, against which its artillery has already begun action. The center and right wings moving in a south and easterly direction have succeeded in capturing the fort of Ostrolenka, thus making the first breach in the line of fortresses

The second phase of this campaign, the Blone, is the attack on Warsaw from the west. It will be remembered that for some months now the German line on the west of Warsaw has not changed position even slightly, and that the position won last December, beginning on the south bank of the Vistula at its junction with the Bsura, which latter river it followed through Sochatschew to the meeting-point of the Rawka with the Bsura, thence along the Rawka to the east of Skernewizy, has only been modified at isolated points.

During the last week, however, the Germans began a drive to the eastward from Sochatschew, which was successful, and not only reached and captured Blone, but drove past that point and reached a point sufficiently near to the forts of the outer ring of defenses of Warsaw for its artillery to begin the attack on them.

Another drive starting from Skernewizy has taken Grodysk, and has advanced considerably farther towards Warsaw, and it may confidently be expected that before many hours have passed it also will have begun the attack on the city's defenses.

On the west, the defenses of Warsaw consist of a double ring of forts, sixteen in the outer ring and twelve in the inner, of modern construction, large sums from the last French loan to Russia having been spent on them during the two years preceding the war. In view of the speedy reduction by the Teutonic artillery of all other forts and fortifications to which it has been opposed during this war, with one exception, it will be extremely interesting to see how long the Warsaw forts and the fortress of Novogeorgievsk will be able to hold out.

The third phase is the broadest and also the most important in its ultimate objectives, and bears but indirectly on the Warsaw attack, though it will have a great influence on the bringing about of a decisive result in that campaign. The territory affected by this phase is still farther to the south, and beginning at the fortress of Ivangorod extends eastward and along the railway to Lublin and Cholm.

Directly north of Cholm lies Brest Litowsk, one of the component fortresses of the Polish quadrangle, the others being Warsaw and Novogeorgievsk, already attacked, and Bielstock farther north, which is connected with Cholm by a line of rail and is distant therefrom about eighty miles through reasonably easy country. This fortress is the real ultimate objective of this phase, provided, of course, that Warsaw and Novogeorgievsk and Ivangorod fall into German hands previously.

Outside the capture of Lublin and Cholm, with the connecting railroad, the immediate task which falls to the army engaged in the carrying out of this phase is the taking of Ivangorod, the fortress on the Vistula nearly between Warsaw and Lublin, and the keeping up of such pressure that no troops can be taken from the Russian line here and sent north to help Warsaw.

During the past week this army has seized Radom, to the southwest of Ivangorod, and the railroad running from Radom and Ivangorod, and has advanced to the east of Ivangorod, where, after stubborn fighting, it has driven the Russians from their positions on the southern bank of the river, seized several of the bridges, and, crossing, has driven the Russian troops into the fortress of Ivangorod, which it has invested.

Farther east towards Lublin from a point a little west of Lublin and running to a point immediately south of Cholm, there has been hard fighting all the week, but the Austro-German advance has continued to gain defending the Russian Empire and at a point of considerable strategic importance, since three railroads meet there. Lomsha, a little to the north of this, has also been taken by a force moving south from Kolno.

Farther south the center of this northern army

TROOPS PASSING THROUGH A BURNING TOWN

has taken Roshan, and by so doing gained control of both banks of the Narew River, which will enable the Germans, if they so desire, to send a force south-easterly to attack Warsaw in the rear, or to cut off a Russian retreat therefrom. Progressing farther south, the center has reached and surrounded Pul-tusk, another stronghold, and today (July 22) the advance guards of this army are reported to have reached a point in the immediate outskirts of Serozk, the last obstacle between it and Warsaw.

A WAR SCENE IN GALICIA. AUSTRIAN REGIMENT ARRIVING IN TARNOW

Zionists and Prophecy

JEWISH propaganda for restoration to Palestine is apparently gathering force as the great war progresses. The Jews alone of all the races have not so spiritualized the promises of prophecy that they have lost their historic value. They cling to the belief that, however the war may result, the disposition of the old land in the manner indicated in prophecy will go forward. If we may accept the view of the foremost Zionist journals, their leaders look forward confidently to the ultimate realization of their hopes. Controlling vast wealth, they are prepared to use all the means at their disposal to find a way to an agreement, with Turkey if need be, providing for the Jewish occupation and colonization of Palestine. Their dream, as their journals describe it, looks to a "development on a scale which no other nation would attempt." Strangely enough, the fact that Jews are fighting on both sides in the European war does not seem to complicate the case in their judgment, as they hold to the belief that the same Divine Power which led their nation in the old days will so overrule conditions as to bring about the fulfilment of the prophetic promise of national rehabilitation. For the first time in modern history what may be called the Jewish patriotic spirit is awakened. The first official flag of Jewry, which flew at the mast-head of the steamship carrying the delegates to the recent convention in Boston, has been accepted as a favorable omen. It is a great hope, suddenly kindled, and one in which a very large proportion of Christians throughout the world have a sympathetic interest.

John Doe, Jr.

ONE of the finest acts of faith is to make a personal sacrifice in order to give an unknown boy far away from where you live one more boost toward good citizenship, well aware that you will never know the result. The writer was introduced one day not long ago to a prosperous looking young man, who had all the outward marks of good character. He was a visitor at Mont-Lawn, the Christian Herald Children's Home at Nyack, N. Y., overlooking the Hudson.

"Is this your first visit here?" the young man was asked. "No," said he, "I try to come every summer. You see, I was a Mont-Lawn boy when a street kid in New York."

In other words, this intelligent and progressive young American citizen had once been a John Doe, Jr., "John Doe, Jr.," if allowed to grow up naturally, becomes the John Doe of the police courts—the unknown criminal for whom a warrant is issued in the name of John Doe, the man who is ashamed of his name, or who dares not let his name be known.

Now every summer, among the three thousand boys and girls who are given each a ten-day contact with better things and an upward impetus toward good citizenship at Mont-Lawn, there are many John Doe Juniors and Jane Doe Juniors. It is the easiest thing in the world to let such children follow their bent. It is the hardest thing in the world, perhaps, for some stranger away off in an interior town to believe that his ten dollars, sent to help carry on the work at Mont-Lawn, may actually turn the current of life of some such boy or girl upward toward good manhood and good womanhood. But that is where faith enables men and women to be fellow workers with God.

Mont-Lawn's influences are all for good to every child who goes there. It is conducted with strict economy and the best of business management. Up there these children of the city streets are in hourly contact with refined young women, who are there for the sole purpose of serving the children's best interests. It is impossible for a child, excepting the rarest cases of incorrigibility, to spend ten days at Mont-Lawn without profit. The little starved body first of all is sure to take in an infusion of health tonic from the open country that outlasts many a withering day in the city afterward. The young minds are free for a time from all evil influences and suggestions. Those hearts that already are beginning to harden against life are yet tender and impressionable, and learn at Mont-Lawn that kindness is still a living force in this world. When these children go back to their city homes, they carry with them memories that buoy up themselves and tired mothers and sisters and brothers for months to come. But above all else, their feet begin to tread the pathway of good citizenship.

We do not beg in behalf of Mont-Lawn. We think it will never be necessary to do that. A work like this deserves, and will always have as it always has had, the ready support of the Christian Herald Family. How many John Doe Juniors you have transformed into young business men, like the visitor mentioned above, will never in this life be known. That part we all take on faith. The work is now in full swing for the summer. We are proceeding as though the treasurer of the Home had the season's budget guaranteed by the bank, because we feel that it is guaranteed by the interest our readers take in this benevolence. We are ready to receive gifts large and small. We are glad to receive gifts large and small. We ask only that you remember the work in good time, and with the generosity which has never yet failed.

Please address all gifts to the Christian Herald Children's Home, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

An Open Door to Peace

FOR many months the world has been hoping and praying that an opportunity might come when some great power, without loss of prestige, would find itself in a position to take the first step looking toward peace. There are many indications that the much desired hour has arrived.

All the nations involved in the struggle are feeling the heavy drain on their resources, financial and physical. At the present appalling rate of expenditure in both men and money, exhaustion cannot be very far off.

It is not a pleasing picture which such a prospect presents. Charles XII, after his brilliant campaigns, left Sweden almost utterly depleted of its virile manhood, and with hardly a gold or silver coin in the whole country. It is a simple arithmetical question how long any nation can go on spending $15,000,000 a day on this war before becoming bankrupt.

It has been said over and over again that the war was a causeless one. After a year of slaughter, the original source of the trouble has been well-nigh forgotten, yet the killing goes on. When Premier Asquith was bluntly asked by a member of Parliament, a few days ago, why England was fighting, he evaded a direct reply. He knew in his heart that Great Britain, independent of the original cause, is fighting now because she cannot stop. It is the same with all the others. They cannot stop and dare not withdraw. Unless some one who can command attention takes the initiative, the struggle must go on to exhaustion.

What may be reasonably assumed to be the attitude of the different warring countries toward peace today? Belgium, torn and wasted, would surely welcome the end of the strife. Russia, the greatest loser of troops and territory, might well be expected to do the same. France, which has fought gallantly for a year, has grown tired of a war that is depopulating her provinces and filling the land with cripples and widows and orphans. England, which has probably lost more army officers and more shipping than any other power, would doubtless be glad of any honorable means of terminating the strife, if she had assurance for the future. Germany, which has done the biggest fighting of all, and which at the present moment, with her own territory uninvaded, holds Belgium, Luxemburg, a great part of Russian Poland and some of the most valuable provinces of France, is in a position where she could make peace with honor. Austria would doubtless welcome any proposition that would save her empire from further loss. The desire for peace is shared by the civilian populations everywhere, as well as by the men in the trenches, who have grown sick of the apparently endless slaughter, and have wondered that it should be permitted to go on.

This being the situation, has the opportunity arrived for our own nation, or for any neutral government, to play the part of peacemaker? Even now, peace overtures are being discussed among diplomats in Switzerland, though doubtless unofficially. Some government must take the initiative.

It is not to be expected that any one of the warring powers will project into the situation a peace proposition, since such a course might be misinterpreted as weakness. Yet in reality it would be the greatest statesmanship! What welcome news it would be to the world to learn that some strong leader in the war had boldly stood forth and summoned a peace council of the combatant powers! If one authoritative voice were to issue such a summons, who can say that it would not lead to ultimate peace? And on what terms? It has been said that Germany is not fighting for the glory of conquest, but for the ultimate opportunity of national expansion and the freedom of the seas. If this be so, then why should it be impossible to adjust all other questions that might arise? Not a question of world mastery, nor of any nation's supremacy, but of equal rights for all, and of the ocean highways uncontrolled and open to the commerce of all nations alike. In such a council there need be no abasement, no humiliation, since all have fought and suffered.

None can contemplate without a shudder the possibility of another year of this war, which is robbing Europe of the flower of its manhood, and dividing the nations. May God raise up a strong power and give him an open door and courage to stand before monarchs and cabinets and urge the case of humanity and peace!

The Court of Conscience

IT was away back in President Madison's time that the Conscience Fund was founded by the receipt of a five dollar bill which an unknown offender sent to the Treasury Department in Washington. Today the fund is over $450,000 and represents the contributions of thousands of conscience-stricken individuals.

Conscience has its own court in the human heart. It sends out no subpoenas and needs no witnesses, yet its findings are not to be disputed. He the man who sent $10,000 to the United States Treasury the other day, "to ease his conscience," disobeyed the inner voice and kept back the money of which he had defrauded the government. He would have suffered the punishment that overtakes every one who knowingly violates the inward law which God has placed in the hearts of men. But the sincerity of his repentance was shown in his restoring in double measure the money he had withheld, and having done this and confessed his sin, he can once more look the world in the face and take his place among honest men.

There are many who fight against conscience, but it is always a losing battle. Such people know, though the world may not, that they are living a lie; others may respect them, but they are self-condemned. It is only when the resolve is taken to cut loose from the nightmare of secret guilt and make restitution—fourfold, like that of Zaccheus, if the heart so prompts—that the man can come before God and ask forgiveness. The Conscience Fund is a providential clearing house for troubled people who have yielded to temptation. Every one should have some sort of a conscience fund to which he can render up doubtful balances. What has been wrung from another, by whatever means, should be restored. There can be no resting upon anything that is dishonorably accrued, and that will not stand the test of the court of conscience.

Where Homer's Heroes Fought

HOW the Homeric heroes, if they could revisit the scenes of their earthly exploits of some three thousand years ago, would marvel at the devastation that is being wrought by the great war in places which history has enshrined as sacred! On the Asiatic side of the Dardanelles, the big guns of the Allies have played havoc with most of the ancient landmarks of the Trojan plain. All that now remains of "the turrets and towers of Ilium"—the ruins of ancient Troy at Hissarlik, which Schliemann and other archaeologists have so wonderfully described—is a shapeless mass. The wall from which, according to tradition, the sorrowful Andromache watched Hector's departure, is now utilized as a shield or cover for a military trench. Indeed, the fiercest fighting on the Asiatic side has nearly all taken place quite close to the ruins of Troy near the Kale, and the venerated mound which marks the site is now so changed that the explorer of the future, finding it unrecognizable, will gaze upon it in despair.

Comment by the Way

—MR. S. S. R., A READER in Rochester, Vt., sends this gratified acknowledgment, on receipt of the photograph from the war zone: "I was greatly surprised at receiving this few days since, for I did not suppose I was entitled to the card as I had not renewed my subscription before I received your report. I am highly pleased with them and thank you very much. Have taken the Christian Herald for many, many years and have always received more than was promised."

The BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

The Most Beautiful Woman

THE Society for Electrical Development conducted a contest for the selection of the one who was to be considered the "Goddess of Electricity and Prosperity." A court of even artists was appointed to make the decision. Among the hundreds whose photographs were submitted in the contest, Miss Florence Cassassa of Brooklyn was awarded the prize and declared to be worthy to represent the "Goddess of Electricity and Prosperity." Female beauty of feature or comeliness of form is only a type of the beauty that is deeper and more real—that of the mind and the heart. The diamonds of intellect that flash in the eye, the expression of unselfishness that irradiates the face, the tear of sympathy and the smile of tenderness are the charms that physical beauty effaces. The climax and crown of beauty in womanhood is the spiritual. What picture is nearer paradise than that of a woman whose face is lighted with the upper glory? One of the most perfect specimens of spiritual female beauty recorded in the Scriptures was that disciple at Joppa, who was an ideal follower of Christ and who cared for the poor, and made clothing for them with her own fingers. She died and Christ raised her up to life again. It is a significant fact that her name, Tabitha, means in the original, "male gazelle," the symbol of beauty: "This woman was full of good works and almsdeeds, which she did." (Acts 9: 36.)

King Cotton Is Dethroned

COTTON has been king in the Southern states, and has had an important part in the industries of the world. It has been the general understanding that the soil of the South was good for cotton and not for much else. Of late years it has been learned, notwithstanding the kindly providence that made the soil and climate of the South so friendly to the enormous and immensely valuable cotton crop, that it was an advantage to the soil, and the farmer, too, to have varied crops and rotate them. The sudden shutting off of the market for American cotton by the war shocked the cotton growers and threw them into a panic of alarm. And they, bright as quick to sense the situation, sensed the folly of risking all on one crop however valuable, planted their fields with other seed, especially grain. Cotton will not be king in the South this year. The grain crop of that section is enormously increased, representing a gain in value of $250,000,000 over last year's figures. But more significant is the claim now made that the South's grain crop will exceed in value by several hundred million dollars the most valuable cotton ever produced. The cruel war in Europe will eventually help rather than hurt the South by driving it to raise grain. Cotton was raised in olden times and there is the record of a good quality of it being produced in Egypt. Among the Hebrews wool and silk among the animal products and flax among the vegetable products were used mostly for clothing. The primitive use of raw material in the manufacture of clothing is thus described: "She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands." (Job. 31: 13.)

Destruction of Dangerous Canoes

THE people at Camp Tekakwitha put the canoes in a pile and burned them. It was not a bad idea. Such frail, dangerous craft had better be forbidden to all but expert swimmers. Others who go out in the risk their own lives, since the least incautious movement is liable to upset the boat, even if the water is quiet. But the sudden wind, the treacherous wave, the throwing the weight to one side in changing seats, turn the canoe over so often with fatal results that the sport of canoeing should be confined to those who can swim well. In the moral and spiritual streams, there are things quite as dangerous as canoes. Yet many love to ride in them, despite the peril. There are amusements, thoughts, acts so near the danger line that the least little thing capsizes them. There is not enough pleasure in the gliding of the canoe to make up for the risk it involves. The apostle was so afraid of the danger line that he advised the keeping away from even the suggestion of wrong in these words: "Abstain from all appearance of evil." (1 Thess. 5: 22.)

Eastern States Yielding Gold

MOST people will be surprised to learn that gold is being mined in some of the Eastern states. Who, for instance, knew that in the Eastern states were forty-five gold placer mines, and thirty-six deep gold mines; that the yield from these mines was $173,589 in 1914, and that the production was over the preceding year? Yet such is the report in the current bulletin of the United States geological from it, and is used in the market in large quantities as a substitute for it. It is the tonka, or tonka bean, found on the large forest trees of tropical South America, chiefly in the valleys of the Orinoco, Caura and Cuchivero Rivers in Venezuela, and certain sections of Colombia and Brazil. The trees grow sometimes sixty feet high, and are three feet in diameter. In Venezuela the trees are called sarrapia, and the men engaged in the collection of the beans are called sarrapieros. These collectors usually set out for the forests in February, when the beans begin to ripen. They go up the rivers in canoes or skiffs by the hundreds and gather the pods when they fall, pull the beans from them, and drying them thoroughly, they are sent to the exporter and thus on to the various ports of the world. By a chemical and mechanical process the extract is taken. They lend the sweet clover fragrance to toilet soaps, to brilliantine and other hair-dressings and dyes, to cosmetics, to flavoring extracts used in confections and to many other things that gratify the sense of smell. Every person has an atmosphere, a silent influence going out to others. Sometimes it is like the delicious fragrance of the red clover, and sometimes like the odor of the dog-fennel. We cannot deceive the public. It knows full well by the unconscious influence that goes out from us, whether we exhale the sweet perfume of the flower-garden or the foul odor of a poisonous plant. The fragrance of the personal influence of a heart infused with the life of Christ is delicious and healthful. Christ's spiritual fragrance is thus described: "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valley." (Sol. Song 2: 1.)

Gives $5,000,000 to College

THE Legislature of Illinois passed a bill granting the munificent sum of five million dollars to the University of Illinois, and Governor Dunne signed the bill, delighting the friends of the institution and of education everywhere. Dr. Edmund J. James, the president, has witnessed the evolution of the agricultural college of 1904 into a full-grown university. The $5,000,000, which is to accrue in two years, will greatly broaden the work of the institution. This is said to be the largest single grant ever made by a state to any university in this country. More important than railways, or water transportation, or bridges, or material industries of whatever kind, however valuable they may be, is the gift of a liberal education to the rising generation. Many of the states, especially in the West, have, like Illinois, recognized this fact and granted vast sums for their institutions of learning. These states have this estimate of wisdom: "She is more precious than rubies, and all the things that thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her." (Prov. 3: 15.)

Art Prizes at the Fair

THE grand prize for oil paintings in the United States section of the department of fine arts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition has been awarded to Frederick Carl Frieseke, of Owasso, Mich. Nine gold medals were awarded in this section, with the name of the late John W. Alexander of New York at the head of the list. Henry Wolf of New York won the grand prize in etching and engraving. For sculpture in the United States the medals of honor went to Herbert Adams, D. C. French and the late Karl Bitter of New York. The scientist busies himself with facts in the material realm; the philosopher spends his time in comparing those facts; the artist searches for the beauty there is behind colors and forms, and makes it real with his brush or chisel. Those who paint the pictures, carve the statues, make the music or sing the songs of a nation are among its most precious treasure. These beauties of color, of form, of melody, of thought are but emanations of absolute beauty, which is God. It is this divine beauty which the psalmist thus invoked: "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." (Ps. 90: 17.)

TOWN OF CLEVELAND'S BIRTH 225 YEARS OLD

CALDWELL, N. J., the birthplace of Grover Cleveland, has recently celebrated in a spectacular manner the 225th year of its foundation. The pageants and other ceremonies were elaborate and impressive. The center of attraction during the celebration was the old house in which Cleveland was born. It was the home of a preacher. It so happens that the only two Democratic Presidents since the Civil War, Woodrow Wilson and Grover Cleveland, were both sons of Presbyterian ministers. Grover Cleveland was born in Caldwell in 1837 and died in Princeton, N. J., in 1908. In 1859 he was admitted to the New York bar, and practiced law in Buffalo. The coming of a poor boy out of a country town like Caldwell to become the ruler of a great nation brings to mind the choosing of David, the shepherd boy, who was called out from the obscurity of a Judean village to rule over a great nation: "And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him; for we will not sit down till he come hither." 1 Sam. 16: 11.

survey. North Carolina ranks first in the output of this precious metal, with more than six thousand ounces, worth $131,141. Gold is also mined in Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, Maryland and some other states. The mines of Pennsylvania and New Hampshire have not been worked for many years. The gold mines of California, Colorado and Alaska make the output in the East trifling. But there are optimists who think that the South Atlantic states have rich beds of gold awaiting discovery that will make that section immensely rich. The real gold mines of the East are the coal and iron in the mountains, and the industries that are the result of them; they are the fields that yield corn and wheat and cotton and hay and oats and cattle; they are an industrious, enterprising, honest, and conscientious citizenship. There was gold on one of the rivers that flowed out of the Garden of Eden: "The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good." (Gen. 2: 11, 12.)

Perfume of Red Clover

AMAN from the city riding along a country road breathed the most delicious perfume. He said: "Where does that come from?" Casting his eye to the left of the road he saw a large field of red clover in full bloom, and the bees taking the sweets for honey. He halted his carriage to drink in the fragrance. Science has found a bean from which an extract is taken whose odor is so nearly like that of sweet clover that it can hardly be distinguished

IN THE CROSS OF CHRIST THEY GLORY

The Fight in Far Labrador

I HAVE been so interested and delighted with the accounts of the Christian Herald work as given in the papers which you so acceptably send us every mail, that I feel constrained to send you a line about what we are doing here.

When the war broke out, the question arose a thousand times, "What would Christ do for his country?" It ended in one of our staff deciding that he must leave for the front at once. A second volunteered to go to the front as surgeon, also when needed, but will return to us for the coming summer. Two of us, over age, and two, American citizens, thought that our duty lay right here. The decision was harder to make than it might at first appear.

The joy of life here or hereafter is that life means power to act. When the irresistible barriers of our still frozen sea cut us off from the outside world, the idea of isolation never once occurred to us. For work, work, in a place where many need you, affords a joy that no barriers can hamper. But now and again, news leaking through from a world which we could no longer reach, has sounded like a S. O. S. signal, which vessels in distress fling out from their wireless when they are in need of help. It has been hard to hear of heroic opportunities heroically seized and still to plod on contentedly in our smaller sphere. This has been the dominant emotion, struggling with the faith which tries to satisfy one with the daily task. Yet, surely in the small circle, the carpenter's entourage, the village opportunities, the Master of men must sometimes have shared that emotion. To think that he did so, helps one to bear it. As one's imagination pictures oneself possibly looking back in after life on opportunities lost during the brief span of life on earth, it oppresses one badly enough. But it seems no less pitiable that opportunities should never be afforded us, if the fault were ours. Otherwise, what a life this is here. Where can it be beaten? To be every day needed by some brother in trouble; to be, as almoner for others, every day and all day, surrounded by calls which one can answer, calls to throw out a lifeline to body, soul or mind, what better could one ask?

As I write, an old man with white hair is sitting near me. He has come from eighty miles away. He had never previously ventured from his tiny village, nestling at the foot of the mighty cliffs which flank the Atlantic. Over precipitous cliffs, through dense, tangled woods and across weary miles of frozen sea, fourteen good, strong neighbors dragged him to meet me, a peripatetic doctor, as, on my travels, I should pass a place fifty miles to the south of our little hospital at St. Anthony. On the same day and at the same place was brought to me a little lad of ten, his hand nearly severed by an ax cut. He was put to sleep and successfully patched up to become a self-supporting citizen of the future.

Filled with apprehensions of the unknown, the old man trembling asked me, "Must I go to the hospital, Doctor? Can't you cure me here?" Today it is not given to us to heal by word of mouth when the trouble is a cancer of rapid growth. "Uncle Eli," I answered, "you must start tomorrow. We ourselves are on our way to hospital." "But how can I get there, Doctor? None of us has ever been." "There are good men there as well as at home, and they'll give you a hand." "Will un, Doctor?" he replied. "Well, if I must go, I must, but it's a terrible long journey."

The operation is all safely over. The growth is gone; all immediate danger is past. He is talking to me of what he will do when he gets home. I advise him to start in doing things right now, just as soon as ever he can. Then he will forget even his present isolation from home. For he cannot get back till the first mail boat, as the ice on the ponds is no longer safe to travel over by dog team. If he begins now, he will taste joys which even the getting out of the nets, the reaping of the good harvest of the sea, the accepting of such gifts even of God, cannot afford. For the joys of service are eternal. The joys of heaven begin on earth.

So may God bless all your splendid relief work for the war sufferers. Here, out of their comparative poverty, our people sent $300 to the Belgians alone, and some thirty of their best lads to those fields of slaughter—yes—for Christ's sake!

CHRISTIANS IN THE ARMY

IT IS good to know that among our forces stationed along the Mexican border in readiness for any eventuality is a large percentage of men from Christian homes, according to the chaplain of the Twentieth Infantry, Fort Bliss Camp, Texas, Rev. John T. Axton. It will be remembered that Mr. Axton looked after the relief work among the Mexican refugees last year, and received many contributions of clothing from Christian Herald readers. He writes us that all the officers of his regiment attend services on Sundays and encourage their men to attend. From the printed order of service for each week, samples of which Mr. Axton sends us, it is seen that successive companies of the regiment have charge of the details of the meetings, provide the decorations, special music, ushers, select the hymns and look after the comfort of every one. Soldier quartets, the regimental band, instrumental and vocal soloists from the company and the community, are called on for most of the special music. The band takes the place of the organ. The chaplain preaches. On "Mothers' Day" the regiment got up a special letterhead and doubtless used it to good purpose.

Church Union in Canada

FOR the third time in five years the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada has adopted a resolution in favor of organic union with the Methodist and Congregational denominations in the Dominion. The vote was 368 to 74, and the majority the largest recorded. In 1910, when the basis of union was first under consideration in the General Assembly, the vote of the opponents of organic union was 28 per cent. of the total; in 1914 it was 27 per cent., while that recently recorded was but 16 per cent.

The basis of union now goes to the individual congregations for consideration, and if the majority in favor is substantial, it is likely the union will be consummated, although the opponents of the proposal have organized to fight until, as they term it, they have been "driven out of the last trench."

As the Methodists and Congregationalists are both ready for union, its consummation only awaits the final decision of the Presbyterian Church. This final decision cannot be given for a year or two. In the first place, the vote of 315,000 people included in 2,325 churches and 2,000 home mission stations has to be taken. After that, the subject again comes before the General Assembly in June, 1916. Should the popular vote be strongly in favor of union there can hardly be a doubt of its ratification by the General Assembly. But even when that stage has been reached, the union cannot be consummated until the federal parliament has granted incorporation and the legislature of each of the nine provinces of the Dominion has passed a bill authorizing the transfer of the property of the three contracting churches to the proposed union churches.

The basis of union has already been agreed upon by the highest courts of the three churches. The name is to be the "United Church of Canada." The doctrine is based on that now obtaining in the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational denominations as far as essentials are concerned, and the joint committee that compiled it evidently endeavored to make it as broad and elastic as possible. The highest court of the United Church is to be known as the General Council.

larger, representing approximately some 2,229,270, or 30.93 per cent. of the whole religious population of the Dominion.

In the Sunrise Kingdom

FOR a number of years members of the Bethel Mission at Osaka, Japan, have been praying that God would give us a mission hall on the street of this great city of nearly a million and a half population. The streets were high, but we kept on praying. Now we have one of the best located mission halls in Japan. The street of four or five blocks has ten churches and a large amusement building, and they are generally open during the day and nights. Nearby there is a Shinto temple. From noon to midnight the street is like a Dennybrook Fair. Since we opened, about three thousand people have heard the Gospel and two hundred and eighty-four have been dealt with in the inquiry room. We have many signs, telling of Jesus and his power to save and keep; and high on a bamboo pole is a flag reading in Japanese from top to bottom: "Bethel Jesus Christ Church." Any time after noon, the hall is full to the doors, and we had more workers we could have more meetings.

To go to the meetings, I have to ride about forty-five miles, as we have to live in Kobe on account of the school for our children. We need a missionary for this Osaka work and another for our work in Kawachi. During a special evangelistic campaign conducted by Mr. Akima from March 2 to 8, we had fifty-six converts, some of whom are now assisting us in the meetings and giving testimony.

There are three stations in the province of Kawachi, each station having a native worker, and from these stations, about seventy-five villages, something like 50,000 people are being reached as often as possible. There are thirty or more converts in there now. The population of Kawachi is about 500,000 and I think that with ten more stations every village could be reached and give the Gospel. From my journeying on foot of about 2,500 miles, I have found that the villages have been greatly neglected all these years, there being something like millions who have never had a chance to hear the Gospel.

One of the features of the Bethel Independent Mission is the "Praise and Prayer List," which the friends of the work are asked to lay before the Throne every day, or as often as possible, in their supplications. Among the things for which prayer is given are these: for God's goodness in supplying the needs of the workers; for the new native helpers whom he has raised up; for the precious souls that have been won; for the hundreds who are inquiring the way of salvation, and for the opening of many new doors for the work. They are also asked to pray for a revival in Kawachi and in all Japan; for pre-missionary helpers and for the salvation of souls in eighteen different villages.

I earnestly wish you could push the prayer list, as all of us here believe in a prayer-answering God and as the continuation of this work depends on prayer, we wish to go as many of the Lord's people to pray as possible.

Recently I baptized eleven converts in Kawachi, where our village work is located.

We have sowed the seed for nearly three years and now we are beginning to see fruit, for which we are thankful. We would ask your prayers that God will send forth laborers into this field to help with the work.

TRIKERS SHOOTING AT GUARDS INSIDE THE OIL WORKS

FATAL STRIKE OF OIL COMPANY EMPLOYEES. Civil war raged at Bayonne, N. J., for a number of days beginning July 20, when thousands of employees at the oil tanks owned by the Standard Oil Company struck for a 15 per cent wage increase and for certain other concessions. Up to the 23d two strikers had been killed outright and twelve wounded. Jol A. Moffit of New Jersey and James A. Smyth of Pennsylvania were appointed by Secretary Wilson of the Department of Commerce and Labor to act as mediators in the strike. Gifford Pinot and Mrs. J. Sargeant Cram also visited the strike district to learn the actual conditions about which the fight was being waged. In conversation with Mr. Pinchot the strikers outlined their grievances. Speaking of the pay of half the weekly wage allowed by the company to a worker who had completed twenty-five years of continued service, one of the strikers said: "Usually a man can't work through for the Standard. The acid fumes eat lungs up too fast; the still-cleaners die the sickest. If they last nine years they are lucky. So the company does not have to pay much pension. But here is the meanest part. When a man has worked about fourteen years for the Standard Oil so that he might get a pension, they fire him or cut down his rate so that when his time is up he gets next to nothing." Other strikers described the work in the stills where the temperature is "never below 175 to 180 degrees." "That's what makes a good still," one of the men said. "When they have a bad one it runs as high as 200 degrees. That's why still-cleaners don't live very long and why they don't worry the company with pensions." The sheriff appealed a number of times to the governor for state troops to quell the riot and a number were put in dress to be sent. They were not dispatched, however, the governor fearing that the presence would increase rather than lessen the trouble. On Saturday, July 24, three priests, Rev. Andrew Eagan, an old man, Rev. Edward J. Budraawiz and Rev. Felix Steelman, entered the battle zone and persuaded the crowd of angry strikers to disperse. Some of the guards employed by the company to defend the property were injured, but the number injured and the extent of their injuries is not known.

ROOSEVELT APPREHENSIVE FOR HIS COUNTRY. In an address before an enormous audience at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt recently declared for universal military service in the United States on the Swiss model, and warned the country that "professional pacifists, the peace-at-any-price and non-resistance, universal arbitration people, are seeking to Chinafy this country and reduce it to the level of impotence to which old China sank." The colonel pointed to our acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone territory as an illuminating example of the value of an aggressively strong national policy, and declared that, unfortified, the canal would at once become a menace to the United States rather than a benefit. The purpose of his address was to urge the country to "preparedness" against every eventuality of war, and deprecated in the most positive manner every effort put forth to modify the policy to place this country on a military equality with Europe.

WARSHIPS THROUGH THE CANAL. Big battleships have for the first time passed through the Panama Canal, the Missouri, Ohio and Wisconsin making the trip July 16 on the way to San Francisco with naval cadets from Annapolis aboard.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REBUKES ADVERTISER AND PUBLISHER. With the approval of President Wilson, Secretary Redfield, Department of Commerce, on July 19 addressed letters to the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company of Cleveland, Ohio, and the American Machinist, a New York trade magazine, severely condemning the publication of the advertisement which has provoked so much adverse comment throughout the country. According to the statement in the press, Secretary Redfield characterized the advertisement as "atrocious," and stated to the Cleveland Automatic Machine Company that "at a time when every instinct of patriotism calls for calm and self-restraint, when sobriety of statement is almost a supreme duty, you, as you admit, to gain notice to an advertisement, draw a picture of human misery as a means of earning a profit through the sale of machines to produce it." And to the Hill Publishing Company, publishers of the American Machinist, Secretary Redfield said: "The time is one of peculiar excitement, with half the world on fire, and we alone of the great nations are outside of the conflict. At such a time, when restraint and calm is the duty of every citizen, your columns were open to statements calculated to arouse wrath and kindle excitement, as the result has shown. I trust the offense may not be repeated."

length of the hair is and to what the upper end is attached. This conference, whose object is to find a basis for international peace throughout the islands and coasts of the Pacific Ocean, attracted many leading speakers of the day, and among the things that were said was that a "great war between the East and West" is threatening, and if China should be compelled to seek safety and justice by aggressive militarism, the future is ominous. The conference seeks permanently to neutralize the Pacific Ocean.

THE PRESIDENT ON VACATION. President Wilson has returned to Cornish, N. H., for what will probably be an extended vacation, unless international affairs compel him to return to Washington.

CONGRESSMEN STRONGLY FAVOR PEACE

FOLLOWING the publication of President Wilson's latest note to Germany, the New York American took a poll of the members of both Houses of Congress, with the view of ascertaining the opinions of our national legislators on these two questions:

1. Whether the conditions and circumstances justify the United States in entering into the European war or whether every effort should not first be exhausted to maintain peace?

2. Whether the rights of neutrals should be defined by arbitration, as Germany suggests, or by a conference of neutral nations, or whether they should be defined by the United States alone?

One hundred and nine replies were received, twenty-five being from Senators and eighty-four from Representatives. Summarized, the result is:

	Senators	Representatives	Total
Against war.....	17	66	83
For war.....	3	7	10
Non-committal.....	5	11	16
For arbitration.....	3	13	16
Against arbitration..	5	29	34
Non-committal.....	17	42	59

These figures, so overwhelmingly opposed to war, may be fairly assumed to represent the general feeling throughout the nation. This is strongly emphasized in the text of the replies received. Senator George E. Chamberlain, of Oregon, writes: "I do not think conditions at this time justify this country in entering the European war. . . . Every effort should be exhausted to maintain peace consistent with the honor and dignity of the country." Senator Henry Lane, of Oregon, writes: "Every effort compatible with national decency and our neighborly feeling for the people of Europe should be exhausted before a step is taken toward war." Senator Lee S. Overman, of North Carolina, says: "I would be glad to see a conference of neutral nations upon the subject of their rights on the high seas during a time of war." Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman, Illinois, agrees that "conditions do not at this time justify the entry of this country into the war. The rights of neutrals ought to be defined by a conference of neutral nations. The capture of neutral ships bound for neutral ports, the establishment of war zones beyond territorial waters and the use of submarines, as in the Lusitania case, constitute breaches of international law by both Germany and Great Britain."

Senator Key Pittman, of Nevada, writes: "I do not believe it necessary for the vindication of our national honor that we go to war by reason of past violations of our national rights. War should be the last resort." Hon. Thomas Sterling, Senator from South Dakota, takes a similar view as to this country having no justification for entering the war. Senator W. L. Jones, Washington, goes even further and writes: "It would be a colossal crime for this country to become involved in the European war under any circumstances. American citizens who have the welfare of their country at heart will not now be found upon belligerent ships." Senator Charles Curtis, of Kansas, believes war should be avoided and the United States should remain neutral absolutely." Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, says: "American citizens should now keep off of English vessels in the war zone." If we force Great Britain to regard rules of international war Germany has expressed a willingness to withdraw her submarines. I consider this is the proper adjustment for the troubles. I am still opposed to war with Germany, and trust that war will not be declared."

WHERE BOYS ARE MADE OVER

BY CHARLES FRANCIS REE

A BOYS' village! Made by boys—where boys are taught to be useful, to earn their own living, and are equipped with a trade. This is not an experiment, but a tried-out fact. The Boys' Village is located in the picturesque hill country of the Hudson, not far from New York. It is part of the great reformation system of the metropolis.

Upon his arrival each boy is "supervised." His health is inquired into, he is given a chance to breathe pure air and get strength into his body. For two weeks he undergoes supervision. Then he is properly clothed, his hair is cut, and good shoes are given him. A complete physical examination is made, records taken, and special attention is given to his eye, scalp and ear troubles, as well as enlarged tonsils and adenoids. A dentist makes a chart of his teeth and so puts them in order. A towel, tooth brush and comb are given him.

The village is made up of cottages. Each one holds twenty boys, divided into classes, allowing boys of like tastes to live together. While he is at the reception cottage the boy's vocational inclinations are first studied. A short period each day is devoted to gardening, chicken raising, bench work, the use of carpenter's tools, cooking, and sewing. In addition to these tests, books and magazines are left about the rooms and the teachers are further guided by the boy's choice of this reading matter. His interest is studied and the boy who is loath to leave the carpenter bench will be placed in the carpentry class as soon as his period of quarantine is up. When he learns a trade, a job is found for him.

Most of the boy citizens of the village have had little or no schooling, and those that have been to school at all are frequently many classes behind the grade that is equivalent with their years. The school is for one session a day, and the work is the equivalent of the first six years in the public schools. Some of the smaller boys, those not old enough to join in the vocational studies, go to school all day, while the more advanced boys spend the entire day learning their trades. In the vocational work lies each boy's chance for the future, his opportunity to be a self-supporting citizen. The vocational classes not only afford training for the boys, but give each boy a chance to find himself and to follow his own bent.

Many of the boys who come to the village lack either school or home training and they cannot concentrate. This lack of power causes them constantly to disobey rules. For these boys a correction cottage has been established. They are given the roughest work about the village—the digging, removing stones, laying pipes—the uninviting tasks. They work morning and afternoon, and study in the recreation periods. Very soon the desired effect is reached and in a few weeks they go back to the larger liberties of the village happy and reformed.

A great many boys go West after they leave the village, for there opportunities are waiting for them to make good. A home is found for every boy, and the school keeps in touch with them, lending them moral support.

A file of letters is kept by the superintendent from boys who write back of their success. Nearly all are keyed in the hopeful tone of this one:

DEAR SIR: I am glad to know that you take so much interest in me and all other boys sent from the Children's Village. I am living with a man named Downing year we made a poor crop on account of long drought during July and August made 2,850 lbs. of lint cotton which for 15 cents and 12 cents a pound, and of corn. Mr. Downing has a four-acre from which he cleared $168. I like and do farm work, especially baling Downing and his brother and I put bales of Bermuda grass, which we feed cows and horses. Mr. Downing gave me a piece of land to make a crop on and bale and a half of cotton, for which I received $120.30. I believe I'll have in about acres next year on the halves with Mr. Downing. I am glad to know that the village is growing so rapidly and that the boys are doing so well.

Many of the boys don't appreciate the cottages they are living in up there, one of them down here to live and he will know of a single cottage down here as good as my Cottage O. Yours truly,

When one has seen the writer as a frightened, badly dressed, his face and hands grimed with dirt, there is something wonderfully satisfying in such a letter.

The founders of the Boys' Village believe in individuality, and in the importance both of work and play of bringing out and strengthening the personal character of each boy, and in arousing the chivalry and manhood in them.

"Let's play something," the normal boy says to his chum.

"All right, what?" comes the inevitable reply. In the Village where boys are made over the process is used in a mature form.

"Let's do something," is suggested to the boy in so cheerful a manner that he quickly replies:

"All right—what?"

"Well, what do you want to do?"

This question is the keynote of all the work, for whatever the boy desires to work at, he is urged on.

The result has been a success. The boy in the village is working as the small boy plays, at something of his choice. He is having a good time, realizing that he has been set to do a task. As he works, no matter if it be a pair of shoes or a house, the construction does the double duty of training his character as well as his hands.

BOYS ERECTING A TWO-STORY HOUSE FOR THEIR OWN USE

INSTEAD OF BAD HABITS THEY GROW GOOD VEGETABLES

TRAINING BLIND SOLDIERS TO WORK

AS PASTOR Charles Wagner in his last report referred to the sum voted from the Christian Herald Fund for "Les Amis des Aveugles" (Friends of the Blind), our readers will be interested in a more detailed account of the magnificent work being done by that organization.

The misfortunes of the blind always touch the sympathies of every one; but the case of these soldiers returning home to face a life of dependence, helplessness and darkness, is the saddest of the wounded. This war of the trenches produces so many head wounds and an unusual number of blind! But for them the Maison de Convalescence at Renilly, Paris, opens an unexpected road out of their helplessness and their despair.

Upon our first visit there we were received by the director, M. Esnard. "When they find they can work they are saved," he told us. "Saved from what?" we asked.

"From suicide or madness. These men are poor, most of them are young and with wife and children. When they realize their uselessness and dependence, they are in a desperate state of mind. It is to pull them out of this black despair that this house was founded. The government could give them a pension sufficient for their physical needs, but we realize that that is not enough. It is the moral need which is of greater importance."

The vocations usually taught to the blind find their place here, and in many cases are under the charge of a blind teacher. Braille and music are for the recreation hours, but the practical work is on brushes, baskets, and willow articles; machine stenography is an important part. Telephone boards specially fitted for the blind open another avenue for intelligent work. Massage is a practical profession also. It is the plan of the management not only to teach some means of self-support, but as soon as learned to furnish each soldier with the materials for his first orders, and also to put him in touch with a market, so that when he returns to his family he is really in a position to bear his share of the family's care.

If you have never seen a company of the blind in the early days of their infirmity, it is a rather overwhelming experience, and we found ourselves with filling eyes and choking throat when we stepped into the courtyard where more than a hundred men were making their way to and from the different buildings. The more experienced walked without aid, and even conducted others; the later arrivals and the more timid were guided by nurses or volunteer helpers. I followed one bright-faced, straight-backed young fellow, who started his work with a song; and I wondered, as I watched him, what could be the inspiration for song. It was the joy of work, I found; for when I asked about his family, an inexpressible smile came over his face as he said: "My wife is in the invaded district and I have had no word since the mobilization."

All of the articles are well made and marketable. There is no compulsion about the hours for work of the kind. It is all a matter of choice of privilege. In this institution there are no rules to break, for how could there be punishment for those who already have so much to bear? "We have only to love them very much and that is not hard; and to teach them how to work," explained the director. "There is no trouble and we are paid every day by their progress."

ADELAIDE B. HOBBS

JEROBOAM LEADS ISRAEL INTO SIN

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 15
1 KINGS 12: 25-33

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Thou shalt not make unto thee a graven image." Ex. 20: 4.

In his college days, Dr. Dale says that he had an engraving of our Lord hanging over his mantelpiece. The calmness, the dignity, the gentleness, and the sadness of the face represented the highest conceptions of his human presence. He was always touched as he looked at it; but he discovered that after a while superstitious sentiments began clustering about it. The engraving came between him and the spiritual presence of the Lord. At first it was a symbol, and nothing more; it assisted thought and stirred passion; but finally it became identified with the Christ whom it represented, and excited a reverence and love which are akin to idolatry.

We are not liable to disobey the First Commandment. To us there is only one God, the God and Father of our Lord; but we are all liable to disobey the second, and allow our deeper religious emotions to attach themselves to a symbol, a rite, or a place, around which are hallowed associations. We must never forget those great words of our Lord: "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship in spirit. God is very jealous, and sends the slightest transfer of our love and devotion to material objects. The third and fourth generation may be adversely affected by our sin because of the wondrous laws of heredity, but thousands of generations cannot exhaust God's mercy and truth.

The Folly of Expedience

By Rev. Oscar L. Joseph

JEROBOAM was a born leader. He was industrious, ambitious and courageous, but he was also unscrupulous. He was for the people because thereby he could advance himself. If Rehoboam was a despot we can call Jeroboam a demagogue. He knew that his position was insecure and that he could hold it only by appealing to the selfish interests of the people. He at once won the support of the powerful tribe of Ephraim by selecting Shalem as his capital. He was aware of the great attraction of Jerusalem, especially because of the Temple. It would never do to allow the people to visit that sanctuary, for they might transfer their allegiance to the king of Judah under the influence of appeals from the ecclesiastical politicians of the southern kingdom. The result would be fatal. He thus avoided all probabilities of mishap and danger by making provision for religious worship.

It was a clever scheme and ably carried out. The calf was an ancient symbol of the creative power of Jehovah; but Jeroboam had doubtless got his idea from Egypt and he introduced this innovation in a most plausible way. Jeroboam flattered the people when he appealed to their comfort and convenience and they became an easy prey to his duplicity. They might even have applauded him for being so remarkably disinterested.

Notice, it was not a form of worship in opposition to Jehovah, but it was nevertheless a dangerous change and a direct violation of Jehovah's plain command. It opened the door for a series of corruptions.

It made another bid for popularity by electing priests indiscriminately. "Why be so particular?" ask many people as they make a plea for being liberal which really means being illegal. If Jeroboam could do just as he pleased, why should others not follow his example? This is independence gone to seed, for it produces religious anarchy and moral discord. He made yet other changes to suit the novel circumstances which he introduced. The date of the feast of Tabernacles was changed from the seventh to the eighth month because the season was later in the north. He himself officiated at the dedicatory services in the new sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan. Here he imitated the example of Solomon without having his spirit of devotion and reverence.

There were two protests against his impious practices. An unknown prophet from Judah went to Bethel and vehemently denounced the iniquitous idolatry (chapter 13). When the son of Jeroboam took sick, his wife sought counsel of Ahijah, the blind prophet, who sent a message of doom to the false king (chapter 14). But nothing came of these warnings. Jeroboam pursued his own course, but he paid a heavy price for his vanishing honors. He is repeatedly referred to in history as the man who made Israel to sin. What a reputation!

Jeroboam was at heart irreligious, and yet he was a patron of religion because it served his political interests. Constantine was the first patron of Christianity and he was also the first to corrupt it on a large scale. Spiritual progress cannot be secured by material weapons, and a stain rests upon the character of all who would force the kingdom of God in worldliness.

No Compromise

By Arthur H. Howland

JEROBOAM was a compromiser. His watchword was: "This is not the thing itself, but it is just as good;" or "This may not be exactly right, but it is necessary."

We can find a Jeroboam in every corner today; perhaps in every other house; possibly in almost every house. Someone who is not thoroughly true to his conscience step by step; someone who says: "This thing may not be exactly right, but I think I'll do it just the same." When the angels go out looking for Jeroboams do they stop at your house? And if they turn in at your gate, thinking to find one in the household, do they come to your room?

Jeroboam! The man who said: "Oh, yes, to be sure, God said that, but he didn't expect you to take his command so literally. He intended all the time to allow you a little latitude. You mustn't take your religion with such desperate seriousness. Don't go all the way down to Jerusalem; stop at Beersheba; come up to Dan. Never mind that out-of-date law that was on the old table of stone about not making graven images. The old table was lost long ago. We must be progressive. We are living in a new age. Behold your gods, O Israel!"

I notice that Dr. Meyer says in his talk on the Golden Text for this week that we of the present age are not liable to disobey the first commandment. But I wonder if there is not after all a real danger of doing so. Of course the people of Europe and America are not likely to consider as divine any other person or object than God; we would not fall into the blunder of the Japanese Shintoists, who think the emperor divine, nor of the idolaters of Asia and Africa; but are we not in constant danger of giving something or someone other than God the first place in our life? Is that not, after all, just what we do every time we sin? God says that; we want this. And when we choose this instead of that we have put something else before God.

The life of a compromiser is difficult. One compromise involves another. We get tangled, bewildered, discouraged and, in the end, defeated. There is for every situation, for every problem, one straight, clear, unsullied, wholesome way. That is the way to go—the only way to go.

The most horrible thing about it is that when we begin to compromise, thousands may be thrown off the track. Could anything be more dreadful than the phrase by which Jeroboam was forever characterized in the ancient records: "Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who sinned, and who caused Israel to sin." Think of bearing the name to which all subsequent sinners are likened; the record of the evil kings was that they "walked in the way of Jeroboam."

The way to avoid being a compromiser is to make a positive agreement with God and oneself at the beginning of life that we are going straight. If the question is left open for settlement at each new crisis there will be continued defeat. I once heard a faithful pastor say of the official board of his church: "These fellows don't waste any time deciding whether or not they are going to do right. They decided that long ago. All they want is to be shown what is the right thing to do, and they'll do it fast enough." That was high praise. There is a good deal of wear and tear in temptation which could be avoided if the mind had been fully made up at the outset to do precisely the right thing just as fast as the right way is made clear.

But after all, it is God we need to keep us true and straight. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." There is our safety, and there only. God promises to take care of us if we will be true to him. No pressure of circumstances, financial, political, social, family or any other, can ever make it necessary to do wrong. In step with God; that is the way to walk—the way of safety and delight and usefulness and victory

Be True to Your Ideals

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Acts 26: 12-19 (An Honorary Members' Meeting)

EVERYBODY knows what ideals are, but few people seem to know what to do with them. One is reminded of the prevaricating Irishman who, when accused of having no regard for the truth, replied: "Shure, I have a great reghard for the truth. I have too great a reghard for it to be trotting it out on ivery paltry occasion." I once heard a great and good man complain of a certain group of religious teachers that they insisted on bringing one's ideals down out of the sky and putting them on the sidewalk and walking on them. But we ought to have more of that very attitude toward our ideals. They help us to some extent if we keep them up in the sky to think about and look at. But they help us infinitely more if we bring them down out of the sky and use them. We ought to walk on them. We ought to use them. One is reminded of John Wesley's answer when asked how he would spend the next twenty-four hours if he knew that he should have to die at the end of that time. He replied by giving the schedule already marked out as that day's work. He could think of no reason to change it if death were to come at the end of it. Every day was for him an ideal day.

Keeping One's Self Aseptic Against Temptation
Epworth League Topic. Eph. 6: 10-18; Gal. 5: 16

THERE are many interesting analogies between biology and some of its allied subjects, such as bacteriology and the spiritual life. "Aseptic" is an excellent word to put into one's spiritual vocabulary. "Aseptic," you know, means proof against infection, or more strictly speaking, a state of being free from infection. Now the New Testament is full of hints of precisely this state of soul. Indeed there are many hints and promises of it in the Old Testament. All that is said in the Bible about soul cleansing, all that is said about the fiery character and operations of the Holy Spirit has the same meaning. All that is said about the magic, irresistible and infinite powers of love point to the same soul state. Look up in your Bible study for this lesson such startling, challenging, inspiring, convincing passages as Ezek. 36: 25-27; Zech. 13: 1; Mal. 3: 3; Matt. 3: 11; Mark 1: 8; Luke 3: 16; Acts 2: 1-4; II Cor. 7: 1; I Thess. 5: 23, 24; Heb. 9: 13, 14; Heb. 10: 10-14; Heb. 13: 20, 21.

It Pays to Buy Crisco

It pays because Crisco costs but half as much as butter, and less even than good lard—yet is as good for cooking as the best of creamery butter.

It pays because Crisco can be used over and over again in frying, by the simple process of straining after each use.

It pays because foods cooked with Crisco are better-tasting and more easily digested than those made with lard—and this economy of the digestion is one that can not be reckoned in dollars and cents.

CRISCO

ON HER BIRTHDAY

BY
L. D. STEARNS

ESTELLE REYNOLDS pushed the dainty, gold-headed pin first in one direction and then another, pursing her red lips into an impatient "Oh!"

She took off the pretty hat and looked at it, frowning. "That's the most abominable hat!" she declared vehemently. "I can never make the pin go through!"

Mrs. Reynolds glanced up from the stack of pots and kettles before her. "Where are you going, Estelle?" she asked.

"Over to Edith Weston's," giving the offending pin another shove, and shaking her head a little to make sure the hat was firm. "And, mother, don't forget it's social night at the club. My best collar's awfully soiled. I wonder if you could wash it out?"

"Perhaps so. Bring it down." Mrs. Reynolds's voice was toneless. Her hands moved slowly among the dishes.

"And, mother," Estelle's eyes were bright, the soft pink in her cheeks a deeper shade than usual, "Sadie Lee's got a new Paris gown. It's exquisite! Can't you get my new silk finished? I haven't had a new thing for ages and ages. I just can't wear that old white serge again. It's all darns."

"I was planning to finish it, Estelle." Her mother drew a long breath.

Estelle stepped lightly to the little mirror and pushed a bright lock of coppery gold behind a small ear. "You always do manage, mummy," she laughed brightly.

At the door she paused. "It's your big daughter's birthday," she flung over her shoulder, "and she's not too big yet for the seven-layer chocolate cake. Had you thought?"

"Yes, dear." The patient voice was even more toneless than before, but the woman's lips tried to smile. It looked grotesque; but the girl did not notice.

Behind her, the door slammed. Then it opened again. "Oh, mother, I entirely forgot. I got my best underskirt all mud in that rain last week. I'll have to wear it tonight."

SHE WAS off at last, humming a gay little tune; her young face care-free; her heart as light as the song of the bird soaring away into a cloudless sky.

As the door closed after her Mrs. Reynolds paused, then, shaking the suds from her hands, dried them slowly and stood for a moment looking off into the clear sunshine beyond. "I wonder," she said catchingly, "if girls ever care for their mothers?"

She pressed her hand against her eyes. Strange what made them sting so! Then, almost unconsciously, she lifted a corner of her apron and wiped a tear away.

Slowly she went to the dainty, rose-colored room above and found the soiled skirt. As she put it to soak her face seemed to grow older; all its lines appeared to deepen. The corners of her mouth drooped. She was calculating, mentally, how long it would take to iron the dainty tucks and frillings.

Her head throbbed fiercely. With fingers which tried to be swift, but were strangely slow, she began to break eggs into a mixing-bowl. "I don't see," she said aloud, "how I'll ever get through."

She put one hand to her head. The sharp, throbbing pain was almost unbearable.

Ting-a-ling-ling!
The insistent call of the bell pealed through the house, and leaving her cake, Mrs. Reynolds went to the door.

Sadie Lee, her brown head erect as a young queen's, stepped in. "I came," she announced, in a pretty, breathless way, "to tell you we were changing our regular club social tonight, Mrs. Reynolds. Estelle doesn't know. You see, it's her seventeenth birthday, and she's been head of the class always from a tot up; so we're giving the evening to her—just a gay jolly time with lots of feasting and singing, and all that. She doesn't know, so I thought you'd make sure she had an extra frill or two to keep her from feeling awkward," and with a smiling little nod she stepped outside.

Mrs. Reynolds returned to her cake.

WHEN Estelle came bustling in at noon she was bending over the silken gown. Her face was white. "You'll have to eat alone, dear," she said, "and not much of a dinner at that. I warmed a bit of potato, and there's toast and cold tongue. I couldn't stop for more. I'll get a cup of tea later." She smiled wanly. "We'll have the cake tonight," she promised, and closed her eyes a second to see if it would ease the pain that now seemed in every part of her. "I'll try and have something else nice, if I get through in time."

"Right-o!" The clear young voice rang carelessly out. Then: "I don't suppose I could help? Tell you what, ma," rather dubiously, "I'll stay home awhile and help sew. Can we both sew?" Tossing her hat aside, she advanced toward the table.

"No, no, child. You'd only ruin it. I'll get it out in time." Then, suddenly, a queer little sound seemed to come from her throat.

The shimmering silk slid in a bright heap to the floor. The white face grew a little whiter, and before Estelle could reach her the mother lay beside it, her head pillowed in the shining folds.

The glass of water Estelle was in the act of lifting fell to the floor with a crash. The glass shattered to a thousand bits. Little rivulets of water ran here and there.

Her fingers felt strangely numb as she reached out and brushed a gray wisp of hair away from the closed eyes.

"Is she—dead?" she choked, looking in the doctor's sphinx-like face.

"No," he replied sharply, chafing the toil-worn hands and forcing something, drop by drop, between the colorless lips, "not quite. But keep on, she will be. I told her, a year ago, she'd got to quit. But your brother Ned had to be at the institute, and you had to finish high school, so," clearing his throat, "I suppose mother's die long before a good God meant her to."

A breath of something cold seemed suddenly to blow across the girl. She opened her lips, it no sound came.

"Dr. Grim straightened. "Young woman," he demanded, "when has she had a day off?"

Something in his voice, more than his words, sent the swift blood into the girl's cheeks. Oh, she cried impetuously, "she can't die! she can't!" Reaching out, she caught his arm. "I told her she begged, 'say she won't die!'"

The stern face softened. "We don't decide that," he declared impassively. "But you ought to know, young woman, that you can't attempt to crowd a quart of milk into a pint measure without coming to grief."

Crossing to the table, he began to fumble in his medicine case. "Mothers don't ask much," he growled unsteadily, "but I can tell you, my girl, they'd be pretty glad of a chance to enjoy a little something themselves, if only the chance was ever given. They're human, same as you and I." The shaggy brows seemed fast to bristle with a sudden eagerness. "Don't keep all your flowers for her grave," he barked, bending once more over the silent figure.

With a quivering sigh the tired eyes closed. She struggled to rise.

Dr. Grim forced her back. "Now, no," he grumbled. "The universe's still running. Mrs. Reynolds, if you did lie down for a bit. Keep still! A woman doesn't drop that way, and go on with her work while I'm around."

She smiled faintly. A flicker of color rushed into her lips; her eyes turned toward the clock. "I must hurry," she said.

With a cry like a hurt animal Estelle pressed herself on her mother's breast. "Oh, mummy, comfort me!" she moaned. "Kiss me!"

A light, like the swift passing of an angel's wing, touched the tired eyes. "Why, little girl," she murmured, holding her against her breast. "Mother's little girl! Hu!"

THE DOOR closed softly behind Dr. Grim. But they did not hear it. They did not hear the clock strike three, or the postman dropping the mail into the box. But after a bit Mrs. Reynolds drew herself upright: "as well as ever, dearie," she insisted. "We get the dress all right." Her voice was niter-of-fact, yet with a new thrill in it.

Slowly the head of the girl was lifted high. Her coppery sheen glistening like gold. Her wide eyes looked into the mother's own. "Mummy," the young voice caught tremulously, "girls are selfish things, anyhow, I suppose. But mothers sort of make 'em so. They do everything, until we come to think they can't feel. Now, I know!"

Her soft hands stroked the hard, toil-worn ones. "You don't move again today," she declared, tilting her head like a young queen. "What do I care about the old dress, or the old club, or anything in all the wide, wide world so long as I've got you! We're going to share things, now. And first of all, I'm going to make you the very nicest cup of tea you've ever drank. And next—a little tremor touched her lips—"I'm going out to get you the sweetest roses, just like daddy used to buy. I've got that dollar Uncle Jack sent for my birthday gift, and we're going to have flowers!"

Then, in a trice, she was the little girl again—on her knees, her arms about her mother's neck. "Oh, mummy! mummy!" she sobbed. "Love you, love you so!"

When?

WHEN will it end?" I asked the sage; He answered softly: "With this age." "That will be—when?" with hope I cried: "In God's due time," the sage replied. "And God's due time—when may that be?" "When man knows his extremity." "Ah, then it must be soon," I said; He smiled, but sadly shook his head. "Oh, tell me what you know," I urged; "When shall our universe be purged Of all its wrongs and discords rife?" "When Death is swallowed up of Life!"

OPHELIA BUNNING ADA

G E E S E

By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

When folk do silly, foolish things,

Then people laugh, and cry:

"Why, they are geese!" and yet, you know,

I often wonder why.

For geese are stately, queenly birds,

Too grave to fly or sing;

And I have never seen a goose

That did a foolish thing.

An ostrich has been famed in jokes,

Because he hides his head;

And chickens run across the road,

'Neath cars that leave them dead—

But geese—they walk with solemn grace;

They seldom shriek or call;

Perhaps you'd like, for all folk say,

To be one after all!

Frantically she flew across the street to a telephone. "Oh, Dr. Grim," she cried hysterically, "Come quick! Mother's fainted, or something. Hurry!"

It seemed ages before he arrived, and Estelle's face was nearly as white as her mother's as, bending, the big doctor lifted the unconscious woman and placed her gently on the lounge.

With his foot he shoved the gleaming silk aside and Estelle, a second later, gave it another push with the tip of her dainty boot. All at once, in the twinkling of an eye, she seemed facing the world alone.

In the same instant she appeared to herself as another person, watching her mother rub out the muddy skirt, stir the seven-layer cake, and, between times, sit stitching on the silken gown.

"AFTER VACATION"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I WONDER if any among my girls—schoolgirls, or farmer girls, or working girls, or just plain stay-at-home girls—are beginning to think about what they will do with their lives after the summer holidays are over. I wonder if they are busy playing pleasures and real work for the new year that seems to begin with the first frost. I rather hope that they are, for that is just what I am doing—just what I always begin to do when July is drawing to a close, and August, breathlessly hot, is hesitating on the threshold. Perhaps, because I am going on a vacation and my heart is filled with a gladness of seeing green hills and waving fields of grain and sometimes broad, placid stretches of water, my plans loom up larger and are more ambitious than the plans I make at any other time of the year. There is something delightful in the word, "When I come back I'll do it!"

After all, it's a good idea, I think, to plan the accomplishment of great things in the early autumn. The days are blue and yellow, and the breeze is crisp, and the goldenrods and asters are massed in such glowing bunches that you want to do something right—it makes you glad just to be alive. And then, after vacation time is over, you are rested, and many years younger in spirit, and are on the outlook for new worlds to conquer.

I'm going to choose, at random, one letter from my mail basket from girls who are planning what they will do in the coming season.

A girl in New England tells me, "This fall I am going to teach in a little district schoolhouse. It sounds as easy as I live far away from the world, but I am going to teach in, I think, the loneliest place at first. I also know that the walk through the snow and the cold days will be hard to get used to, but I intend to do my best. I am going to make the children learn to read, and above all, I am going to make them love me."

The next letter, daintily written on pale yellow note paper, comes from a little girl in my own state. She is busy now, for she is engaged in making a roue and, so she says, cannot wait for vacation to be over.

"I'm so busy working," she says, "that none of my friends know me, and they have accomplished quite a bit for me. I finished a breakfast set in blue and white cross-stitch; a pair of embroidered linen pillow cases; a pair of embroidered ones with monograms; ght towels, and more that I can't think of. It's—it's great!"

LETTER from California that is signed simply "Your friend" is very interesting. "I am just getting my work together to go away for the vacation time—rather, a small part of the vacation time—for I work in an office. As I have been looking over letters and memoranda tucked away in my desk, I have made a resolution. I wish that it were not many months too late to go into your page called 'Commitment Resolutions' that came out just before New Year's. My resolution is, when I get back in the fall, I will let things stay around and will not have a crop of work unfinished."

A little girl from up in New York writes me a very interesting letter. It is just a bit wistful in tone. "I am an orphan," she says, "with no one to help me, not a great many friends. I don't like, this fall, to go to school and learn many things, but I do not know whether I shall be able to. Perhaps something will happen to make my way clear."

"I'm a college girl," writes a young woman from Canada, "and next year will be my last one. It seems strange to think that in 1916 I shall be all through the months of fun and work. . . .

I am afraid, now that I think of it, that the fun and work have not been very evenly divided. I fear that the fun for three years has had the leading place in my life. Next year, when I go back after vacation, I will make the most of my time, and really learn."

THIS note is from a girl who has just returned from a conference at Northfield. She is very enthusiastic over the spirit that pervades the place, and the influence that surrounds the girls. "Every minute of the conference," she tells me, "was wonderful. Each day seemed nicer than the one before. The speakers were splendid. Field day was great fun, and so was the bonfire that night; but one of the best parts was the girls, the friends that I made. I was thrown with some fine girls this year, and I never can count how much I gained from them. The little gatherings in people's rooms, the discussions of questions there and on the campus, the good comradeship and real friendship. It is all too wonderful to describe."

"It is impossible to talk of the spirit that pervades everything in Northfield; conference, campus, hotel, to any one who has not been there and felt it. We call it the spirit of Northfield, and know that it is the spirit of Christ. I feel that this spirit will stay not only with me, but with many of the other girls who spent their vacation in the same way. I know that it will last long after vacation."

A little secretary in a big office building in the city wrote me a sweet letter a few days ago. She said:

"Next fall, after vacation, I would like to learn to be a trained nurse. You may think that it means a great deal of work and worry to take the long years of training. You may think that I am too ambitious to want to go into such a hard field. But—but, somehow, I feel that the little I can do toward relieving the suffering of this world should be my chosen work. I feel that as I have a talent for this sort of work, I can really be a help where help is really needed."

A girl who works in a large city sends me a few lines that are full of a very wonderful spirit. "I have been asked," she writes, "to organize a Girls' Friendly Society among the members of our church, and during my vacation I shall lay plans for this work. After my vacation the real work will begin, and I cannot tell you with what enthusiasm I am looking forward to the fall, when I can put these plans into execution, because I think that it is going to mean so much in the social way for the church. Don't you think that my vacation will be profitably spent if I am thinking of what I can do for others afterward—while at the same time I am improving my own health by living out of doors?"

These letters are interesting, aren't they? And I am sure if every one of my girls who has some plan for the after-vacation time would write and tell me about it, we should have hundreds, maybe thousands, of still more interesting letters. Won't you, every one of you, write and tell me of your ideas?

How the National Dish Came Back

Van Camp Chefs Made Once-a-Week Baked Beans Almost a Daily Delight

The pioneer spirit was fairly bred in Baked Beans. And this, the world over, is called our national dish.

But it waned. It lacked in daintiness. When men became city dwellers they found the beans hard to digest. This remarkable dish, with meat-like nutrition, came on for one meal a week.

Then came Van Camp's. And since it came Baked Bean consumption has increased at least five times over. Let us tell you why.

VAN CAMP'S

PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

Van Camp employed chefs to study this dish—a famous French chef in particular.

He employed chemists. He established a laboratory, to pick out the beans by analysis.

He built modern steam ovens, to bake beans without crisping or bursting. To bake them to mellowness—to make them digestible—while leaving them nut-like and whole.

He created a sauce with a sparkling tang, a resistless zest—a sauce which has never been matched. And he baked that sauce into the beans.

Note the result. Thousands of restaurants which once baked their own beans are now buying Van Camp's to please men. Hundreds of lunch rooms owe their fame to Van Camp's. And countless homes are now serving Van Camp's, several times weekly, in place of meat.

That's why we urge you to get this brand. It has altered Baked Bean standards. It has made this dish a delicacy. Let us not argue. Buy a can. If it doesn't delight you—doesn't amaze you—your grocer will repay the price.

Peru, there are 20,000 Chinese. Lord Bryce estimates South America's population in the near future at 200,000,000. It is now 70,000,000, of whom 15,000,000 are Indians.

And the continent has not begun to develop its manufacturing possibilities by utilizing the power going to waste in its falls and mountain water courses. Lack of capital and initiative, as well as the Spanish abhorrence of manual labor, is responsible for this. But these conditions will pass with the influx of foreigners. Its commercial houses, shipping and banks are even now foreign-controlled.

But our interest in South America, as Christians, is not in its commercial enterprises, but in its people and their awakening under the magic touch of education, the impact of virile races, the freedom of republican institutions, the march of world progress and modern invention, and the spiritual force of Protestant missions.

The vision of the South America that is to be must grip us if we think at all of this vast continent. And with all the splendid idealism of its people we must frankly recognize their moral and spiritual needs, if we would make that vision live; for it is a spiritual emancipation that is needed above all else.

We cannot understand South America unless we think back to the Spanish conquest, and the dominance for four hundred years of Spanish ideals of life and government, and of the church which has so largely controlled the government, the thinking, and the morals of the people.

The love for ornateness and display, the passion for the artistic, are found in the rich exterior ornamentation of churches, public buildings and homes, while the interior may be exceedingly plain. The love for pleasure is found in horse-racing, bull-fighting, cock-fighting, in the evening promenades when the fashion and beauty of the city parades a principal avenue—the young ladies always properly chaperoned. The gambling habit finds expression in the races and cock-fighting, and especially in the public lottery with its weekly drawing. Tickets for shares in this drawing are publicly hawked about the streets and in the shops by old men and old women and little children, without hindrance. Scores of times we were approached to buy. The Catholic Church shares in a percentage of these lotteries, we were informed, to be applied in benevolent work, and a percentage goes to the support of the public charities. Thus this evil is covered under the guise of charity and the church.

The moral condition is reflected in the appalling percentage of illegitimacy, reckoned as high as fifty per cent. Much of this is charged to the high church fee for marriage, which makes marriage almost prohibitive for the poor. But with this goes the low standard of purity on the part of the men, which is not to be wondered at when better example is not found in quarters from which example should come and when one knows the villager's sources which has corrupted the mind of the youth. High praise is given the higher ideals as to purity of the women in South America's homes.

One of the pictures with this suggests the plan followed in practically all South American cities getting rid of undesired babies through boxes placed conveniently at openings in the walls of certain window buildings, the baby being withheld on the inside and no questions asked.

The educational ideal in South America has prepared the girls for marriage, and the boys for professional life. Politics and the professions have been largely the goal of the youth. Public office for private gain has been the prevailing objective in too many cases. North America has its own in this respect, as it has other moral blemishes, but the leaders in South America who are most anxious for the future of the continent confess the need for new moral ideals in private and public life, and for the substitution of service for selfishness as a controlling objective in education.

How to help South America to prepare for its manifest destiny is a big time of foundation-laying is the absorbing question. That the church, which has for hundreds of years been at the helm of South American literary, spiritual, moral and educational life, has failed as a leader is evidenced by the indifference to the church on the part of its educated leader and the prevailing agnosticism of its university students. Education of self will not furnish a moral dynamo for the task.

The issue is plain. A pure religion is needed, a religion which is a life not a form, and which will cause a motive in personal character and spiritual power. And we must begin this process with the children today in the Sunday school. That is South America's hope.

ground, until now, at points, this line has reached advanced positions only four or five miles from the railroad and but little more from the two cities, both of which will probably be taken before many days pass. The governor of Lublin has already issued a proclamation relative to the evacuation of the town by its civilian population, and the records, et cetera, of the government have been sent into the interior, which may be taken as significant.

The third campaign begins at a point a little to the south of Cholm, and runs to the Rumanian border. There has been subordinate but hard fighting at Sokol on the Bug. The Austrians crossed that river and took the town, driving the Russians east. Farther south on the Bug in Galicia the Russians evacuated Busk and fell back on Brody, while still farther south along the course of the Zlota Lipa and the Dniester, isolated actions have taken place which have not resulted in Russian advantages.

The week closes with Russia apparently on the verge of one of the most colossal defeats ever received by a nation in history. So serious is the situation recognized to be even in Russia itself, that today (Thursday, July 22) has been a day of prayer in all Russia for the safety of the Russian armies. Just as these lines are written a cable reaches us with the information that the Russian commander-in-chief, the Grand Duke Nicholas, in imitation of the tactics employed against Napoleon by the Russians a hundred years ago, has issued orders to burn Warsaw and to retreat. The conditions, however, are so very different from those obtaining at Moscow that this seems silly as tactics, and hardly believable as fact. The United States has taken over the Belgian, British and Serbian consular interests in the Polish capital, the same cable informs us, which also says that the inhabitants are flying by the thousands.

The Russian Black Sea fleet destroyed some fifty Turkish sailing vessels during the week on the Black Sea, taking their crews prisoners. Russia is making some advances in Persia, and has captured the city of Mush, driving the Turks out.

The campaign in the Dardanelles was without incident, and little news has come through. Both sides are sending forward heavy reinforcements, and from that it is fair to infer that important events are not far distant. The question of supplies of ammunition continues to be a thorn in Turkey's side, particularly as Rumania declines to allow any to pass through her territory from Germany and Austria for a Turkish destination.

Little can be said about the Italian campaign. Fighting continues, and is particularly intense on the Isonzo line, where the Italians have scored several local successes, but none of any decisive effect. In the mountains farther to the west along almost the whole frontier, there is incessant skirmishing, in which there is sometimes very hot fighting, but necessarily in such a country progress is very, very slow. The principal event of the week was the sinking by an Austrian submarine of the Italian armored cruiser Armando, in the upper Adriatic. The Armando, which was seventeen years old, was of 7,350 tons displacement and carried one 10-inch, two 8-inch and fourteen 6-inch guns, and had a speed of 20 knots. Of her crew of 50 the majority were saved. The kin still remains on the firing line.

In the West, events have been quiet. South from Hooze at Souchez there was some hard fighting, and the Germans made slight gain. Still farther south, at Neuville, to the north of Arras, the French appear to have had the best of such fighting as took place. Arras itself was again bombarded by the Germans and is said to be in ruins; there is, however, much exaggeration of the effect of artillery fire on a town of any size, so that this statement may be overdrawn.

Although it would hardly seem that the moment was opportune for peace negotiations, I hear from a source of some importance in Europe that it is expected that the situation, military and political, will be such by the end of August or the middle of September that an intervention by Switzerland, for which the foundation has already been laid, will probably take place then, with good chances of success.

Questions and Answers

S. L. Mount Vernon, N. Y. What is the divine right of kings? Did David use this right, we understand it, in plotting to get the throne of Uriah? Please name other instances in which kings have asserted the divine right.

The "divine right of kings" is largely the result of Old Testament interpretations, though it is also found among peoples who do not possess our Scriptures, as in Japan, where the odorous Shintoists believe not only in the divinity of kings, but that the king is actually divine ancestry. Indeed the close connection between spiritual and temporal power is found in many pagan tribes and from the earliest times. In some ancient tribes the "medicine man" is supreme, holding religious and political authority. In the time of Abraham we find Ishmael both priest and king. (Gen. 17: 1-2) In Egypt the power of the priest-kings was vast, and the kings, being anointed by priests, were thus supposed to receive their power from the gods. It was perhaps to get away from this very tangle of priest and king that Jehovah took his chosen people out of Egypt. They were to have no king but him, and the people, influenced by the memories of Egypt and by the prosperity of the Israelites about them, demanded that Samuel anoint a king for them. Jehovah expressed his great pleasure and warned them of the terrible evils which would follow the establishment of a king. (I Sam. 8: 10-18.) Notwithstanding this, it was largely the influence of the Old Testament that perpetuated the theory of the divine right of kings in modern civilization, since the Christian Church took over many of the ideas and forms of Judaism. The kings of Christian countries are still crowned by representatives of churchly authority, in places "holy" oil being used for the anointing. The New Testament writers advised kings to recognize civil authority where the conscience was not involved but were not in denying that authority whenever it came to what they believed to be the will of God. Indeed even the Old Testament writers are rank in depicting the crimes of the kings who were free to declare that civil kings were subject to God. So that the deeper message of the Bible, Old and New Testament alike, is a rejection of this very theory. It has been applied to teach. What the Bible really teaches is the divine right of the people, the preciousness of every individual life in the sight of God, the principle that every soul is responsible directly to God for his acts, the principle that no man should be master of another, but that each man is the comrade and helper of all. It is the revolutionary power of the Bible which we see in the world the Magna Carta and the new republics of real democracy. As for David, while he has not been attempted to justify his crime of adultery, it is very likely that Bathsheba died in obeying the king she was really in the right. History is full of instances in which kings have presumed upon the old theory of the divine right of kings to do unjust and wicked things.

Conant Reader, Goshen, Va. The passage (Mat 7: 22) must be read in connection with the immediately preceding verse. Jesus is here speaking with authority and declaring what he said to him and he to them when they stand their final judge. "That day" is the day when men shall enter or be shut out from the kingdom of heaven; when they with all their works will be disowned as unworthy. They were the name of Christ, but they were not his spirit and alien to his cause. They were in expression but not in life. One commentator writing on this passage says: "The sequence of life must always be greater than the eloquence of words. If we believe in the Christian religion and profession were but not whereby to work their own selfish purposes."

Mr. Irving Winslow, secretary of the Anti-Imperialist League, Boston, Mass., writes: "All claims for an unequal attitude by the United States concerning shipments of munitions war are futile to those who, believing in the forces repelling the German attack upon civilization are the only ones available for the overthrow of inhuman militarism, desire to see the moral and all other support now, and, we urge the actual support of them by nations at present officially neutral. In the war between the states, the issue forced upon the people was slavery, as the issue of the present is now forced upon mankind. Its solution demands the same adherence to Mr.

Asquith as spokesman of the allies of Great Britain in his only possible program for that destruction and for world-peace which was given to Mr. Lincoln for the abolition of slavery by the sword. Remember the motto of the state of Massachusetts. There are two sides to every question, but it is evident that the Anti-Imperialist League has no desire to give both sides equal consideration. The war between the states was not a parallel case. Neutrality, in the proper sense and spirit of the word, means to give equal treatment to both sides, or to let both equally alone. Are we doing this? Let us give the judgment of the situation pronounced by the New York Tribune, July 7, with all frankness, although that journal is admittedly friendly to the Allies: "We Americans will do well, in judging German official and public opinion, to remember that with some justice Germans believe that American ammunition is contributing to prevent the attaining of the decision [in the war]. Germany had the advantage at the start and still retains it. But if American ammunition bridges the gap, keeps the Allies supplied until they have mobilized their industry, then, in a sense, American ammunition has saved the Allies." In view of this admission from such a source, we submit that the definition of neutrality in the mind of the Anti-Imperialist organization is somewhat hazy, to say the least.

B. W., Menci, Ark. The gift of tongues at Pentecost was the miraculous method employed to bring strangers from distant lands into the Gospel fold. That the gift became later a cause of deep concern to the spiritual teachers of apostolic times is evident from such passages as I Cor. 12: 10, which are not meant to depreciate the gift, but to warn believers not to be misled by unprofitable or doubtful manifestations of it. God is not the author of confusion. He never sends a message to his children that is totally unintelligible, and it may well be held that a message to which there is no key should be regarded as extremely doubtful.

Mrs. Mary B. Campbell, of Elmira, N. Y., and Mrs. M. R. Valentine, of Trenton, N. J., kindly provide the Mail-Bag with the complete lines recently requested by Mrs. H. S. L., Denver, Col. We have taken the liberty of making a few alterations in the version furnished:

Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy.
Joshua and Judges show the land;
Ruth shows a sheaf with trembling hand.
Samuel and numerous Kings appear,
Whose Chronicles we wondering hear.
Ezra and Nehemiah now!
Next Esther's deeds her goodness show.
Job speaks in sighs, David in Psalms;
While Proverbs teach to scatter aims.

P. S., Exeter, Pa. 1. Neutrality means maintaining the same attitude toward both sides, not helping one when it is an impossibility to help the other. 2. If the governments of Europe had been truly Christian, there would have been no war. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is utterly opposed to war and to violence in any form.

J. O., Minneapolis, Minn. The contention referred to in Acts 15: 39 is believed to have grown out of the fact that Mark "had either tired of the work, or shrunk from the danger and fatigue that yet lay before them." Barnabas had expressed the desire to take Mark with them (Col. 4: 10), which Paul opposed. Barnabas was probably unwilling to adopt Paul's severe attitude towards the young worker, and desired to give him another trial. In this view, Barnabas seems to have been justified, since Mark did retrieve his character later, and he and Paul became fully reconciled. (Col. 4: 10, 11; II Tim. 4: 11.)

L. A. C., Ozark, Ark. Yes, even such a one may find forgiveness. She can atone for her past faults by being kind and gentle to others. And if she is truly repentant God will assuredly forgive her: "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

L. O. K., Vandalia, Mo. 1. There should be spiritual preparation on the part of every communicant before partaking of the Lord's Supper. We should not only ask divine forgiveness for ourselves, but we ought to forgive others. 2. Many churches extend an open invitation to all present, strangers included, "who love the Lord Jesus Christ and are members of the household of faith," to unite with them at the sacramental feast.

Resinol Soap

certainly has cleared my skin

If you want a clear, fresh, glowing complexion, use Resinol Soap at least once a day. Work a warm, creamy lather of it well into the pores, then rinse the face with plenty of cold water.

It does not take many days of such regular care with Resinol Soap to show an improvement, because the Resinol medication soothes and refreshes the skin, while the pure soap, free from alkali, is cleansing it. The same treatment does wonders for the hands, arms and neck.

When the skin is in a very neglected condition, with pimples, blackheads, redness, or roughness, spread on just a little Resinol Ointment for ten or fifteen minutes before using Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol medication it contains. Sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods.

For a guest-size trial cake, write Dept. AD, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

MRS. R. W. and H. W. write: "We wish to thank you for your prayers, which have brought about a recovery of our son and brother, who lost his mind but now is of sound mind and health." Mrs. S. writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer for my husband's recovery and his conversion. 'I must tell you,' writes A. W. P., 'how abundantly God has blessed me and answered prayer. When I could see no way of meeting pressing obligations he has always sent help.'"

A wife asks special prayer for peculiarly trying household troubles caused by the ill temper of her husband, all made more distressing from the fact that he is a public Christian worker. He is evidently under great mental strain, owing to financial reverses in business ventures. He, as well as the family circle, need earnest prayers that God's perfect will may be done in the home and that all its members be led into the way of peace.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Francistown, N. H.; Temple, Texas; Greenwood, B. C.; Dundee, Oregon; Lakeport, Calif.; Carlisle, Ind. A STORY OF CONSCIENCE

THE world is constantly learning new lessons about the power of conscience. Again and again the mystifying news is circulated that a man has done some terribly difficult thing or made some enormous sacrifice in order to satisfy the demands of this inward sovereign.

For every man who consents to obey when conscience makes some unusual and difficult demand there are hundreds who refuse. But those who obey find that the way is made possible for them step by step and often far easier than they had dared to hope. A few weeks ago audience and speakers at the Bowery Mission were electrified when Robert E. Hicks, one of the mission converts, who had been for some time an honored leader in the work of the mission, made the astounding confession that twelve years before he had eluded the authorities and escaped the serving of a ten months' penitentiary sentence. Twelve years ago he had been convicted of violating the postal law and had been sentenced to pay a fine of ten thousand dollars besides ten months' imprisonment. After his conviction an appeal was taken and Hicks was released on bail. But he jumped his bond and escaped to Europe and upon his return to America was entirely successful in eluding the law. He established a successful printing business at No. 638 Hudson Street, New York, married, had three children, became converted in the mission and was leading a respectable life, enjoying the esteem and regard of all who knew him. But the old wrong rankled in his heart and in order that everything might be made right he made his confession and submitted to be sent to jail.

His friends, however, not content to let the matter rest there, circulated a petition which was signed by many Christian workers and sent to President Wilson laying the facts of the case before him and urging him in view of all the circumstances to commute Mr. Hicks's sentence. This the President did, and on July 16 the happy news was brought to the prisoner's wife and children that the President had exercised his authority to bring the self-inflicted punishment of the husband and father to an end and that just as soon as the formal details of his release could be arranged he would come home. Within a few hours he was a free man again ready to take up the daily tasks and rejoicing that not only had his peace with God been made, but that he had squared his accounts with man.

The Standard of Value and Quality

The Ideal Car for You and the Family

THESE are the days when a dependable automobile pays huge dividends in Health and Happiness for the entire family.

Make no mistake—

You need a car to realize the full joys of an old-fashioned picnic—to plan that week end jaunt to "Aunt Sally's"—to keep the kiddies stored up with exuberant spirits and explosive merriment.

Right now, the long, even stretches of road are calling.

Nature is at its best and the soft purr of the motor will banish every care and worry as you, "Mother" and the youngsters go rolling up hill and down dale.

And of all cars—what could be more ideal for your purposes than a handsome, roomy, 5 passenger Paige "Six-36"?

In the first place, the price is only $1095.

There are no extras—no expensive "after thoughts." This car weighs but 2600 pounds and you can depend upon long life for the tires as well as minimum expense for oil and gasoline.

Then, remember, that power is the all important thing for the steep hills and heavy clinging sand.

What you need is continuous six cylinder power—the untiring "bull dog" type of energy which you will find in this remarkable Paige motor.

No matter where you may go—no matter what sort of road conditions you may encounter—the "Six-36" will take you there and bring you back smiling, refreshed and contented.

The velvety cantilever springs absorb all the harsh shocks of "thank-you-mams," and scientific distribution of weight enables the Paige to cling to the road without constant strain and effort on the part of the driver.

The "Six-36" is the ideal family car because it is a powerful car—a comfortable car—an ever dependable car—an economical car.

As far as grace and beauty are concerned, you will find it unnecessary to apologize to even the most expensive automobiles made at home or abroad. No amount of money can buy more beautiful design or body lines than you will find in the Paige.

So, think it over carefully. Ask us to send you our illustrated catalogue at once.

Then make up your mind to own the car which is built strictly on the honor system—the real standard of value and quality.

"What's the Proper Size of Weed Chains to Use on These Tires?"

The above is the everyday question being asked thousands of dealers relative to the correct sizes of Weed Chains to use on the numerous styles of "fancy-tread" tires shown on this page and all others that could not be illustrated owing to lack of space.

We therefore call your attention to the fact that all styles of "fancy-tread" tires require the same size Anti-Skid Chains as do plain-tread tires. For example, if you equip your car with 36x4½ "fancy-tread" tires, you will require 36x4½ Weed Chains, the same as you do for 36x4½ plain-tread tires.

The proper sizes of Weed Chains to fit all sizes and styles of tires are carried in stock by dealers everywhere.

—the BEST car that the World's Largest Automobile Factories Have Ever Built!

This new Forty H. P. FOUR IS the evolution of all that Studebaker has and knows, and Studebaker is one of the world's GREAT manufacturers. This is the BEST car that Studebaker has ever produced—and at its price of $885, one of the best values on the market. It gives more for each dollar of its price—and it gives higher quality than ever before.

More Power—The new motor, enlarged to 3 $\frac{3}{8}$ inches in bore, develops 40.45 horse power, is infinitely more responsive to the throttle, and one of the smoothest running motors ever built.

Greater Comfort—The car is longer—and is larger in every way. Has more room everywhere. It carries 7 passengers without crowding. The driver's seat is divided, and the additional seats in the tonneau can be folded down into recesses in the floor, completely out of sight.

Higher Quality—The upholstery is the finest grade of genuine, hand-buffed leather. The finish is put on with 25 color and varnish operations insuring permanency. High-grade alloy steels have been used in every vital part. And higher standards of accuracy in manufacturing and inspection have been introduced.

And Lower Price—Never in the history of the industry has a car of this POWER, size and quality been offered at so low a figure. But increased production is not the big reason for the low price. The essential reason is "—because it's a Studebaker"—because it is the product of one of the world's greatest manufacturers and represents economies that only such equipment and experience can effect.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

REAPING A FIVE-HUNDRED-ACRE FIELD OF TURKEY RED WINTER WHEAT IN MONTANA

HARVESTING OUR GREATEST CROP

AN ARMY OF 150,000 MEN INVADE THE MIDDLE WEST AND NORTHWEST

CONTRAST with the scenes of the terrible European conflict and the "death harvest" which is being reaped abroad, the scenes of agricultural activity that are now being enacted throughout the Middle West and the great grain-growing sections of the Northwest, and you have a picturesque scene of relief. American farmers are surely destined to feed the world's children during the months to come!

One hundred and fifty thousand men from every state of the Union have invaded these Western sections and are engaged in harvesting the greatest real crop in the world's history. The precision with which the precious grain crop is garnered from our grain fields presents one of the wonders of the world.

There are approximately 60,000,000 acres devoted to the 1915 wheat crop. This acreage will yield a harvest of between 950,000,000 and a billion bushels, students of the agricultural situation confidently predicting that the latter figure will be reached by fall. The average wheat crop from 1909 to 1913 was 686,000,000 bushels, while the 1914 crop totaled the enormous sum of 891,000,000 bushels, which brings this year's crop 59,000,000 bushels greater than last year's crop, based on conservative estimates.

Once again the American farmer has proved himself the backbone of the nation, for while business leaders have been afraid to take steps toward opening up the channels of commerce, the farmer has seeded his lands and is now harvesting the greatest bread crop ever known. Through the activities of American farmers, more than 400,000,000 bushels of wheat will be sent to foreign countries this season. This based on the assumption that we shall need about 535,000,000 bushels for domestic consumption and about 80,000,000 bushels reserved for seeding. Although these figures are almost too large for comprehension, they go to show what a mighty factor the American farmer is in the world today.

The winter wheat area is more than 1,000,000 acres larger than were the fields of 1914, and the condition is five per cent. better. The promise is a harvest about 10,000,000 bushels greater than that of twelve months ago. This is a fact of very large commercial importance, for the year last year was exceptionally high, not on account of a greater demand from Europe, but on account of an increased demand upon the United States, the usual Russian exports having been shut off from the world's markets. The American exports were 120,000,000 bushels in excess of the year previous, while Russian shipments were 128,000,000 bushels less.

Recent events on land and sea indicate a possible prolongation of the great war, rather than an early peace. Inasmuch as last year's world shipments of wheat were 89,000,000 bushels less than the year previous, it is easy to comprehend that the brunt of the world's demand is still likely to fall upon the American farmer, for there is little likelihood of the Russian granaries being opened in the near future. All prospects are that American wheat growers will again enjoy a season of extraordinary prosperity.

Ten Kansas counties this year have more than 200,000 acres planted to wheat, and this area will no doubt produce more wheat than most of the other wheat-growing states. Reno, the banner wheat county of the state the last two years, has 287,000 acres of wheat, and if the yield comes up to present expectations, it will produce at least 6,000,000 bushels, while Barton County, with an acreage of 269,000 acres, and a condition of 99 per cent., is expected to produce very close to the Reno County yield. The whole ten counties, with an average condition of 90 per cent. on 2,367,981 acres, are expected to produce not less than 50,000,000 bushels.

This year, with conditions practically as good as last year, taking a conservative average of twenty bushels to the acre, the Kansas yield is estimated at about 160,000,000 bushels. It is believed that wheat will place $200,000,000 in the pockets of Kansas farmers.

Kansas has 50,000 men in her wheat fields, harvesting the gigantic crop. Oklahoma has within the past decade become a wheat-growing state, and some 18,000 men are there gathering in the golden grain. Harvest hands receive from $2 to $3 per day, which proves that the wheat farmer places a large sum of money into immediate circulation through his payroll.

Getting a sufficient number of men to handle the grain crop is the greatest set-back to larger acreages in wheat. The Department of Labor, because of its experience in aiding farmers in 1914 in getting help, is better equipped this year than ever before. The placards that have been displayed in the post offices for the past few months have aided in securing a better class of laborers. Bulletins setting forth the demands for farm help have been mailed broadcast throughout the East and South, and harvest hands have been migrating westward for a number of weeks past. College students make up a large proportion of the rank and file of the harvesters. They leave their studies in the latter part of June, just in time to be of service to the farmers. Great industrial centers that have been standing idle for months also facilitate the labor problem to a considerable extent. The "bread line" of the city slum becomes the "wheat line" of the Western plains.

The transportation of the wheat from the farms to the Eastern markets and consuming centers is a mighty task. The railroad companies began preparations for this task early in the season, great trainloads of "empties" being marshaled to Western sidetracks, and orders for thousands of new cars being placed in the spring. So great became the need for cars last year during the summer and fall that even cattle cars were boarded up to carry wheat.

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS AND OURS

A SERMON BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS*

TEXT: Romans 10: 1-4

HAS IT ever occurred to you that the man who "by the Spirit" spoke these words stood in a position very similar to that which American citizens of German parentage at this moment occupy in this country? A Hebrew of the Hebrews by descent, he yet by birth possessed the great privilege of Roman citizenship. When asked by the chief captain of the guard which took him prisoner at Jerusalem: "Tell me, art thou a Roman?" he answered, "Yea." And when the captain volunteered the information: "With a great sum obtained I this freedom," Paul simply said, "But I was free born." We know nothing of his parents, except that his father was of the tribe of Benjamin and a Pharisee, who had settled in the city of Tarsus and in some way acquired the Roman franchise. Paul, therefore, was privileged to say: "I am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city." He prized and valued his citizenship, and upon occasion appealed to the protection it afforded him. Thus, at his Jerusalem arrest, he asks: "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman and uncondemned?" At Philippi he insists upon receiving that consideration and courtesy at the hands of the civil magistrate which he, as a Roman citizen, had a right to demand. Exercising the same right he appealed from the judgment of Festus to Caesar himself.

Shall We Say, "My Country, Right or Wrong"?

At the same time, he never forgets his relation to that nation from which he was descended and with which he was united by the sacred ties of blood. He thus writes the Philippian Church that he was "circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews, as touching the law a Pharisee." He says the same thing to the Romans: "I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." He held and prized both relations. He neither admitted nor felt that his being a Jew made him any the less a Roman, even as his being a Roman made him none the less a Jew. On the contrary, he uses the privileges of both relationships, to more effectively and faithfully serve both Jew and Gentile, Israel and Rome, with the same self-sacrificing love.

Surely, Paul's example and his prayer for Israel may teach us this: No man becomes a better American citizen by denying or repudiating the ties which unite him with the people from whom he may be descended. If we may believe the public press, this was recently done by a prominent New York clergyman. This man informed his congregation that he had carefully and painstakingly examined all procurable evidence on the responsibility for the present dreadful war, and had come to the conclusion that Germany is to blame. He therefore intends, at the very first opportunity, to visit the land of his ancestors, and, standing beside the grave of his father, to renounce and repudiate his native country, thus severing, so far as may be in his power, every relation with it and its people.

Does anybody believe that this man is any the better an American for having made such an announcement? Does anybody believe that he will be any more loyal to this United States, any more faithful in the performance of his civic duties, any more gratefully appreciative of the inestimable privileges he enjoys when he shall have carried out his intention? Or may it perhaps be that both he and his adopted country will be the losers for his blatant renunciation of the people from whom he sprang, and the life they have struggled to develop? Surely St. Paul answers that question. Glorifying in his citizenship, he gloried in his being "of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." Intensely loyal and faithful himself, he urges "every soul to be subject unto the higher powers," which in his case meant the government of imperial Rome. At the same time, he clings with noble devotion to the people from whom he was descended and with whom he was united with ties which no act or word of his could ever sever or destroy. Even if Israel had rejected his Lord and cast him out of its synagogues, Paul could not forget the noble roll of heroes and heroic deeds recorded in the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. He would have been the poorer a Roman and the poorer a Jew had he tried to forget them and their legacy to him of faith and heroic deeds. Likewise every American who tries to forget his ancestry, and its legacy to him of heroic struggle and achievement, is bound to be the poorer a man and the poorer a citizen for doing so.

Does this mean that I must approve and defend every act and deed of the people whose blood flows in my veins? Let us ask Paul that question.

He says of Israel: "For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God." What a sweeping indictment! He is thinking of Israel's rejection of God's righteousness; in other words, of Israel's rejection of Christ, who, of God, is made to be our righteousness. That was the crowning sin of Israel, the sin which Peter cast up to them when he said: "Ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of Life." Having rejected him Israel with wilful ignorance of God zealously sought to establish its own righteousness. Israel's persistence in this sin brought down upon the guilty nation a fearful punishment.

Paul neither hides this from himself nor from his people. He frankly and fully admits it. Nor does he make any attempt to excuse or extenuate their fault. He might have done so. He might have made comparisons which would not have been to Israel's disadvantage. Read the first chapter of Romans, that blackest indictment of any people in all human history, and then ask yourself what Paul might have pleaded in defense of his own nation. But he refrains. He makes no invidious comparisons. He pleads no extenuating circumstances. He simply and frankly admits Israel's fault and confesses Israel's guilt. He even quotes the example of Elijah, "how he maketh intercession against Israel, saying: Lord, they have killed thy prophets and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life."

Faithful Are the Wounds of a Friend

Dare we do less? I am not thinking now of the charges brought against the land of your ancestors by newspaper and magazine writers. I am not thinking of the disregard of treaties, the invasion of neutral countries, the atrocities of modern warfare, with its airships and submarines, its suffocating gases and liquid flames. I am thinking of another and a graver fault. It is this: Germany, like Israel, misled by false prophets, wilfully ignorant of God's righteousness, sought to set up a righteousness of its own. Refusing to humbly submit itself to the righteousness of God, it built its present tower of Babel, hoping that its top might reach unto heaven and make it a name for knowledge and wisdom and strength. Proud of its scientific and philosophic achievement, it labeled this structure "higher civilization" and "Kultur" and called upon the nations of the earth to rally unto it with admiration. Like Israel, it "had a zeal of God, but not with knowledge."

That was Germany's fault. But can we not say the same thing of Belgium, of France, of Russia, of England? Ay, verily! Then why not say it of Germany, as a "German-American," I am concerned primarily with America and Germany. I do not profit in pointing to other people's sins. I prefer that that be done by some one who stands nearer to them than I stand. There is but one thing for me to say and that is this: Germany, being ignorant of God's righteousness, went about to establish its own righteousness, refusing to submit itself unto the righteousness of God. That was Germany's great fault and Germany's great sin. Recognizing that, let us admit it as frankly and fully as Paul admits the fault and guilt of Israel.

For all of that, Paul does not withhold his long, prayerful sympathy from his people. Were they not his own flesh and blood? Instead of withdrawing himself from them, he asks, with deep concern: "Hath God cast away his people?" He insists: "I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart; for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." He assures them: "Brethren my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved." Do you ask how? By despairing of their own righteousness and submitting themselves to the righteousness of God. By humbly looking to Christ, who "is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. . . . For the Scripture saith, whosoever believeth on him shall never be ashamed."

The Heart of the Eternal

Knowing and believing that "the righteousness which exalteth a nation" is the righteousness of faith in Christ expressing itself in Christian life, dare we refuse to our own flesh that deep, prayerful sympathy which Paul here evidences for Israel? Or does my possession by right of birth of the great privilege of American citizenship compel me to withdraw myself utterly and completely from the people whose language and customs and prayers I learned at my mother's knee? Is my loyalty for me to "have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart," in this hour of their dire need, "for my kinsmen according to the flesh"? Or is it not rather true that I shall be the poorer a Christian and the poorer a citizen if I harden my heart to refuse to offer "my heart's desire and prayer to God" for the land of my ancestors, that it may be saved not only from its foes but from itself; pleading that it, through the present collapse of this boasted thing we call higher civilization, is now openly said to be only a thin veneer of man's natural and corrupt wickedness, may learn to know the utter insufficiency of all man-established righteousness, and thus be brought to humbly submit itself to the righteousness of God. Surely, the prayer of Paul, the Roman and the Jew, gives us a convincing answer to these questions.

Thank God, we have reason to believe that his prayer is being heard, and that a great religious awakening has come to the land of Luther and the Reformation. The crashing thunder of the great guns on Europe's battlefields is being heard to cry: "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord! Entire nations with one accord are humbling themselves under the mighty hand of God. Face to face with crushing destruction, despairing of everything in the world, they are turning to God for salvation. Shall he refuse it to them? Ah, "the Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy. He will not always chide; neither will he keep his anger forever. He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him."

in the name of the universal Christ.

A remedy for the present conflict? A solution for the present problem? Yes, there is one. It lies in a finer perception of the love of a personal God; a keener sense of the brotherhood of man; a conviction of personal and national sin that will make men cry out to the God of men and of nations for forgiveness; and a willingness to suffer personal or national loss, if need be, for the sake of right.

The pacific meeting at Ellis Island, the Gospel music instead of the noise of battle, the message of love instead of the glare of war, is possible only where God is, for "God is love" and "where love is there God is also."

—THE PEACE CONGRESS, which is to be held in San Francisco the 10th, 11th and 12th of October, will be attended by delegates from all parts of the United States and from foreign lands to "find a safe way out of the dangers of militarism and a sure escape from the pages of war."

THE WAY OUT

"WHERE LOVE IS THERE GOD IS ALSO." Across the water brother was fighting brother. French and German met in deadly combat; Briton and German with fatal force. The music of the conflict? Whirring bullets, bursting shells, booming cannons and shrieking missiles of one character or another. This over the water on a July Sabbath day.

On the same day, at Ellis Island, sitting side by side were Frenchmen, Germans, Englishmen, Italians and Hungarians listening to a man the office secretary of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City as he told the world-embracing story of Jesus and his love, as he told of the God-Man who came to live and die and live again that the brotherhood of man might be established and the Fatherhood of God known, who came because God so loved the world.

French and Germans nodded their heads in approval, sang familiar hymns from the same hymn-books, and bowed their heads in prayer

The Treasures of Darkness

SUNDAY, August 15. Romans 5: 3, 4. "Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope." Who would have imagined that hope would be the child of tribulation? But, then, who would have dreamed that the beautiful yellow pond-lily would have been born and nourished in its bed of slimy ooze? Who would have thought that from coal-tar we could extract color whose brilliance would make Solomon's glory seem dim? Nay, who would have thought that from this same coal-tar, with its oppressive smell, we could derive some of our most delicate and exquisite perfumes? In coal-tar we can find the beaues of the dawn, and the scent of the new-mown hay! And in tribulation we can find the strong grace of patience, and the radiant grace of hope.

There is no dark experience from which we cannot obtain the stuff of noble character. We can make the apparently unfriendly circumstance pay homage to our souls. "The clouds ye so much dread are big with blessing." Everything is not misfortune because it comes to us with a frown. A gracious gift can come to us in a gay and tinted envelope, but it can also come to us in an envelope with a black border. And, therefore, it is part of the ministry of believers in Christ Jesus to show to the world what benediction may hide in dark things. We are to be fine experts in growing lilies of peace in just unlikely places, and in deriving lovelier tint for the affections in the gloomy experiences of disappointment and apparent defeat. We are to make manifest that "the things which happened unto us turned out rather to be the furtherance of the gospel."

My graces, like diamonds resting on dark velvet, shine most resplendently against a foil of gloomy experience. It is so with peace in the midst of tribulation, it is so with hope in the time of general fainting, it is so with the joy of the Lord in the dark and cloudy day. When the noisome things bring forth perfume, the scent is felt to be of a perceptive kind. In Christ Jesus we are made content to give this witness before the world. It is the promise of his word: "All things work together for good to them that love God." Yes, ever the dark things become the ground-bed of everlasting flowers. "Tribulation worketh patience and patience hope." J. H. J.

God's Guidance Always the Best

MONDAY, August 16. Isaiah 42: 13-25. "I will bring the blind by a way that they know not." The greatest and most lasting achievements for the uplift of others are generally not those which emanate from the busy activity of our own inventiveness, but those into which we are led almost unconsciously. How often men commence to work for others on a quite insignificant scale, but before they lie, they have become world-famous. Like Barredo, they pick up one poor lad in the street, and he opens the door to an unknown world of splendid philanthropic effort. Like Moody, they come across a poor family, in the most casual manner, and the need of the girls for education to fit them for their life-work leads step by step to a Northfield Seminary, teeming with hundreds of young men and women.

Pole will often announce their program with much flourish of trumpets; they publish it broadcast, gather around them an illustrious group of sympathizers, and you suppose that the result will be in like proportion; but you pass by, after a little while, and in all the woodland there is no trace of the tree which was planted with such éclat. Like the Psalmist's bay-tree, it is not to be found. God's great and permanent ideals begin in insignificant and obscure experiments. We are blind to our predestined goal and the shortest way of reaching it; and the only wise policy for us is to leave ourselves absolutely to our Father's guidance. He will bring us by paths that we have not known. They may at first seem uninviting and hard; but they will lead us out into a "wealthy place." A little doorway lead into a noble house or a big estate. F. B. M.

The Constancy of True Friendship

TUESDAY, August 17. Proverbs 17:17. "A friend loveth at all times." Robert Louis Stevenson said, "No one is useless so long as he has friend." The Bible is a treatise on friendship; its main characters are portrayed in the terms of their love to others and to God. Jesus called himself "friend," and he said, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

The Book of Proverbs states that one of the characteristics of a friend is to love at all times. This means that a man should be true and act in a friendly fashion toward his friend, regardless of his friend's attitude; that he should not change his friendship into indifference or hatred, even though his friend may reveal such disloyalty. There is something great and fine that comes into a person's life when he loves truly, even if his love meets with no response. Otherwise the love of God for the children of men, which is revealed as universal and changeless, might mean merely a fickle thing, only going out to us when we love consciously in return.

Let me test my friendship by the love-standard set by God himself, who pours out his love upon us without any regard to its return.

Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or tends with the remover to remove.
Oh, no. It is an ever-fixed mark
That looks on tempests and is never shaken.

It takes time to make and hold friends. Friendship that is enduring means that some one has given something of thought and time and service. A letter with a bit of kindly thought or a little love-touch in it, a birthday remembrance, a sacrifice for our friend of something he realizes that we ourselves want—always having for him a "happy morning face"—these are recipes for a constant and abiding friendship. Let Us Draw on the Promises

WEDNESDAY, August 18. John 11: 36-46. "Said I not unto thee that if thou believedst, thou shouldst see the glory of God?" It would seem that the Lord was calling up Martha's faith to the high pitch of expecting and claiming her brother's restoration to life. Mary's faith would naturally have reached the required level; but our Lord recognized that Martha's was capable of it also, and he set himself to elicit and train its wings for this new and further flight. This is the way in which he deals with us. He pours us from vessel to vessel lest we settle on our lees. He stirs up our nest that we may be compelled to use our wings. He trains us to become his helpers in his divine work of saving men who are dead in trespasses and sins.

Martha could believe in the mighty works of a future day. "I know that he shall rise again at the resurrection of the last day." But our Lord needed as the pivot of his miracle, that she believe that at that moment the divine power might achieve a resurrection. It was for that reason that he laid stress on the present tense of his mighty power: "I am the Resurrection and the Life." Martha apparently rose to the call of her Lord, and dared to believe that at that point of time and on that spot the full power and glory of God were present and at the full. We can believe for some distant hour and place, but not here, not now. Mr. Spurgeon used to tell of a poor woman who framed a check for twelve thousand dollars, which had been given her by a dying friend. She had no idea that it was of any immediate use, and retained it as a keepsake. Mr. Spurgeon soon turned it into cash for a comfortable competence for her. What a blessing it would be if we would translate God's love and power and promises into present possessions! F. B. M.

The Pride of Life

THURSDAY, August 19. John 2: 15-17. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. . . . And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Thomas à Kempis said, "By two wings is man lifted above earthly things, even by simplicity and purity."

The arch-temptation of our times is to get too deeply involved in things that do not really matter. Our friends and acquaintances follow out certain courses of action and we think we must imitate them. The luxuries which our fathers could seldom indulge in have become too often our necessities. We rarely get time apart from the world to spend in meditation as to the direction in which we are traveling, and to take account of the growth of our soul. Consider the time spent in keeping social appointments and following the crowd during the past month. Consider the money we have spent the last year upon things that really do not cater to our real happiness; the worry we have allowed to creep into our hearts because of covetousness of another's goods, and the fruitless striving after ideals that do not belong inherently to our individual selves. It was love of the external and the fleeting that John in the above passage referred to as the pride of life which passes away in the using.

There is no sense in which God forbids us from loving and enjoying the "sweetness and light" of the world's wholesome beauties and pleasures. The warning is against making our idols out of things that merely foster self-esteem, and the attempt to keep up with the times, and the setting up of false standards of what is really worth while. Today let me ask myself, "How much of my time is really lost in striving for the mere lust of the flesh, and to gratify ideals that are lower than the best?"

The Christian Warfare Calls for Courage

FRIDAY, August 20. I Thessalonians 3: 1-13. "We told you before that we should suffer tribulation." The early Christians held that it was given them, on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but to suffer for his sake. It was an axiom with them that all who would live godly would have to suffer persecution. In later days, the same expectation of suffering has been held by groups of revolutionaries resolved to free their country from oppressive despotism. Each had known from the first that imprisonment, torture and death lay directly in his path. But in our day Christians have no such fears. Even if in certain circles religion is taboo, there is nothing to fear from the profession of Christ. No spies follow us along the streets, no eavesdroppers are listening round corners. There may be a murmur of criticism if we apply our beliefs too literally; but it soon subsides, especially if we bow before the breeze.

But is not this cessation of tribulation a serious symptom? May we not question whether the Christianity we hold is the genuine type? May we not ask whether we shall be accounted worthy "to obtain that world and the resurrection from among the dead"? We have no right to provoke hostility by a brutal frankness or irritating gaucherie; but we must refuse to comply with the world's code or fashion whenever it conflicts with the Cross and code of our Master Christ. "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transfigured by the renewing of your minds." We are the sons of the resurrection, and as such there must be a marked contrast between our life, hidden with Christ in God, and that of the children of this age; and Vanity Fair will still gibe at the pilgrim's dress and speech. F. B. M.

The Danger of Late Repentance

SATURDAY, August 21. Luke 23: 43. "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." The old divines used to say, "One was saved on the cross that none might despair, and only one, that none might presume." That there is only one death-bed repentance recorded in the Bible is not much encouragement for procrastinators. Those who delay take the risk of dying by accident, of becoming past feeling, of the Spirit's ceasing to strive, and of inability to break with evil habits, which is just as foolhardy as for a man floating down Niagara in a skiff, who risks all upon one last jump by the precipice.

Is it not dishonorable, as well as mocking God, for you to say that you will make up with him when you can sin no longer? True, God's mercy is boundless; but man's will power becomes enslaved, his feelings calloused, his conscience seared, his soul sacked by the devil. So there is nothing left but the smoke of the candle to throw into the face of the Almighty. The ruling passion becomes so strong in the hour of death that in earthquakes and shipwrecks men have been known to break into liquor rooms so as to become drunk to unconsciousness before dying. As the tree falls, so shall it lie; the unjust shall be unjust still.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

WHERE THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY. It is good to have this encouraging axiom reinforced by concrete examples now and then. Such an example has been supplied by Eugene F. Kinkead, sheriff of Hudson County, N. J., in his almost single-handed settlement of the oil works strike which threatened to cost much in life and property. Baffled in his efforts to get the state militia ordered out, and hindered by political jealousies and other side issues, Sheriff Kinkead on July 26 determined to end the strike, which involved 8,000 workers, himself. As police of surrounding towns had refused their services, he descended upon various headquarters and swore in policemen and officials wholesale as special deputy sheriffs, a civic duty which cannot be escaped when demanded by the sheriff. One batch of 42 independents defied him, and now face indictment at the next Grand Jury. Kinkead then went to the yards of the Standard Oil plant, where strikers were being paid what was due them, and showed up their leader, one Baly, as an impostor, since he was not a bona fide employee of the works, punched him as an object lesson, arrested him and placed him in charge of policemen. After that the man with a will to have his way attended a meeting of 1,500 strikers, and cooled them down with a promise that he would secure a raise of wages. By various bold and spectacular moves during the day and night, he gained the confidence of the workmen, and on the following day led a jubilant throng of 4,000 back into the various plants ready to go to work, the remaining strikers offering no opposition, as most of them realized the strike was broken and were preparing to return to work themselves. The Standard Oil Company had practically agreed to make good the sheriff's promise of an increase in wages. Federal mediators who had gone to Bayonne to attempt a settlement immediately left, declaring they were satisfied with the situation. It was admitted on every hand that Sheriff Kinkead had won the victory single-handed. He is now going to see what can be done to show those who refused him their full co-operation the error of their ways, by holding them to a strict accounting to the state.

WAR PRODUCES A NEW KIND OF INGRATE. The treasurer of the United States is obliged to have recourse to postal inspectors, investigators of the Department of Justice and the Secret Service itself in order to locate, identify and collect from a considerable number of American citizens who were caught in Europe by the war and were aided by the government to return home. Some ten thousand persons benefited by the $500,000 appropriated, and of this amount more than half has been repaid and a small proportion is being liquidated on the installment plan; but about $200,000 stands against the names of several thousand people, some of whom, it appears, must have given fictitious names and addresses. It is said that some outright attempts to avoid repayment had been made by persons able to pay. The individual loans which were made in this emergency ran from a few dollars up to several hundred.

ONE-FIFTH OF US GO TO SCHOOL. According to the Commissioner of Education, 22,000,000 of our population were in attendance on educational institutions in 1914; 19,000,000 in elementary schools, 1,374,000 in secondary schools including private institutions; 216,000 in colleges and universities; about 100,000 were preparing to be teachers through normal school instruction, 67,000 attended professional schools, and the balance were in various other classes of institutions. Of the 700,000 teachers for this great enrolment, 566,000 were in public schools. Commenting on the total cost of this educational work for the year, $750,000,000, the commissioner says: "It is less by $300,000,000 than the cost of running the Federal Government; less than one-third what the nation spends for alcoholic liquors; just about three times what is spent for seeing moving pictures; a little more than the value of the cotton crop, a little less than the value of the wheat crop, and under half the value of the corn crop."

CIRCUMNAVIGATING SUBMARINES NEXT. Four United States navy submarines of the K class will attempt a continuous run of 2,200 miles from San Francisco to Honolulu in September, accompanied by tenders for emergencies. This, our newest class of submarine, is designed to make 2,500 miles on normal fuel, 2,000 miles additional by carrying extra fuel, in the latter case being able to cross the Atlantic and return under their own power. One of the K submarines has already made a 1,200-mile continuous run. Discussion is now taking place as to the practicability of freight and passenger service by submersible boats, which would do away with all the perils of surface travel and inaugurate a new class of marine disasters, doubtless.

OFFICIAL REPORT ON LUSTANIA SINKING. Results of the British investigation into the sinking of the Lusitania made by Lord Mersey and a committee appointed by the Board of Trade have been made public. The presence of masked guns aboard is denied, also that the cargo included any explosives excepting 5,000 cases of cartridges, and that she was transporting troops. Captain Turner is exonerated for having disregarded the admiralty's advice in some particulars, though it is surmised that had he strictly followed directions the ship might have come safely to land. Two torpedoes hit the ship, the report states, and because of the immediate listing and the stoppage of the engines, which could not then be used to slow down the vessel, the launching of the small boats was impracticable. The speed had been reduced to 18 knots to permit the ship's arriving at high tide; before that her speed, normally 24 knots, was kept at 21 knots in order to save using six of her boilers. No explosion occurred after the torpedoes struck, the report finds; and the sum of the investigation is that the act was "a deliberate attempt to murder the passengers on board the ship."

A VASTLY IMPORTANT ITEM OVERLOOKED. We find that we failed to tell our readers at the right time that Harry K. Thaw, the murderer of Stanford White, who escaped from Matteawan, where he had been committed as incurably insane at the time of the murder (and hence not responsible to the law for that deed), has been adjudged sane at a lengthy hearing in the Supreme Court of New York, and given his freedom.

NEW ALLY OF TEMPERANCE. Leaders of finance and industry are about to engage in a movement to prove that the drinking of intoxicants is a serious handicap in the race for position, preferment and even a job. That temperance makes for efficiency will be the one plank in the platform of the new organization. The fact itself is not a new discovery; but if the report of this new effort to prove it is correct, the saloonless nation comes into clearer view at once.

NOT EXACTLY PULLING WIRES FOR VOTES. On July 29 the woman suffragists of New York state essayed to poll the male population by telephone, on the question of putting an equal suffrage clause in the new state constitution, hundreds of thousands of calls being made, the responses from all classes being by quite a majority in favor of the proposal, according to statements given to the press. Not every notable was caught by the clever plan, but many who had not previously committed themselves were reported as having courageously admitted their equal suffrage belief over the wire.

TOO LATE, AS USUAL.

EASTLAND INVESTIGATION PROCEEDS SLOWLY. Several official and semi-official boards of inquiry are attempting to fix the blame for the disaster in the Chicago River by which 836 persons are known to have perished, with 158 still to be accounted for, and still the cause remains undetermined. The captain and the engineer of the boat have been arrested and also two Federal steamboat inspectors. Secretary Redfield of the Department of Commerce is conducting the examination of the steamboat inspection, that Federal service being especially under fire. Prominent citizens have bitterly assailed the secretary for alleged attempts to shift the blame from his department. The lieutenant governor of Illinois, Barrett O'Hara, acting as governor, publicly stated that the highest monument that could be constructed to the memory of the Eastland dead might consist of revised laws covering the United States steamboat inspection service. A Federal grand jury and a county grand jury are both taking testimony, also a civilian advisory committee; and the Chicago city council has asked President Roosevelt to appoint a special commission of investigation.—One of the horrors of this horror was a panic on the excursion steamer Republic, running from New York to Rockaway Beach Sunday, August 1, created by a barroom fight and a stampede of passengers to one side, which threw the three thousand passengers into a frenzy of fear lest they share the fate of Western Electric employees and their friends. A serious, shameful riot was quelled by the sternness of the officer, the boat was landed safely.

THE VATICAN DEMANDS PEACE. Pope Benedict on the anniversary of the declaration of war, July 28, addressed a uniform letter to the rulers of the belligerent countries in which he says: "It is our firm determination to devote every activity to a reconciliation of the peoples engaged in this fratricidal struggle. Today, on the sad anniversary of the outbreak of this tremendous conflict, there issues from our heart an earnest prayer for the cessation of the war. It must be said that this conflict cannot be settled without armed violence. Put away mutual desire for destruction, and reflect that nations do not die. If humiliated and oppressed, they prepare to retaliate by transmitting from generation to generation hatred and a desire for revenge. Why should not a direct or indirect exchange of views be initiated in an endeavor to arrange aspirations so that all should be contented? This is our cry for peace, and we invite all friends of peace to unite with us in our desire to terminate this war and establish an empire of right, resolving henceforth to solve differences, not by the sword, but by equity and justice." The opinion expressed in the press that this appeal for peace was tantamount to an offer of mediation, made after realizing that the United States may not be able to take the lead in that direction, and as it is supposed that the Pope would not make such an effort if he knew it to be futile, the Italian press professes to believe that he must have had some reason to hope that his appeal "would not fall on deaf ears." The publication of the Pope's address produced a great many commendations of the Pope's initiative with offers of assistance.

A YEAR OF RED CROSS WORK IN EUROPE. It has been announced that the Red Cross will withdraw its work from the fields of war, excepting Belgium, by October 1. During the year now closed the American society has expended $1,400,000 in its work in Europe, the greatest service of its history. It has a balance on hand of about $175,000. Every country engaged in the war has shared in this beneficence. Expenditures include $356,000 in salaries to surgeons and nurses (71,000 men and 253 nurses), $250,000 for maintenance and travel arrangements; $355,000 for supplies. Nearly 100,000 bandages, over a million surgical dressings and pads, many yards of gauze, and similar large quantities of material other articles were taken to Europe by the Red Cross party.

BECKER RECEIVES HIS WAGES. Charles Becker, a former New York police lieutenant, was electrocuted at Sing Sing at 5:45 A.M., Friday, July 30, for instigating the murder of Herman Rosenthal by gunmen, which occurred early in the morning of July 16, 1912, the motive being to prevent the gambler Rosenthal exposing Becker and others as gamblers and grafters. The task of finding and prosecuting the guilty parties fell to District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, now governor of the state. Through information supplied by Jack Rosenthal, Vallon and Bridgie Webber, confederates in the crime (who were granted immunity as the price of their testimony), Becker and four gunmen, "Gyp the Blood," "Whitey Lewis," "Lefty Louis," and "Dago Frank," were arrested, tried and convicted. The four tools were executed April 13, 1914, at the chief mover in the affair secured a new trial after being sentenced to die December 9, 1913. (Becker was tried first, which explains how the date of execution of the others was so much later than his). At the second trial Becker was again convicted, and sentenced to die, but a stay was obtained, which he was able to keep up the fight for his life almost a year; but in May of this year the Court of Appeals reversed the conviction, and Becker was sentenced to die July 30. His counsel secured a further stay of two days pending a review of alleged new evidence by Justice John Ford of the Supreme Court, but the result was against the condemned man, and his wages of his sin were meted out to him by the law, as usual.

ALL ABOARD THAT'S GOING. On July 26 the Panama Pacific Exposition passed the 9,000,000 mark, leaving only about 90,000,000 of us still to attend, with four months left in which to do it.

"GIVE THE FLOWERS TO THE LIVING!" What a sole comment, a correspondent sends us a news clipping which it is a relief to read in connection with the announcement that the traffic in munitions of war is still steadily increasing, and that every effort is being made to secure and fill huge cargoes. The item is as follows: "Buffalo, N. Y., July 21.—The Buffalo Metal Ware Company today refused an $8,000,000 contract for the manufacture of cartridges for the Allies. James Osterman, treasurer of the company, explaining why it was refused, said: 'The directors decided that the company would not manufacture any article for this war that would involve the loss of human life. There are higher standards in business than the accumulation of profits.'"

GOOD NEWS FOR RADIUM USERS. The Federal Bureau of Mines announces that the manufacture of radium from carnotite ores is now a successful process, the wonder mineral being produced at a cost of $36,050 per gram, the price of which formerly was between $120,000 and $100,000. The public is cautioned, however, not to be too sanguine of an immediate drop in the retail price: radium is not yet used for lighting and heating purposes. Surgeons are still using radium in the treatment of cancer, and its practical application leads Secretary Lane to urge that the government take steps to conserve radium deposits in Colorado and Utah and that the ores may be found in this country.

Turkey in the Summertime

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Turkeys in the summertime, with azure sky above them,
Bronze and blue and scarlet too, upon the velvet plain;
All the joy of living when the world is at its sweetest,
Kissed with golden sunshine and with fragrant silver rain.

Turkeys in the summertime, with gentle breezes blowing,
Silence deep like restful sleep, and shadows on the grass;
Waves of peace that settle down upon the trampled pasture,
Birds that swiftly flutter by and murmur as they pass.

Turkeys in the summertime, a mass of vivid color,
Throaty cries and beady eyes—they do not guess their fate!
Turkeys in the summertime, a living glowing picture,

But—turkey in the wintertime upon a steaming plate!

A MISSIONARY TOUR IN HONDURAS

BY REV. THEODORE REINKE*

FOR many years the Miskito Indians of eastern Honduras have been raising the Macedonian cry to the Moravian missionaries among their race in Nicaragua territory. Thanks principally to the self-denial offerings of the Bluefield Moravian Sunday schools, it became possible in the spring of last year for two of us to visit every Miskito village of importance in this neglected and dark part of Honduras.

Saying farewell to civilization at the little town of Puerto Cabo Gracias a Dios, at the northeast corner of Nicaragua, about thirty or thirty-five miles of beach were traversed the first day. Two days were spent in an Indian village at False Cape, where there is a small, wattled, leaf-thatched meeting-house, and where there are a number of Christians and candidates, all under the care of the missionary stationed at Cabo Gracias a Dios. We collected these people on our errand and called for volunteers to accompany us and to assist in carrying the Gospel to their countrymen. After several palavers, seven men and three women were found willing to go. On their advice we decided the plan of visiting the inland villages on our way west and touching the coast villages on the return.

This country is flat and scarcely above sea level. A group of villages clusters about the mouth of the Kruta River, which empties into the Caribbean at False Cape. From here it is no more than a day's travel up river to the next group of villages, called Laka. We camped the first night in a little banana clearing, where the owner of our immense dug-out canoe had a thatched shed. On landing, a few little monkeys were spied, and great was the delight among the natives when one was shot, for their flesh is prized. In a short time the bare shed was magically transformed. While the women were busy baking and peeling green bananas, and boiling coffee around the fire, the rest were bringing in the great banana leaves for beds on the ground. Each member of the party had his own square cloth mosquito bar, which affords some privacy in addition to protection from bloodthirsty insects. These little shelters were quickly hung in a row, and a miniature white city was the result. The effect was quite striking in the light of the pitch pine torches, which flared brightly as we read from the Miskito Testament stories from the life of Jesus.

THE Laka villages are widely scattered. To reach the first village of but five houses, we had to tramp for two hours, and at last wade almost knee-deep in mud and water. The people elect to live on little islands in the midst of these flats on account of their cattle; but in the dry season the water is so low that all their food supply, principally bananas, has to be carried by ponies or women from the riverside.

Our hosts showed us a great deal of kindness. We were given the freedom of the largest house and were provided with bananas, casava, eggs, fowl, and coconuts. As far as we could discover, these people had never come in contact with the Gospel; but they were glad to listen, and not only received us hospitably, but furnished us with horses and guides, and did all they could to help us on our way, with no thought of remuneration. They were far removed from traders as well as missionaries. The housewives were more industrious than their more civilized sisters farther south. A crude native loom stood against the wall, and samples of heavy cloth, or canvas, made from cotton which here grows on plants the size of trees, were in evidence. Hammocks made of cord spun from the inner bark of the mahoe tree were plentiful. The art of tanning leather and making moccasins is also known.

A SEAWARD village was made the next stopping place. An honest old man who was our host begged us to appeal to the English king for redress against what he regarded as the oppression of the government officials, who visit them occasionally and tax them for their cattle. We had some difficulty in explaining that we were commissioners of the King of kings. One of the young men, after listening to our Gospel talk, said: "You teach a good law, but we have no one to show us how to follow it." This old man supplied us with two boats and accompanied us with his chief, wife on the long journey to Tansen on the inland side of Lake Karataska. As we were crossing the lake—so wide that in some directions one cannot see the shore—the wind began to rise, and we were in danger of being swamped. The old man did his best with his paddle, but took time to utter a heathen's prayer to the Ruler of all: "Master, take care; don't you see how the waves are rising and your servants have not yet reached land?"

Back of this immense Karataska Lagoon are four other large lagoons, into one of which the Ibantara River empties. About its shores there is a small Miskito population. A man of this neighborhood, who had the promising name of "Morning Star," owned a large dug-out canoe, which he agreed to lend us and to accompany us on our way. His was the only family at home in his little village, every one else having crossed the Karataska Lagoon to attend a "Siko," or ghost-expelling drinking bout. Morning Star's mother-in-law was a most repulsive-looking creature—a good model for a witch of Endor painting—but when we left her she said: "Pray for me."

Fourteen hours of paddling and sailing brought us through three of the lagoons to the small settlements along the Butuk River. When we told our Gospel errand to a rather unpromising-looking man in the first village, he said frankly: "That's right! Come and teach us and leave a teacher here to tame us wild people. We have tongues a foot long, and we kill each other. We do not keep our Father's law." We had great difficulty in securing transportation down river. A boat-load of merchandise, mainly rum, had been brought over the route the day before, and almost every man was suffering from the effects of its presence in this region.

In twelve hours' travel with the river current, we did not encounter a single human being nor any habitation of man. The banks of the river, however, literally swarmed with iguanas. It was the time of the year when they lay their eggs, and wherever a high sandbank stood out it was honeycombed with their burrows. Our people caught them with their hands. Iguana flesh is superior to chicken, though the eggs are not as good as turtle eggs.

AT the mouth of the Plantain River, between Black River and Brewer's Lagoon Bar, a few Indians of the Paya tribe were encountered. Most of their people live far inland. They resemble the Sumu Indians of the hinterland of Nicaragua, but have a language quite distinct from theirs. At a village at the eastern mouth of the Butuk River we were received most cordially. Some relatives of our party had their homes here, and we were feasted on milk and native rice, besides the ubiquitous green bananas. The Word of the Lord met with a most hearty response, and the people were very loath to have us go.

In about thirty-six miles of walking after leaving this place, we saw only one house; and at the little village of Uhi, only four. Our host at Uhi was a desperate-looking character, and the houses and the rest of the people were filthy and repellent. We were insulted (according to the Miskito code) by being called wild, and threatened with divine wrath, if we did not stay to hold a meeting. It seemed that Dama Blas, our host, had heard somewhere about the meetings that padres keep, and got the idea that one of them would surely bring good luck to his place! We confess to having had a good deal of sympathy just then for the fiery disciples named Boanerges.

Half a day's march from the Kruta River we reached the Kaukirra group of villages—the poorest houses of any we had yet seen. Here we discovered a heathen preacher, who actually possesses part of an English Bible, which of course he cannot read. A few families from Grand Caymans live in this neighborhood, and raise cattle and coconuts. They say that since the cessation of mahogany cutting, the Indians have no money.

Kruta was reached on Maundy Thursday, and we had a real missionary meeting on Good Friday. That night we journeyed on to Cabo Gracias a Dios and arrived there on the morning of our twenty-ninth day, having covered, as nearly as we can estimate, a distance of from four hundred and fifty to four hundred and seventy-five miles.

There is no question about the spiritual needs of these poor heathen Miskitos in Honduras; the state of their bodies and of their dwellings witnesses clearly enough on that point. The population is very scattered. In all the region beyond the direct neighborhood of the Wangks River there are only 526 Miskito houses, which, with five to a house, fixes the population at less than 3,000. The little groups of houses are often a day's journey apart. There are no roads, no bridges, and no canals by which one might connect from one inland waterway to another. No one is caring for the spiritual wants of these people. No school is kept for the children. There is not a doctor in the whole region. Aside from a little cattle and coconut raising and an uncertain mining venture up the Butuk River, absolutely nothing seems to be done in an industrial way.

Were we able to man a station at False Cape (Kruta), where the little meeting-house already stands, more than half the Honduras Miskitos would be as much within reach of a missionary as are the Miskitos along the Wangks River. Last year the General Synod of the Moravian Church conceded the importance of occupying this point, but the terrible war has again dashed the hope of extension. Meanwhile these people must continue in darkness. They welcomed the light when they caught a glimpse of it. They begged us to stay longer and teach them more. They wanted us to come back again. They have heard that Christ died for them, and they want to learn how to live to please him. Will you, reader, not remember the request of the old woman who begged us to pray for her, and will you not then pray, too, that the way may open to bring her and her people into the light of the Gospel?

Why Not?

AS we enter on the second year of the great war, we instinctively glance backward to the tremendous harvest that death has reaped in these twelve months. We may well stop and ask ourselves whether we, as a nation professing the love of peace and humanity, have done all that lay within our power to bring order out of the world-wide chaos. Have we done and are we now doing our absolute best to impress upon Europe the value of the principles we claim to represent?

We are a patriotic people. We love our country. But we also recognize a higher patriotism which knows no geographical boundaries, and which sees in every man a friend and a brother, and acknowledges the bond of kinship with the whole human race. This world-patriotism is one that reaches out, as our American benevolence has done, to all lands and peoples alike. If this service is due to all, in what way can it best be practically exemplified now, after we have seen the world in deadly strife a whole year?

From Amsterdam comes the news that the anti-war council at The Hague has appealed to the European powers in protest against the prolongation of the war. It is announced as the purpose of the council to sound the Netherlands Government with a view to inducing it to place the case before the belligerent powers. To make this movement effective, the active co-operation of all the neutral nations is necessary. As a leader among the neutrals, this task of unifying the forces of peace and humanity is one we should willingly accept.

Across the Atlantic they are praying that the war may reach an end. Their prayers ascend with our own. Those twelve months have filled the homes of Europe with mourning. People have grown despondent and hopeless, as they saw the ceaseless marching of the vast armies, the fighting and the killing, and as they listened to the encouragement of war from pulpits and altars. They are tired of sending their best and bravest to slaughter, and now, in almost every land, many voices are beginning to be raised in protest. They are appalled at the prospect of Greece, the Balkans, Spain and even Sweden joining the struggle. They are looking expectantly to the neutral nations for help. Their hope must not be disappointed.

American observers in Europe have been impressed with the growth of the peace element. Jane Addams has declared her belief that the old world at heart is sick of war, and that the contending powers would not hesitate to consider peace proposals, although no one power desires to take the initiative. It must clearly be the task of the neutrals to unite in any overtures of peace, if such are to be made. All the non-combatant lands have been sufferers in their commerce and shipping by the war, and some in the loss of citizens' lives. Thus, both by their own national interests as well as by the common claims of humanity, they are in a position to assert the right to be heard. If all the neutrals, acting together, and moved by the spirit of friendly conciliation, were to propose a conference with the warring powers, through their representatives, the first important step would have been taken in the right direction.

It is not necessary now to speculate upon the possibilities of such an event, nor the influence it might exert on the future of the world. All that can now be said is that if peace is ever to be brought about, instead of permitting the war to go on to the point of exhaustion, it must come through the first step being taken by some power which has the courage to do this, in the name and with the authority of all the neutral governments.

This is the problem with which the administration at Washington can deal. After a whole year of war, it could not be regarded as premature. Instead of looking ahead to the prospect of entering the war, the American people as a whole choose rather to study how they may practically advance the cause of peace. It is true, diplomacy has not helped us appreciably thus far; indeed, it has rather added to our complications; but as the advocate of a serious effort to establish a basis for a mutual understanding in troubled Europe, our entire relations with other governments would instantly undergo a material change. We could be no longer regarded, either by Allies or Teutons, as a possible opponent but as a friend. And the strong moral support, not of neutrals alone, but of the widespread peace element in every country, which such a movement must command, would justify the course we had taken.

World-patriotism is the patriotism of Christianity. We have an opportunity now to exemplify it, and to reach the hearts and consciences of the world's leaders in the fields of thought and action. We may even hope, with favoring circumstances, to lay the basis of world-peace. Everything recoils at the prospect of a continuance of the present waste of precious life, the destruction of property, the impoverishment of all the nations. Let us make a supreme effort, all the neutral powers together for the good of the whole. To accomplish this we must be willing to sacrifice all other considerations. We must come, not with individual demands, each nation urging its own grievances, but free and unembarrassed and with no other purpose than the welfare of all. God blesses renunciation, and if we would help to save the world, we must renounce every interest, great or small, that would stand in the way of its accomplishment.

More Victims of Mammon

ANOTHER sickening event has given the world a fresh revelation of the power of greed. How long will the American people be willing to trust their lives and the lives of their little ones into the hands of a commercial and industrial system whose god is Gain?

The Eastland disaster in Chicago is the most shocking example since the Triangle disaster in New York City of the fiendish cruelty of the present day spirit and method of business. The Eastland was unseaworthy. This was common knowledge among all the navigation circles of Chicago and the government inspectors. She had been sold soon after her construction for half her original value; the dockmaster had warned her captain that she did not sail right; everybody familiar with Chicago shipping knew that the Eastland was a peril. Yet because profits were to be made from her use she was continued in service and only a short time ago her capacity, which should have been lessened by the authorities, was increased, granting her owners permission to carry five hundred more passengers than formerly.

One of the most horrible features of this latest disaster is the great number of babies and tiny children who were lost. Indeed their very presence had much to do with the disaster, because children under five years were not required to have tickets. At the coroner's inquest State's Attorney Hoyne said that he had the stubs of 2,550 tickets collected at the gangway and that on these no children under five years were counted. Between five and twelve years two children were allowed on one ticket; so that the presence of these hundreds of babies and children helped to swell the precious cargo of human life which taxed the faulty craft far past its power.

Wednesday, July 28, was Black Wednesday in Chicago. Approximately seven hundred burial services of the steamer's victims took place on that day. May not America do something to honor these pitiful dead? Black Wednesday should be a day celebrated in Illinois from year to year. And every year the citizens of that state and other states should ask themselves the question—what progress has been made toward the time when profits shall have ceased to be the only law of business, when the protection and prolonging of life for all, rather than the enrichment of a few by the oppression and spoliation of the life of the many, shall have been made America's law?

The Glorious Fellowship

MANY very worthy Christian people are sorely troubled because of their imperfections. They find it a superhuman task to keep God's law—to render a perfect service and a complete obedience. God's law is one body, the outspoken will and nature of the divine Creator, whether found in the Ten Commandments or as set forth and illustrated in the teachings and the living presence of Jesus Christ. Whosoever treats that law with violence at any point strikes a blow at the whole system of divine government. How impossible, then, for a man to be saved on his moral record, his upright life; for even though he should keep the whole law except at one point, he would still be rendering an incomplete obedience, an imperfect service, condemnable and differing only in degree from one who is completely besmirched by sin. There are degrees of goodness and of wickedness, and our Father above takes account of these. He sympathizes with every brave and earnest struggle on our part. Even when we are reproaching ourselves most bitterly for our pitiful failures, we are reminded that the divine compassion takes account of all our efforts and is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. One of us may reach perfection this side heaven; but we take Christ into our hearts and lives, if we are Saviour, Companion, Guide, then all our vexatious shortcomings are swallowed up in his completeness and our very weakness becomes our strength. The old law, formerly our constant accuser, is silenced and silenced, not by any merit of ours, but through Him who takes away all our sins and covers us with his own righteousness. And as the wonderful transformation progresses, we become more and more like him, and the lure of sin and world loses its power over us. Moments of weakness may come and strong temptations may assail, but we keep close to Christ and in constant daily communion with him, we shall be given strength to overcome. This is the glorious fellowship which should be the aim and desire of every true man and woman. It gives us strength to achieve and to endure, it meets all our needs, and brings to the soul that peace, comfort and joy which the world can neither give nor take away.

Three Kinds of Schools

AN interesting analysis of three national systems of education was made the other day by Dr. James Earl Russell, dean of Teachers' College of Columbia University, before the students attending the summer classes there. Dr. Russell said:

The German tells you that social order and the welfare of the state depends on having the masses submissive and obedient and obtaining capable leaders. England has given little heed until lately to the training of her masses. Everything has been concentrated on the leaders who have received an individual training. It was thought that the people could be made submissive and loyal by means of religious instruction and grindir training. This has been improved by the popular education of late years.

Both these systems are designed to keep part of the population down; we [Americans] believe in equal opportunity for all. We have hoped that a trained people would follow wise leaders deliberately and of their own volition. Can this be a safe ideal for any country to adopt? We know that the great majority of our school children at 18 or 20 find every door of advancement barred to them. We have given practically no attention until very recently to the ninety-nine out of every hundred who will not reach the positions at which we are all aiming. The most significant move of recent years is that school training must educate the pupil away from the native soil; that it must give him training in the earning of a livelihood and teach him the satisfactions that come from doing an honest day's work.

This new note in education must be emphasized. Education is not to train a few to be leaders, but to train all to live wisely, happily, efficiently; to show us all how to do our work well, not how to get away from our work. True education must show us not how to get ahead of others, to get gains from others, but how each individual may be of greatest service to all the rest, to society. To say that education should teach people to labor does not mean that it should lessen the struggles of the masses against industrial and commercial oppression and injustice, nor shut them out of the fields of real mental and spiritual culture. The ideal civilization will not only be one in which all shall have the training for labor and the incentive to labor, but one in which the hours and the products of labor shall be so distributed that all may have sufficient leisure and means to gratify the natural appetite for knowledge and to obtain the truest culture for mind and soul.

BREAKING AND MENDING HEARTS. The one ray of sunshine that relieves the darkness of the war clouds over Europe is the steadfast charity of the American people toward the suffering non-combatants. We are proud of the readers of the Christian Herald and of the splendid response they have made to our appeals in behalf of the widows and orphans of the war. On July 30, $167,293 had been given through this fund. Each day's mail brings its quota of new gifts. And with the gifts come prayers: prayers for the heart-broken in Europe and prayers that peace may come to the world. As long as the war lasts, and for many weary months afterward, there will be a substitution which will go unrelieved excepting as American people feel the impulse of brotherhood. All that has been said before about the bitterness of the misery which has struck millions of humble folks where war has trod in ruthless steps, still holds true. And as long as suffering calls, just so long the Christian Herald will gladly receive and administer the gift of its readers to relieve that suffering. We are sure that every dollar is being expended by our committees abroad with the strictest economy, and with the utmost desire to give the maximum of real help. We are making acknowledgments to the Christian Herald as rapidly as is practicable, and every gift will have been so acknowledged.

State Law Against Tipping

UNDER an anti-tipping law in Iowa, which went into effect July 3, a fine of $25 or thirty days in jail is the penalty for one who gives or receives a tip, be it only a nickel. The attorney-general of the state has served notice that the law must be enforced to the letter, and responsibility for its enforcement has been placed upon the county officials. The law is a good one. The whole system of tipping, which has become so general, is wrong. In many instances, rich institutions pay small wages, marked to the starvation-point, with the understanding that their patron will make up the difference in tips through sympathy. There are two other parties to this wrong: one is the man receiving and the other is the man giving the tip. The man receiving the money does so with the understanding that he will give more than the ordinary time and attention to the one giving, to the neglect of the others who do not pay him. The other party pays the money for the extra attention, which would be more than his share. The whole business is a sort of bribery. It is an imposition on one party and a demoralization to both. It has been learned recently that there is a "tipping trust" in many restaurants, hotels and other establishments; that a company buys the tipping privilege, and the waiters are compelled to turn over the tips they get, not leaving even a small commission for themselves. These and the abuses of the system are prompting state action against it. Iowa in its anti-tipping law, incarnates this principle of the Mosaic law. "Thou which is altogether just shall follow." (Deut. 16: 10.)

Gardens from Warmed Earth

EARLY vegetables are raised in hothouses, or in gardens out of doors with glass over them to let in the light and heat of the sun. There is a report of recent experiments in Dresden, by which artificial heat warms the ground, producing vegetables that grow twice as fast and almost to twice the size of those in ground not thus warmed. The originator of the scheme is a local mechanical engineer of Dresden, who claimed that water heated by the waste heat from electric stations and factories, and piped even miles distant to gardens and small farms, would warm the soil and enormously promote the growth of vegetation. The minister of agriculture gave his consent that experiments might be made. Professor Kuebler of the Technical High School of Dresden and his scholars made the experiment. Early last spring the work was begun with wheat, rye, potatoes, beans, beets and turnips, which were planted at the same time in equal quantities in adjoining fields, one field being heated and the other unheated. The results justified the professor's indication not only of the efficiency of the plan, but the thorough practicality of earlier and larger vegetables. Crops grown on heated ground brought a larger price in the market. It is claimed that this system of heating will be as magical in growing flowers, as in growing vegetables. The increased fertility in the private gardens produced by the light of Christ's life and the warmth of his love is thus described: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35: 1.)

Father Saves His Son

ABOUT hundred feet away from Port Murray Episcopal Church in Washington, New Jersey, is the Morris Canal. The Rev. Clarence Carman left his home at dusk the other night to conduct a prayer meeting in the church; but he heard the cries of children in alarm coming from the bank of the canal. He ran down to the water and the children pointed to a ruffled spot just over the bank, and routed to him that a little boy was drowning. The clergyman plunged in and brought up his own son, Paul, four years old. The little fellow was soon revived. He had been playing on the lawn in front of the rectory and wandered away unobserved to join the children playing on the bank of the canal. The man thought he was saving some other person's boy when he was saving his own. Ministers who try to save the souls of others are very likely to save the souls of their own. The true minister imitates his Master, who said: "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19: 10.)

A Pneumatic Chisel

A CHICAGO sculptor has installed in his studio a pneumatic chisel by means of which the work of outlining marble statues is greatly simplified. The old method of carving with mallet and chisel is not only laborious, but rather awkward for the

GOVERNMENT EXPERT MAKING BREAD

THE United States Government has a department which is particularly interested in the soil and seeds, in the culture of fields and harvests, in the raising of live stock, in feeding the flocks that fill the trees and the microbes that destroy the cattle, and in all branches of the farmer's work. The Agricultural Department concerns itself with raising wheat and in making bread from its flour. Miss Hannah Wersling is the bread-making expert of the Department of Agriculture. "Any standard recipe," says Miss Wersling, "will produce good bread, provided care is taken in measuring the ingredients and securing the correct temperature in which to set the sponge, for the yeast which causes the sponge to rise grows best at from 75 to 90 degrees Fahrenheit." Miss Wersling advocates the use of scales in measuring, and declares that housewives should have recipe books that give the amounts of ingredients in figures of weight and not "a half cup of flour," etc., as is the ordinary custom. She makes scientific experiments in bread-making in the laboratory. She says any one can learn to make the best of bread by the use of a good recipe book, a pair of kitchen scales, and a thermometer. This being so, it is surprising that there is so much poor stuff put on the American table called bread. It is so much of it heavy, sour and indigestible. Some bread is delicious and health-giving; but there is so much miserable stuff that passes for bread that Miss Wersling will have conferred a lasting benefit on the kitchen if she succeeds in teaching the cooks of the country to make good bread. Bread is the staff of life, and has always been so counted. It is the type of food for the soul. Christ thus describes himself as that food: "And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life." (John 6: 35.)

sculptor, since only one hand is left free to guide the chisel. In the case of the pneumatic chisel, both hands may be used for this purpose. The pneumatic chisel is driven by compressed air at a pressure of seventy-seven pounds per square inch, operating through a flexible tube, the air being compressed in a large tank by means of an electric motor. The air passing through the tube has the effect of driving the chisel back and forth against the stone as if it were hit by a mallet. The chisel, of course, is used only to outline the statue roughly, the finishing work all being done by hand. The pneumatic chisel can do the rougher work, but when it comes to carving the features so they will speak, and putting the breath of immortality into the stone, the artist must take the mallet in his own hand, that his soul may get closer to his work. In his creative force, man emulates, though faintly, the divine Architect. "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." (Gen. 1: 27.)

Centenarian Retires from Business

AT the age of one hundred and two, Bennett Brittin, of Plainfield, New Jersey, retired from a long and active business life recently, declaring that he would devote the remainder of his days to leisure. He said he was not in ill health nor tired of a business life, but that young men had come up as competitors who employed new business methods, such as he had never dreamed of, and that they had taken his trade from him. It is seldom that a man lives to be a hundred years old. Such instances are few, even in large communities. It is seldom that a person of fourscore even manifests as much energy and ambition as this patriarch who has passed the fivescore limit. The old gentleman has earned his right to retire to a life of leisure. What he says about the competition of the young and of the new methods employed by them, driving so many of the old men and methods out of business, is true. It is only those old people who keep up with the times and the modern pace who can stand the competition. It is the natural and fair thing for old people like Mr. Brittin to step aside and let the younger people have their places on the stage. The vigor of this centenarian calls to mind these words: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died; his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." (Deut. 34: 7.)

School for Fatherless Girls

ANOTHER rich man has left his money where it will pay the largest dividends for generations to come. The late Charles E. Ellis of Philadelphia left over $4,000,000 for the foundation of a home for fatherless girls not over thirteen years of age, where they may have a four years' course of training. The buildings, to be erected at Langhorne this year, will cost $1,000,000. The school is to be named after its founder, of whom it can be said: "Thou art the helper of the fatherless." (Ps. 10: 14.)

The Dixie Highway

THE Lincoln Highway stretches from east to west; the Dixie Highway runs from north to south. Already approximately $10,000,000 in county bonds have been authorized or issued for the construction of the various links of the Dixie Highway, 3,368 miles long, that is to stretch from the top of the Michigan peninsula almost to the southernmost tip of the Atlantic Coast of Florida. Illinois, where five counties are interested, is spending $3,500,000 to make its 123 miles a model of modern road construction. This Dixie Highway is to traverse eight states, 133 counties, and 628 cities and towns. Fourth of July highway meetings were held in Tennessee, Georgia, and Florida to arouse popular interest, and work is in progress upon almost every section of the route in order that it may be dedicated next Thanksgiving Day. Roads in all ages have had much to do in the making of civilization. It was so in the Holy Land. The highway is thus referred to by the prophet as the type of the road over which march the militant hosts of God: "Cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people." (Isa. 62: 10.)

Remember the Children

"IHAVE two little grandchildren," writes a reader of this paper in Clayton, N. J. "Neither they nor I will get a vacation this year, but we all have good, comfortable homes and surroundings. Therefore I am sending for my little girls the cost of a ten-day vacation for two other little girls who may not be so fortunate as we are." This letter is a type of many others equally kind and generous. "The dear little ones and their mothers, how I feel for them! I hope this gift (enclosed) will help a little," writes a friend in Chautauqua, N. Y. Miss May C. White sends $8, the proceeds of a Children's Day concert of the Advent Christian Sunday school at Acushnet, Mass. Miss Lulu Williams of Boydton, Va., sends $3, the gift of her Sunday school class of five children, who worked hard to earn the money. Mrs. E. G. Smith, of Great Bend, Pa., sends $13, being birthday offerings and a special collection in the Lester Sunday school. All gifts in aid of the Children's Home should be sent to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

The problem which, since the battle of the Marne, has confronted the German general staff is what blow could be delivered Russia which would so cripple her as to enable them to be able to withdraw from the eastern campaign the bulk of the Teutonic forces operating in that field, and by transferring such forces to the western battle line take the offensive on that line with forces superior to those of the enemy.

Whether this solution can be carried out or not is still a very open question, but at least it presents the possibility of success, and the apparent certainty that at the worst, in the attempt to carry the plan to complete success sufficient of what may be called local successes will be won—for instance, the capture of Ivangorod, Riga, Warsaw, etc.—to render the holding back of the Russians the coming winter a much easier matter than this holding back was last winter.

Now, the German plan is to bring the two ends of the semi-circumference together, thus making a complete circle instead of a semi-circle, and in the process to cut the lines of communication between the central point, Warsaw, and all the rest of the empire, and to inclose in the circle thus created the Russian field army.

As a result of the movements in the north during the week ending July 30, that end of the semi-circle has been moved a considerable distance towards its goal, and the most northerly of the great arteries of communication, that from Warsaw to Petrograd, is being rapidly approached by a very large force of German cavalry, said to be about 40,000 strong, under General von Bülow. At this point the Russian resistance does not appear to be as strong as farther south.

All along the line south from the point from which this thrust has been started the German line is slowly moving eastward. The Dubiss River has been crossed along its whole length, and the suburbs of the city of Kovno have fallen completely into German hands. From Kovno, the German line follows the military road leading south through Suwalki and Augustowo. There has been some fighting to the east of this line, but there will probably be no general advance to the eastward here on account of the character of the country, immense marshes and bogs interspersed in dense forests.

On the western and southern Warsaw fronts, the

Another day of prayer for the safety of the Russian armies has been decreed, which seems to us to the fact that those high in authority in Russia cherish no illusions as to the gravity of the situation. In fact, it has been officially admitted even though no further disasters fall on the Russian armies, they will, owing to the lack of explosives, ammunition and supplies of all kinds, no position to take the offensive for months.

The campaign in the west has annihilated all the week, and except in the Vosges and in upper Alsace has degenerated into a series of unconnected more or less small artillery duels and unimportant skirmishes. The most violent of these took place around Souchez in the region between the Meuse and the old fighting grounds of the fore of Ailly and Le Prêtre being the scene of the warmest fighting.

The fighting in the Argonne was momentarily suspended, apparently, and nothing at all was heard from the front near Ypres. In the Vosges and in Alsace, the French made some progress. The Fecht Valley was the scene of principal fighting.

The Dardanelles campaign has been marked by some hard but absolute resultless land fighting. The trench warfare here is even more deadlocked than it is on the western battle line, and the Allies, in spite of the heavy reinforcements brought up, have been unable to force the Turks backward to any distance. The principal positive event of the war was the sinking of a French submarine, the Mariotte, in the narrows of the Dardanelles, and the capture of her crew. An English submarine is cruising in the Sea of Marmora and doing considerable damage to the Turkish shipping there.

Considerable interest has been excited by the reports that Turkey and Bulgaria had reached a complete and friendly understanding, and that Turkey had accepted or agreed to cede the Turkish section of the Dedeaghatch Railroad to Bulgaria. If these reports are true, it does not clearly appear at the moment, the occurrence will be of extreme importance, as it will finally dispose of attempts to reconstitute the Balkan League, and unless this is done it is highly improbable that either Greece or Rumania will take part in the war on the side of the Allies. In fact, the probabilities would then be that first Bulgaria and later Rumania would, towards the close of the war, participate on the other side.

These countries are governed by interest and sentimentality, and both have some old settlements, the first with Greece and the second with Russia.

The Italian campaign against Austria is moving very slowly. They have not yet pierced the River line at any point. It is reported that a fearful blunder was made at Montefalcone, and that forces of Italian troops attacked each other, fighting for hours before the mistake was discovered.

Still farther to the south, General von Mackensen's army has gradually advanced on the Warsaw-Lublin-Cholm-Odessa railroad, until at several points its artillery commands the line and renders it useless for transportation purposes. This end of the half-circle is being carried forward much more slowly than the northern end, the Russians here putting up a more stubborn resistance.

The German troops which are advancing on Riga from the westward, and who have attained the outskirts of the city, have been halted in their progress by the Russian fleet, which is shelling them from the harbor and the adjacent waters, and which, even if these troops were withdrawn into the interior and then marched on the city from the south, would render its holding very difficult. Presumably, therefore, the Germans will send their fleet to engage the Russian.

SERIOUS REVOLT IN HAITI

HAITI, that one-third of the restless island lying between Cuba and Porto Rico whose swarthy inhabitants long ago separated into two republics, the staller of which has ever since been a hoed of revolution, has at last fairly startled the world. Santo Domingo, the republic formed by the eastern negroes on the island of Haiti in 1844, has preserved comparative serenity in its political affairs since 1907, when the United States entered into its affairs to administer its revenues in the interests of all concerned. But the neighboring republic, which takes its name from the island, has refused to rofit by the experience of Santo Domingo, and that end of the island—cobrising about one-third of the wile—has been like a thorn in the flet to the nations that have relations wth its government.

incipient uprisings have been mentied in the Christian Herald from tin to time, and only a few weeks ago meion was made that an American crber had been ordered to Haiti becaae of a clash between that governme and France over finances. Much sex or position. It is said that many prisoners died from hunger and un-sanitary conditions.

The populace rose to rebuke this massacre. General Oscar took refuge in the Dominican legation, but the rebels, after seizing the presidential palace, which they partially destroyed, invaded the legation, dragged Oscar away and riddled him with rifle shots. Meanwhile President Guillaume with his family had taken refuge in the French legation.

The day following the massacre of the political prisoners, a mob of Haitians stormed the French legation and secured President Guillaume, whom they surrounded and shot. The French minister to Haiti was powerless to prevent the outrage on the legation. The fury of the mob was so great that they were not content at the murder of the president, but dragged his body through the streets in a wild orgy of revenge.

The same day the United States cruiser Washington, commanded by Rear Admiral Caperton, arrived at Port-au-Prince, and at once sent a force of marines and sailors ashore for the protection of the French legation. Some semblance of order was soon established, but snipers knied two of the American force; a number of rioters were also killed, and the battleship Connecticut was ordered to Port-au-Prince with an expeditionary regiment of marines. The government of France may decide to make an issue over the violation of its legation; but in that case the American Government will probably take a dominant hand in the situation in the interests of both parties and of American prestige, under the Monroe doctrine. On August 1, Admiral Caperton permitted a French warship to send ashore a few men to protect the legation.

A THOROUGHFARE IN THE "BLACK REPUBLIC," WHERE REVOLUTION IS CHRONIC

no serious matters, however, were in the making even then. A turbulent faction of the north, which has never been agreeable to the presidency of General Vilbrun Guillaume—the product of a former revolution—was gathering strength for a try at a new revolution. The thing burst out toward the end of July, and rapidly assumed serious proportions. The capital, Port-au-Prince, was, of course, the objective. The governor of the town, General Esc, immediately caused one hundred and sixty political prisoners held by the government to be executed. Among the men was General Orestes Zamor, the while president of Haiti a year ago was driven out by a revolution; he returned and had been made a prisoner by the government.

The wholesale arrest of suspected sympathizers with the revolutionists has been going on for a number of days and without distinction of age,

The revolutionists are headed by General Rosalvo Bobo, who declares the object of his uprising is to prevent the transfer of the administration of Haiti's finances to the American Government. He declared that the murdered president was about to enter into this arrangement, which has been so beneficial to Santo Domingo. It looks altogether possible that the revolutionary leader has taken the very course that will hasten forcible interference in Haiti's affairs by the American Government.

EUROPE WOULD WELCOME PEACE

From the Address of Miss Jane Addams, at Carnegie Hall, July 9, 1915

I SHOULD like, if I may, to reproduce some of the impressions made by this pilgrimage of ours, if you choose to call it so, going from one government to another, to nine governments in all, as we did in the space of five weeks.

The first thing which is striking is this, that everywhere one heard the same phrases, the identical phrases, given as the causes and as the reasons for the war. Each of the warring nations, I solemnly assure you, is fighting under the impulse of self-defense. Each of the warring nations is fighting to preserve its own traditions and its own ideals from those who would come in to disturb and destroy those high traditions and those ideals. And from one tongue or another it was translated—as most of the men in the foreign offices had to speak English, they translated it into English—and one heard the identical phrases, and going as rapidly as we did from one country to another, it was to me always a striking experience. I almost knew what to expect, what phrases were coming next, after a foreign minister had begun.

I will try to tell you another thing which we found very striking. In practically all of the foreign offices, and especially in two of the foreign offices which I supposed to be leading, one on one side and one on the other side of this conflict, the men said, again in very similar phrases, that a nation at war cannot make negotiations, that a nation at war cannot even express a willingness to receive negotiations, for if it does either, the enemy will at once construe it as a symptom of weakness, and under the terms which are made, the side which first suggested negotiations will suffer as being considered the side that was weaker and was suing for peace. But they said in all of these different foreign offices that if some other power will present propositions, if neutral peoples, however they may be gotten together, peoples who will command the respect of the foreign offices to whom their propositions are represented, if a small group is willing to get together to study the situation seriously and to make propositions, one, two, three, even though they are turned down over and over again and until some basis is found upon which negotiations might commence, there is none of the warring nations that would not be glad to receive such service. That came to us unequivocally. We presented to each of the chancelleries our resolutions, but we talked for the most part about the possibility of substituting negotiations for military processes.

IT is easy for a minister to say, "This country will never receive negotiations. We are going to drive the enemy out inch by inch." But it is pretty hard for him to say that to one or two or three or four women who are sitting there, and who ask, "If a proposition were presented to you, which seemed to you feasible; if something were presented to you which might mean the beginning of further negotiations between yourselves and your enemies, would you decline such a proposition, would you feel justified to go on sacrificing the young men of your country in order to obtain through bloodshed what might be obtained through negotiations, the very thing for which your foreign office was established?" No minister, of course, is willing to say that he would, and no minister would be willing to commit himself for a moment to such a policy. That we found true everywhere.

And as one goes from one country to another, one can only say for oneself, and say it to the citizens as one has opportunity, that if this war is ever to be settled through negotiations, and some time it must be—heaven knows when, but some time men must stop fighting and return to their normal existence—one says to those men, Why not begin now before the military become even further entrenched? Why not begin now when you still have enough power to hold them to their own statements, to hold them to their own purposes, and not allow them to rule and control the absolute destinies of the nation?

IN every country we met, broadly speaking, the civil people and not the military. I am quite aware that it was natural for us to see the people who were on that side of life, instead of those on the military side of life. But because we did meet dozens of them, I am willing to believe that there must be many more of the same type of mind in every country, quite as loyal as the military people, quite as eager for the growth and development of their own ideals and their own standard of living, but believing with all their hearts that the military message is a wrong message and cannot in the end establish those things which are so dear to their hearts.

Another thing which seems to me very striking is this: in each of the warring nations there is this point of similarity—generally speaking, we heard it everywhere—that this was an old man's war; that the young men who were dying, the young men who were doing the fighting, were not the men who wanted the war, and were not the men who believed in the war; that somewhere in church and state, somewhere in the high places of society, elderly people, the middle-aged people, had established themselves and had convinced themselves that this was a righteous war, that this war must be fought out, and, as a young man put it, in a certain country, "and we young fellows have to do the fighting."

One of the leading men of Europe, whose name you would instantly recognize if I felt at liberty to give it, said, "If this war could have been postponed for ten years, perhaps," he said, "I will be safe and say twenty years, war would have been impossible in Europe, because of the tremendous revolt against it in the schools and the universities."

I am quite sure when I say that, that it is a partial view. I am quite sure that there are thousands of young men in the trenches feeling that they are performing the highest possible duties. I am quite sure that the spirit of righteousness is in the hearts of most of them, at least of many of them. But I am also sure that throughout there are to be found these other men who are doing violence to the highest teachings they know. It seemed to me at times as if the difference between the older generation and the new was something which was apprehended dimly in each country; that the older men believed more in abstraction, shall I say, that when they talked of patriotism, when they used certain words, certain theological or nationalistic words, these meant more to them than they did to the young men; that the young men took life much more from the point of view of experience. When they went to the trenches and tested it out, they concluded that it did not pay, that it was not what they wanted to do with their lives.

IT seems to me quite clear that whether we are able to recognize it or not, there has grown up a generation in Europe, as there has doubtless grown up a generation in America, who have revolted against war. It is a god they know not of and they are not willing to serve him, because all of their inmost sensibilities and the training upon which their highest ideals depend revolt against the whole situation. Now, it seems to me this is true—and I have no plan and the papers were much too kind when they said that I was going to advise the President; but this it seems to me, broadly speaking, must be true—that if some set of people could be gotten together who were international out of their own experience; if men could be brought together who had international experience, who had had it so long and so unconsciously that they had come to think in nationalistic terms, but in the terms of the generation in which they were living, whether concerning business or labor or any other thing which has become so tremendously international; if they could be brought together and could be asked to try to put the best mind they had, not as they represented one country or another, but as they represented human life and human experience as it has been lived during the last ten years in Europe, upon the question of what has really brought about this situation—does Serbia need a seaport? Is that what is the matter with Serbia?

I WON'T mention other warring countries, for I might get into difficulties, but is this thing or that thing needed? What is it from the human standpoint, from the social standpoint? Is it necessary to feed the people who are so underfed in all of the southern portions of Europe? Is it necessary in order to feed them to get the wheat out of Russia? In heaven's name, then, let us have more harbors in order to get that wheat out of Russia. Let us not consider it from the point of view of the claims of Russia, or the counter-claims of some one else, but let us consider it from the point of view of the needs of Europe—I believe if men had that temper, and that experience, and that sort of understanding of life, they would begin to make propositions to various governments which would placate the claims of one government and set it over against the claim of another government, but would locate the situation from a humane standpoint, I am quite sure, from the knowledge of dozens of men in all of the countries who talk about the situation, that that sort of negotiation would be received. That does not seem an impossible thing, does it?

We did not talk peace as we went about; it would merely confuse the issue; but isn't it hideous that while nations find the word peace intolerable? We said, Why not see what can be done to arrive at some way of bringing together to discover what might be done in place of the settlement which is now being fought out by military processes? And that was as far as we were able to go with clearness and safety, and upon that platform we were met with the greatest—some said courtesy—it was to my mind more than courtesy, it was indeed as though we brought a breath of fresh air, as one coming in at last to talk of something that was not of war.

WE went into the room of one of the prime ministers of Europe, and I said to him, "This probably seems to you very foolish, to have women going about in this way," and he said, "Foolish? Not at all. These are the first sensible words that have been uttered in this room for ten months." He said, "That door opens from morning to time, and people come in and go out." "Mr. Minister, we must have more money, we must have more ammunition, we must have more money. We must not go on with this war without doing something else," and he continued, "At last that door opens and two people walk in and say, 'Mr. Minister, could not negotiations be begun?' After all, I may not represent my country very worthily, but he is an officer of the government in a high place, and that is what he said. I will tell it to you for what it is worth. There are other testimonials of the same sort from all kinds of people in office, and they are part of the picture are at war and unable to speak themselves.

The women who came to the congress were women who were impelled by a genuine feeling of life itself, which compelled them to come and see it could hold for three days and a half composed of women. Now they said: "Oh, yes, we see it can be done; we thought it could not be done." Three of four scientific societies who saw it said, "Perhaps we can do it. We were not at all sure that, if we tried to do it, we could do it."

he people say, "We do not want this war." They say that the governments are making this war, and the governments say, "We do not want this war. We will be grateful to anybody who will help us stop it." We did not reach the military officers, but we did talk to a few military men, and we talked to some of them who said that they were sick to death of this war, and I have no doubt there were many others who, if they spoke freely, would say the same thing. And without abandoning their causes, and without lowering the real quality of their patriotism, whatever it is which these various nations want, the women's resolutions said to them, and we said it to them as long as they permitted us to talk, "Whatever it is you want, and whatever it is you feel you ought to have with honor, why in the world can't you submit your case to a tribunal of fair-minded men? If your cause is as good as you say it is, or you are sure it is, certainly those men will find the righteousness which adheres within it." And they all say that if the right medium can be found the case will be submitted.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—JESSE SMITH, JR. (Rev. Albany Smith), has just closed three weeks of evangelistic service at Warrenton, Va., preaching to audiences of ten hundred. The entire Christian population responded to his appeal for reconsecration and there were near three hundred and fifty professions of conversion.

—MRS. JOSEPHINE PETERSON, missionary to India, has finished her furlough in this country and about to return to the missionary field. She has been a reader of the Christian Herald for twenty years. Mrs. Peterson asks for prayers for her work and herself, that she may be given divine guidance to do the Lord's will in all things. She may be addressed at Taloda, Kalesh, India.

—PHILADELPHIA HAS A GOSPEL auto evangelistic party, whose headquarters are the home of Mr. S. G. Beck, 5313 Boynton Street, Germantown. Two evangelists are employed in the work. Music is rendered by a quartet, a corset and a "baby organ." Hundreds of leaflets and tracts are distributed and no collections are taken. A Gospel hall has been opened in connection with the work at northwest corner of Ninth Avenue and Boudinot Street, Kensington.

—MR. M. E. BELL, state superintendent of mine work among Alabama miners, writes to the Christian Herald, calling attention to the need of temperance teaching among the miners not only as a means of improving social and moral conditions, but as a preventive of explosions and other accidents. Vice-President Fies of the Maryland Coal Commission in a recent issue of the official journal of the state makes a strong plea for rapid temperance regulations for all the coal miners in the interest of safety and efficiency. He writes: "I have studied carefully the causes of the mine explosions and have found that the incipient reasons of three explosions in Alabama, in which over 200 men lost their lives, may be traced to alcohol."

—D. C. GOLLODAY, a lay-preacher of the Christian denomination, has been preaching in the mountains of Rockingham and Greene Counties, Virginia. A friend writes to the Christian Herald: "Mr. Golloday bought one of your Red Letter Testaments in 1908, and read it through twelve times each year during 1908, 1909 and 1910. In 1911 he read it through fifteen times; in 1912 and 1913 he read it through eighteen times in each of those two years, and in 1914 he read it through nineteen times, and he has already read it through ten times up to the end of June, 1915. As it is so well worn, I am thanking you for supplying him with a new one at the special price of fifty cents. HUNDREDS of Young Men's Christian Association secretaries have gathered on the beautiful shores of Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, for their summer school work. In location and equipment it is hard to imagine a more ideal place for a summer encampment. There are thirty-four acres on the shore of the lake. Accommodations in cottages and tents are provided for eight hundred people. There is an auditorium, several class buildings, a large administration building, a great dining-hall equipped with every culinary device, a well-equipped gymnasium, and a baseball diamond. The classroom work is designed to prepare the student for active work as a Y. M. C. A. secretary, in either the religious, executive, educational, physical or boys' department. Within a short time there will be opened in Chicago the new building of the Y. M. C. A. College, where more thorough training will be given.

handise cars have been overhauled, and in many sections private oiling companies have been pressed into service at repair work and in the oiling of more new cars, after the limit for cars for early delivery has expired.

Harvesting wheat is a strenuous job. For days before the harvesting season begins, men and teams are kept busy erecting temporary bunkhouses and sleeping quarters. These are located in the midst of the wheat fields. Wells are dug, iced built and stalls run for the horses. Bedding and kitchen utensils are taken to the camps last of all. Everything necessary for the men and teams is on the field when the harvest starts. At no place in the big fields will men be out of hearing of the dinner horn, which sounds mighty good, after six hours of sweltering toil.

The men rise at three o'clock in the morning and work in shifts until nine in the evening, with short intervals for food and rest. This is the way a great wheat crop is garnered, the whole system being as efficient as that which regulates a gang of skilled mechanics on a modern skyscraper contract. A season in the wheat fields will convince anyone that bread does not come without perspiration, and that modern farming as conducted today is on a scientific and commercial scale of which the farmers of the last generation could never have dreamed.

Which is Best?

Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice?
In Milk, with Cream or Dry?
As Foods or as Confections?

The Puzzle Which Never Stays Solved

Did you ever hear anyone definitely say which Puffed Grain was the better?

Or how he liked it best?

If so, he has probably reversed that opinion time and time again. Puffed Wheat and Rice are both amazingly delightful. And every way one serves them seems the best way ever found.

These Perpetual Joys

That's one charm of Puffed Grains. Each has its own delights. And each can be served in a dozen ways, equally inviting.

At breakfast, like other cereals. Between meals, like peanuts. Afternoons in candy making. At dinner in soup, or as a garnish for ice cream. At supper, in bowls of milk.

Always bubble-like and crisp. Always thin and fragile, ready to melt at a touch. And always with an almond flavor, much like toasted nuts.

Did you ever know another food which combined so many joys?

Whenever eaten Puffed Grains easily digest. And they completely digest. They supply whole-grain nutrition.

They are made by Prof. Anderson's process. Every cell is blasted by a steam explosion. No other process compares with this in fitting grains for food.

Too bad that all grains can't be puffed like these. But those that can be should be served in this form wherever Puffed Grains fit.

Forty Dollars a Year Income

TO a young man who came to him for advice a great financier once said: "The trouble is you don't capitalize your wealth." And went on to prove it by showing that 15 cents a day represents the earning power of a $1,000 bond. "Yet," he continued, "most men spend that amount needlessly every day in one way or another."

Looked at in that way, there is a financial reason that in itself is making the Gillette Safety Razor well worth while to the men with a sense of values—to say nothing of the sheer comfort of the quick, smooth, easy Gillette shave—and the boon of "no stropping, no honing."

It's a good idea to own a Gillette—Forty Dollars a year income for life is not so bad for a $5 investment—and there is always that Gillette Shave, you know.

ASA'S GOOD REIGN

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST
II CHRONICLES 15: 1-15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." James 4: 8

When the prodigal was a great way off, the father saw him, and ran and fell on his neck. Of course our drawing nigh to God is the result of the drawings of his good Spirit, which, turn, are the outcome of his everlasting love. As the summer draws the migratory bird and the magnet the needle, and the sun the flower-cups, so with invisible influences of God draw us. When we obey those sacred and secret drawings, and turn our heart toward him, he notices the first faint movement—the almost imperceptible movement of our soul and comes with swift gladness to greet it. He lifts the humble up to his heart and turns their mourning into laughter and their heaviness to joy.

We are instantly conscious when God draws nigh. He is always around and with us; often he seems to approach nearer. Then there are a warmth, a vision, a rapture that comparable to nothing so much as the coming of a friend, after long absence. The prophet says: "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee; thou saidst, Fear not." God's near presence makes all the difference. We rise to a new stature, breathe a new air, things in a new light, lay hold on new sources of strength, and become anointed with oil of a new benediction. Perhaps there is something better than drawing near to God—that is an abiding always in his secret place.

Stumbling Feet and a Perfect Heart

By Arthur H. Howland

OUT from the weird and ugly tales of the sins of Israel's and Judah's kings the story of Asa stands pure and bright, the record of a king whose heart "was perfect all his days." We find in his career things which fall short of New Testament standards, but in his heart he believed throughout the forty-one years of his prosperous reign that he was doing the will of Jehovah.

Asa was Rehoboam's grandson. His father Abijah, or Abijah, was a man whose real character is difficult to determine, for the account of his reign in the Chronicles makes him far more spiritual than the words of the record in the book of Kings would indicate. He was doubtless a bad man, as the writer of the Kings states, who had a sudden burst of spiritual light and, in the blaze of that illumination, won a great moral and military victory.

But Asa had many incentives to do wrong. He came to the throne when very young, probably not more than twenty years old. The palace, the temple and the country at large were honeycombed with idolatries and their accompanying vices. His own grandmother was an ardent supporter of the heathen rites and had established a shrine for their evil practice. Yet in the midst of all the lure of wealth and power and indulgence and error, Asa's heart turned toward God. Perhaps some true priest of Jehovah had unfolded to him the true meaning of the rites of God's true temple; perhaps the prophet Azariah had other and earlier talks with him than that recorded in our lesson today; perhaps some studious and pious scribe had found a copy of the ancient law and called the young prince's attention to it. Doubtless the Spirit of God was calling him to the life of purity and obedience. But whatever and however many were the calls to the right which reached Asa's heart, he yielded to them and set his heart upon the truth.

He removed the queen-mother, not his own mother but his grandmother, Maachah; he destroyed the heathen shrine she had established; he removed idols from other shrines and drove out the corrupt devotees of the abominable religions of the neighboring nations.

Four false steps are recorded of Asa. Yet he seems to have erred simply with his feet, not with his heart—for the record stands that his heart was perfect all his days. The first false step was that he took the sacred vessels from the temple and sent them to Ben-hadad, king of Syria, as compensation for his support against the king of Israel. Next he rebuked the prophet Hanani, who came to tell him he had done wrong in making this alliance. Next he oppressed the people, evidently as a result of his indignation against what he believed to be the unwarranted reuke of the prophet. Next, when disease smote him he did not think of prayer, but relied wholly upon physicians, who failed to make him well.

But we must let the light of Christ's Gospel fall full on the record of Asa and show us its serious flaws. The worst flaw is his religious intolerance. It is a great shock in reading the stirring accounts of the great and splendid spiritual revival which he promoted to come upon these words: "That whosoever would not see the Lord God of Israel should be put to death, whether small or great, whether man or woman" (II Chron. 15: 13). It is true that this was part of the people's covenant, but it evidently had the sanction of the king. How horrible that is! How contrary to the spirit of the gentle Christ! Jesus at times freely criticized the laws of Moses while stating his own higher and more authoritative principles. And he would have condemned this savage and rigorous method of enforcing piety, based as it was on Mosaic conceptions. The people had not learned then, as, alas, they have not learned yet, that moral and spiritual principles cannot be advanced by force.

That sad sentence, "And Asa oppressed some of the people at the same time" (II Chron. 16: 10), contains a world of disappointment and tragedy. Moving the world forward in spiritual ideals he set it back with his misconception of the rights of the people.

And his militarism offends the Christian conscience. Again and again the warning must be soiled that the Scripture passages describing war can not be taken to mean that Christ, the present Leader of the forces of God, can tolerate war. It is odious to him; it is hateful; it is grievous. We must compel ourselves at every step to war with the eyes of Jesus, the Christ who loved little children and whose hands were always outstretched to heal and help and bless.

It is instructive to note how Asa fell into the folly of the theory of the advantage of military preparation. It was when Asa had got his "army that bare targets and spears and shields and drew bows" that "there came out against them the Ethiopian with a host of a hundred thousand, and three hundred chariots" (II Chron. 14: 8, 9). To offset what might appear to be the divine sanction of his wars, he noticed the statement that the missteps—the things he had done without making sure that he was following the will of God. "Herein hast thou done foolishly. From hence thou shalt have wars" (II Chron. 16: 9). When he had been following closely and giving his attention to moral and spiritual reforms, "thou hadst rest, and he had no war in those years, because the Lord had given him rest" (II Chron. 14: 6).

Notice out of this ancient story mingled rights and wrongs some beautiful sayings and facts, applicable to our moral and spiritual campaigns of the present. "Lord, it is nothing to thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power. Help us, O Lord our God, for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude" (II Chron. 14: 11). That sounds like the Spirit-filled Paul, who liked to boast: "Our sufficiency is of God."

What can be finer and sweeter than these words of the prophet Hanani to King Asa: "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth to show himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward him" (II Chron. 16: 9). And Asa's first chaplain Azariah states the eternal foundation principle of all human conduct: "The Lord is with you while ye be with him; and if ye seek him, he will be found of you; but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you" (II Chron. 15: 2). This word of courage comes for those who in all ages are trying to do the work of God: "Be ye strong therefore, and let not your hands be weak; for your work shall be rewarded" (II Chron. 15: 7).

Notice, finally, how the hosts of righteousness increased as the work of reform went on. Not only all Judah and Benjamin rallied round the royal reformer, but citizens came to him "in abundance" from the other tribes which had revolted under Jeroboam. They did this when "they saw that the Lord his God was with him" (II Chron. 15: 9). Just so there are people today, pining for spiritual leadership, ready to change their present allegiances and affiliations and rally round the man or the organization that will be true to God.

Echoes from the Holy Land

ONLY those nations whose lives are measured by centuries can fully understand the blessing of a good line whose reign and acts are good. Asa's good reign, ten years of peace followed by the first great revival of religion, still lives in the hearts and instincts of men.

The disruption under Jeroboam and his formal introduction of idolatry at Bethel and Dan was the prelude to an awful lapse in the moral and spiritual life of the Hebrew people. Traces of the degradation of both kingdoms exist until this present hour. The observant traveler in moving northward from Jerusalem at the present day will note that as a rule the cities of southern Palestine occupy the hilltops and that where those of central and northern Palestine do not occupy such positions, the hilltops near those cities are always covered with the ruins of ancient buildings, temples or shrines or clumps of oak trees which have a sacred character to the inhabitants of that region. Excavations at Jericho, Samaria and elsewhere after passing through the successive layers of the centuries of debris almost always uncover the remains of heathen shrines and idolatrous worship. Some of these remains date back to the time of the disruption or shortly after, as in the foundations of Ahab's palace at Samaria. Not infrequently these most ancient remains show signs of life and the reformer's sledge used in smashing the altars of the strange gods, the images and the abominable idols.

During this lapse into idolatry sanctuaries were built on wooded hills and images erected among groves of trees. The idolatrous worship was accompanied by sport and revelry and all the licentiousness that made these high places an abomination to the prophets and reformers of a later day. Jeroboam's dedication of these hilltops became a snare to the nations that followed Israel, as we well know from Greek and Roman history. Early Christianity had a hard fight with these centers of idolatrous worship at Jerusalem, Samaria and Caesarea Philippi, but not until Islam swept the land with battle-axe and sledge did they finally disappear. In northern Syria groves of "sacred oaks" crown hundreds of hilltops, which local superstitions prevent from falling beneath the axe. From among these trees gleam the white domes of the tombs and shrines of Moslem and Christian saints. Living religion has moved down from the ancient hilltops to the mosques and churches of the cities and villages where the people dwell, and Jeroboam's idolatry is forever a thing of the past.

This sign on Service Stations throughout the United States and Canada guarantees expert care for your Hupmobile when and where you want it—without cost to you.

The Squarest Deal for You and Your Hupmobile

At last, a tangible, national service plan which insures against motor car troubles

One with our policy of producing the best car of its class in the world, we now announce what we believe to be the first and best plan of national service-to-the-owner yet devised

This plan is so simple, and so complete, that its basic principles are almost certain to be insisted upon by all car owners as a standard of what motor car service should be.

Its distinctive feature is a book of 100 coupons which every buyer receives with a 1916 Hupmobile, and which can be cashed at any Hupmobile service station in the United States or Canada.

These coupons entitle the owner to 50 hours of free labor—sufficient, under ordinary circumstances, to keep the car in perfect running condition.

And this service is over and above the regular guarantee against defective parts and materials. It is paid for out of a fund established jointly by the Hupp Motor Car Company, its distributors, dealers and sales representatives.

As each car is shipped, a definite amount of money is set aside for free service on that particular car.

This service is for your car only; the labor cannot be performed on another Hupmobile.

The new plan provides for the regular care, inspection and adjustment without which no automobile can remain at its best.

To give our system national scope, we have established hundreds of service stations throughout the United States and Canada.

Here is service so tangible, so definite and so practical, that you cannot afford to purchase any car without first learning all its details. The 1916 Hupmobile—$200 greater in worth and $115 lower in price—is the greatest automobile value this company has ever built. When we add the guarantee of satisfaction resulting from the Hupmobile service system, we offer, we feel sure, the most exceptional car value in the world.

We urge you to have your Hupmobile dealer give you the full particulars.

Or write us, and we will tell you how the plan works, and send you the catalog of the seven beautiful new Hupmobiles.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A FRIEND from California writes: "Some time ago I sent a request for prayers for restored health and for the meeting of a special need. I am much improved in health and I was recently blessed in securing a position as teacher." A young friend writes from the South: "About two weeks ago I requested prayer that a friend and I might renew our friendship. The very next day the desire was granted." A Minnesota reader states: "I was in trouble and asked the Lord to remove the burden, and he did so. Praise his name." A forsaken wife who had asked prayer that her husband might return to her writes that he has written asking to be forgiven. She asks our continued prayer that this letter may be followed by his return.

J. P. P. writes: "I know that God does answer prayer. I had a dear sister who lost her mind, and also a dear daughter who was in the same condition. God restored them to health in answer to prayer." Mrs. E. B., Everett, Mass., writes: "I wrote to the Prayer League asking prayer for my grandson for healing of soul and body and I wish to tell you my prayer has been wonderfully answered. I want to give God all the praise."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

E. C., Brooklyn, N. Y.; A Friend, Versailles, Ill.; Mrs. H. M., Forest Depot, Va.; Reader, S. C.; Mrs. D. A. R., Dunkerton, Iowa; W. L. D., Clifton Springs, N. Y.; W. K., Clinton, Miss.; E. MacP., Winnipeg, Man.; J. P. B., S. S., Urbana, Ohio.

Request for earnest prayer has come from Miss E. S., North Carolina, that her father, an aged minister of the Gospel, who has been in the ministry for more than thirty years, may be entirely healed of his afflictions and be given strength, if it is God's will, to return to his work again. He has been working among the mountain people, who earnestly request him to return to them. He is very desirous of returning to his work.

A faithful wife whose husband has deserted her repeats her request for special prayer that he may be brought to his better self and return to her. He is a successful business man, a man of good social standing, and she feels that he has been unduly influenced by evil friends to separate himself from her. She is longing and praying for his repentance and return.

Prayers are asked for revivals at Lancaster, Ky.; Rochester, Minn.; Evansville, Ind.; Fitch Bay, P. Q., Canada; Rosprin, Texas (that many may be saved at the revival meetings now being held); Pemberton, N. J.; Mabank, Texas; Ashland, Va. (that the boys and girls in this community may be effectually helped to live Christian lives); Carmel, Calif.; Hinsdale, N. H.; Burlington, N. C.; Iola (that God may bless the pastor and that more people may accept Christ); Sutherland, Fla.; Rehoboth, Ala.; Syracuse, N. Y. (at a Baptist Church); Farmington, Ark. (at a small country church which is greatly in need of a revival). Prayer is also requested that the people throughout the world may give up their evil habits, especially whisky, cocaine and morphine. C. requests prayer for the success of the prohibition campaign in Alberta, Can.

Eleven friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends. Ten friends ask prayer for the mental restoration or strengthening of relatives, friends or for themselves. Seventeen readers ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit; two friends ask prayer that relatives may be saved from the drug habit. Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or in other ways express their desire for personal spiritual blessing. Seventy-six friends ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends. Eight readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends. Sixty-five friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including one who asks that her son, who has never spoken, may gain the power of speech; and another that son may regain the use of his limbs. Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for the healing of themselves. Six readers ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends. Twenty-two friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs. Forty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

Is of Sound Belief: Why and How to Get It

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. 1 Peter 3: 13-16

YOU will find it an interesting subject of study to ask yourself why and how you believe anything. You believe, for instance, that fire will burn, that ice will melt, that food will nourish, that gravity will draw. How have you arrived at these beliefs? You come to them by experience. You found a long ago that these things were true because you tested them again and again and the results were always the same. But there are a great many things we do not know in this direct personal way, but yet which we believe just as firmly. Many of us have never been to Italy. But we believe that there is such a place; we believe that we know more than a little about it. Other people have been there and written descriptions and have made maps and they had conversations with us about it. So we take their word for it, and our confidence in the existence of Italy is just as positive as our confidence in the laws of heat and cold and food and gravity. Or some of us later might have visited Italy, and when we were walking on its land or floating on its rivers, we know from personal experience that the things which had been told us about it were all true.

Now our faith in the facts of religion comes just precisely the same way. Some things we have experienced ourselves; some things we have heard from others; some things we have read in the Bible and other books; some things we have first taken at the word of others and then demonstrated by actual personal test their truth.

Truth does not become truly satisfying until these tests we have turned it into actual experience. One of the greatest weaknesses and dangers of present-day Christianity is that so many people fail of getting an experience which is positive and definite and personal. They cannot say as the queen of Sheba about the glories of Solomon: "It was a true report that I heard," having proved the sayings of others by her own eyes and ears. The apostles who they were punished for preaching in the name of Jesus declared: "We cannot but speak of things which we have seen and heard." The greatest bulwark against the assaults of infidelity and skepticism and atheism which constantly meet us is to have in our own mind the memory of some definite time when God came and blessed us, an occurrence as definite as that which Jacob had at Peniel, of which the Bible record is: "He blessed him there."

How to Make the World Happier

Epicurean League. 1 John 4: 7-21

OUR Scripture lesson from John's beautiful long letter to the members of the early church contains the secret of joy for which the world is looking. The secret is that simple and familiar but so oft-forgotten word, love. Hate brings sorrow; love brings joy. And if we would be joy-bringers we must take love to the world that is longing for it.

Let this love from Christ. He will fill our hearts with it if we will let him—love for himself, love for others. John Wesley in his beautiful talks about Christian perfection said that if we seek anything higher than love or anything other than love we go wide of the mark. How often we aim at something else! How often we are to let even our zeal for righteousness and for service lead us away from the simple sweetness of love itself! How apt we are to forget that Paul in summing up the virtues of the Spirit began his beautiful long list with love—love and joy and peace!

During the meeting "When Love Shines In" the musical composition may not be the most perfect and satisfying, but the root of the Gospel matter is in the song and we should go on from this service to be scatterers of the sunshine of love, which is ultimately to fill our hate-cursed world with joy.

As Your Car Grows Old, Keep It Tuned Up

Retain its smoothness, its quietness and comfort. Retain its quick response, its effective power—its dependability. You bought it for these qualities—keep them in the car as it grows old in your service.

Tune up your motor, adjust the carburetor for weather and varying qualities of gasoline. Adjust the steering gear. Adjust the brakes.

And don't forget to adjust the bearings. For all bearings wear same as other moving parts and need adjustment if you are to keep the full power and efficiency of your car.

If wear occurs, leaving a slight space between cap and roller, adjustments can be made by moving the cap or cone in the direction of the arrows.

As 1-2 and 3-4 always remain exactly parallel, the adjustment brings the different surfaces into perfect line-contact, and no principle of the bearing's efficiency is impaired.

Inside Knowledge That Will Help You

WHEEL bearings must turn easily of course—to eliminate friction. But they must fit snugly too—to prevent wheels from wobbling.

As bearings wear—all bearings do—they get loose. A little looseness allows the pound that makes faster and faster wear—more and more looseness.

Bearings on shafts that support gears—transmission, driving and differential gears—when they wear (as all bearings do) allow the shafts to drop slightly out of line. The gears on those shafts get slightly out of correct mesh. Imperfectly meshed gears make noise and waste some of the power.

The trouble goes on at an increasing rate unless promptly checked by adjusting a type of bearing that can take up looseness when it develops.

Use of steels best adapted for bearings, extreme accuracy of manufacture, strict following of heat-treatment formulas developed by years devoted to concentrated study of bearings alone—these are producing bearing parts that have wonderful wear-resisting qualities.

And yet bearings—all bearings—do wear.

The Timken Roller Bearing is the one type of bearing that can be adjusted to completely eliminate the effects of its slight wear.

The Timken Roller Bearing carries the load and resists the shocks along the lines of its rollers instead of on the points of balls; its tapered construction enables it to meet side pressure and shocks in addition to direct load; its line contact distributes pressure and hence minimizes wear—these are three great principles that are kept in constant operation for your benefit by the fourth great principle of adjustability.

You can see how important it is to have adjustable bearings in your car if you are to retain its effectiveness as a power vehicle—as it grows old in your service.

Other interesting facts about bearings are told in the Timken Primer No. D-3 "On the Care and Character of Bearings" which, with a list of the Cars using Timken Bearings, will be sent free, postpaid on request.

On a Cabbage Diet

—MISSIONARIES JOHN AND JESSIE PERKINS write from Cape Palmas, Liberia, West Africa: "Last year's rice crop failed and the people are living this season on palm juice and palm cabbage. Both of these processes kill the trees. Each family of any size eats three or four cabbages a day, which means the death of many trees besides the thousands that are cut down for palm wine. Many of the old and feeble people are dying from lack of nourishment. While we were passing through a heathen town in the bush, a native crazed with liquor threatened our lives because we would not give him tobacco, and captured some of our loads. He was providentially kept from his purpose and compelled to restore our loads. Our provisions, which were coming on a later ship, were lost when the ship sank in a gale in the Bay of Biscay; but God has wonderfully provided for us and all of our party are well. Owing to war conditions, mails and shipping generally are very irregular."

Questions and Answers

Rev. G. J. K., Baltimore, Md. In the study of the religious conditions of the present time, it is very disappointing to find so much lack of sympathy for each other's views among Christian people of the different sects. It is not as acute as in former years, but too much of it exists for the upbuilding of the Christian life in the community. Many churches work in such a manner that it gives the impression of competition in business. In some, where only the "respectable element" is wanted, social lines are drawn very tight, and money is put prominently before the people. The essential thing, the saving of souls, is pushed into the background. Everywhere you hear Christian people say, "I am an Episcopalian, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, or what not." We are not followers of man, but we are all trying to follow Jesus Christ. Why should we not call ourselves Christians and drop the names of the different sects? God's work is more important than our opinions or divisions. The man's soul to save is everything. Worldly men do not respect our divisions. The world will never be won for Christ until we all recognize our fellowship in one baptism, one faith and one God and Father of all.

Our correspondent, who writes the foregoing letter in all sincerity and with the most laudable purpose, echoes the criticisms of others who apparently overlook the fact that in discussing the church we are dealing not with a theory, but an actual existent condition. To lament because all bodies of Christians are not of one mind in all things, and do not all have one form of worship and one denomination, is illogical, under present conditions. The church is steadily drawing closer together. There is a growing disposition to meet on common ground and make common cause in many branches of Christian work; yet it may be a long time before denominational distinctions are surrendered and all are merged in one flock with one Shepherd, as we have the divine assurance will ultimately be the case. There have been distinctions ever since apostolic times (see I Cor. 1: 12; also I Cor. 12) still the church has grown amazingly; the little group of 120 mentioned in Acts 1: 15 has become a vast army of 564,000,000. In this mighty host there are many battalions, each with its own distinctive insignia and history, many of them of glorious memory. Yet all serve under one Commander, the great Captain of Salvation, and all march under the banner of the Cross. Jealousy there has been, and there has been also much of that emulation in well-doing which was the characteristic of the early churches; but the march of the army as a whole has been steadily onward, always keeping in view the ultimate goal. This is a time when the church needs to be helped rather than criticized. It may be that it needs new trials and sufferings to prepare it for the new Pentecost for which the whole Christian world is earnestly praying and watching.

W. B., Orlando, Fla. The United States has stood as the friend of the Liberian Republic ever since it was founded. It has helped it in many ways and the influence of its friendship has been the means of preventing it from being seriously interfered with by other powers, otherwise it might have been absorbed by some of them during the struggle several years ago, which resulted in the partition of a very large part of the African continent.

J. E. N., Daytona, Fla. The Gospel rule is to give "according as we have been prospered." If prosperity should take wings and poverty come instead, dire necessity might for a time make our gifts to the Lord's work impossible, without depriving those dependent upon us of their daily needs. Besides, it would be wrong to apply to the Lord's work that which rightly belonged to our creditors.

Emma C. B., New London, Conn. Your question regarding the statement of an English astronomer that we were just on the border of another "Ice Age" has been referred to Professor Leland, who replies as follows: "While mathematical astronomy, aided by the wonder-inspiring telescopes and other appliances connected with our great observatories, is making us acquainted with undreamed-of wonders in the heavens, I am not aware of any researches being made towards a forthcoming Ice Age. In the very nature of the subject any conclusion that might be reached must be very largely conjectural, and must relate to a period far distant from our own."

G. B. W., Nebraska. No data obtainable on the subject.

Mrs. Icy B. Carr, R. F. D. 8, Zanesville, O., would be glad to learn from any reader of this paper the present address of Mrs. Carr (maiden name Carr), a daughter of the late Calvin Carr.

R. G. B., Laporte, Ind. The word "Catholic" in the Apostles' Creed means "universal"—whole visible church on earth. There was any Roman Catholic Church in apostolic times nor until centuries afterward.

G. H., Grayville, Ill. Early in the war news was received and published in the Arkansas journals that the French had invented a shell or bomb filled with an asphyxiating gas called "turpentine," which would make all a considerable area unconscious.

E. Z., Dodge, Neb. We have the assurance that he is able and willing to forgive "to the uttermost." If we have truly repented sin and confessed it to him and asked for forgiveness in the name of his dear Son, we must believe that he is faithful that promised.

B. F. H., Sebastian, Fla. 1. The Script originally written in Hebrew and later translated into Greek, have come to us through a long series of subsequent translations. None of the original MSS. is now in existence. We are sending you a booklet on the subject, which is too extensive to be dealt with in the Mail-Bag. 2. Your closing question is controverted.

A. L. A., Heisson, Wash. "Fearing" God in the Gospel sense of the term, does not imply terror and apprehension or slavish dread of reverence, respect, and glad obedience. The old pagan fear of God in the heart of man changes to love under the teachings of Christ. Yet "fear" is constantly before the persistent and unrepentant sinner—fear of offensive divine justice.

NO IDEA

What Caused the Trouble.

"I always drank coffee with the family, for it seemed as if it were nothing for breakfast if we did not have it on the table.

"I had been troubled for some time with my heart, which did not feel right. This trouble grew worse steadily.

"Sometimes it would beat fast, at other times very slowly, so that I could hardly be able to do work for an hour or two after breakfast, and if I picked up a hill, it gave me a severe pain.

"I had no idea of what the trouble was until a friend suggested that perhaps it might be coffee drinking. I had leaving off the coffee and began drinking Postum. The change came quick. I am glad to say that I am now entirely free from heart trouble and attribute the relief to leaving off coffee and the use of Postum.

"A number of my friends have abandoned coffee and have taken up Postum, which they are using steadily. There are some people that make Postum weak and tasteless, but if made according to directions, it is a very delicious beverage." Name given by Postum Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms: Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c a tin.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

What is the call to the ministry?
Has a man two natures?
Is misfortune a judgment of God?
Is it right to ask for definite blessings?
When and why was the Sabbath changed?
Is being tempted a sin?

Is trouble sent as a punishment?
Can one be saved without knowing it?

What is Christian conduct?
Is confession a Christian duty?

What is conscience?
Does God send disease?
How can I get rid of doubt?
Is falsehood ever justifiable?
Can the church heal by faith today?
Should a Christian marry a non-Christian?

Are we punished for sins while yet on earth?
What is the "unpardonable sin"?
Is sinlessness possible?
What and where is the Kingdom of God?
What was the "forbidden fruit"?
What was the "gift of tongues"?

Who were the "spirits in prison"?
Did Christ sing any hymns?
What is known concerning the "tree of life"?
What was Jesus' first sermon?
Could Jesus sin?
What prayer did Christ offer at the Last Supper?

Was the Ascension in human form?
What language did Christ use on earth?
Was Christ omniscient in the flesh?
Who was the little child that Jesus blessed?
What does "making friends of Mammon" mean?
What is the "new birth"?

Questions and Answers

Reader, Columbus, Ind. (1) What do the Jews of today believe in regard to Jesus and the New Testament? Do they believe that Jesus lived, even as a man, and do they accept his words as beautiful and uplifting, even if rejecting them as God-given? (2) What part of the Bible could be taught in the schools acceptably to both Jews and Catholics? (3) What are the objections raised by either to the teaching of the Bible in the public schools? (4) Do the Catholics encourage or discourage the reading of the Bible by their people?

(1) Many educated Jews believe thoroughly that Jesus of Nazareth lived and that he was the teacher of a high, pure and true philosophy. They reject those passages of the New Testament which claim divinity for Jesus and which narrate miracles, though many of them still accept as historic the miracles of the Old Testament. (2) The Jews, so far as we know, would be willing to have the Old Testament read in the public schools and also some of the ethical passages of the New Testament. It would be difficult to win the consent of Catholics to more than the purely ethical and perhaps of the historical passages. (3) The Jews, of course, object to the Bible as it is because it recognizes Christ as the Messiah and teaches the doctrine of the Trinity, whereas they are strict Unitarians. The Catholics object to its use in the public schools because they hold that the church, as represented by its priests, must interpret the doctrines of the Scriptures. They object, of course, to the use of the King James and Revised Versions because they were prepared under Protestant auspices. The Catholic Church uses the Douay Version, which differs in a number of details from the Protestant. (4) This is partly answered in 3. Catholic doctrine makes the church's interpretation of the Scriptures of as great value as the Scriptures themselves, hence that church has not, we believe, definitely encouraged the private reading of the Bible, unaccompanied as that must be by priestly interpretation. There is noticeable, however, a marked change in Catholic opinion on this point, for Catholic periodicals now carry advertisements offering Bibles for sale, while authorized selections of Scripture passages are also recommended for private and family use.

P. R. G., Elsmere, Neb. 1. What became of the Sacred Ark of the Jews, when the temple was plundered and destroyed by the Babylonians, is an unsolved mystery. Some have held that it was probably taken away or destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. There is a belief among the Jews that, in obedience to divine command, it was concealed from the invaders and that its hiding-place will be disclosed with the coming of Messiah. Much has been written on the subject, but it is all conjecture. 2. There is one passage in the Bible, Isa. 49: 12, which mentions "the Land of Sinim," which commentators claim refers to a people in the far East, probably the Chinese. The claim is, however, conjectural. The Arabians and other Asiatics called China "Sin" or "Tchin."

Sister. We are a family of six children, five of whom are at least professing Christians. But we have one sad fault. Though we are devoted to one another, to home and to parents, we are constantly quarreling and acting unkindly and crossly to one another. I seem helpless to control my own temper, and I realize this is indispensable before I can help the others. I do so want our home life to be truly Christian, and shall be very grateful for any help or suggestions.

Family quarreling is one of the bitterest and saddest and most dangerous faults of modern life. One is sometimes tempted to think that there may be more of it in our land of freedom and light because our children grow up with so little restraint. In other lands and other ages children were scarcely free to express their own ideas and contend for their own wishes. The sad picture you outline could be matched in many so-called Christian homes. One of the greatest incentives and helps to good, useful, inspired, skilful work is a happy home atmosphere. This has been the inspiration of many a noble work of art, many a life and deed of great social value. You have made the first step toward a better way by realizing how despicable your present manner of life is. The answer to your problem is very plain. You must get more love, and you must get it direct from Christ. Ask him, one by one, and in your family worship, to put more of his love in your hearts. If you really care more for the other members of the home circle than for yourself you will not continue to wound and grieve them. You must realize how terribly sinful such conduct is, how it contradicts all your religious professions and hinders all your spiritual influence, and how it grieves your parents and your Saviour. Such home quarreling unfits you all for your daily tasks, and is unfitting you for founding homes of your own. You must seek and find Christ's complete cleansing from sin, which will take away your evil tempers and make your life kind and gentle and patient. Again, you should realize how unbearable would be the memory of these unkindnesses if the 4: 21; but this is by no means definite. Tertullian wrote that Pilate, "at or immediately after Christ's death on the cross, was already a Christian in his own convictions." The Copts have canonized both Pilate and his wife and honor them on the same day, June 25. The Abuna or patriarch of the Abyssinian Church receives his investiture from the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, who is the nominal head of the Ethiopian Church. The Abyssinians have no doubt adopted their notion of Pilate's canonicity from this source. Jesus' estimate of Pilate, however, as recorded in John 19: 11, is the verdict of history. The governor was a worldly man, weak and ambitious and unsupported by moral principle, who made a great crime possible by his feebleness of character.

centered in the hall would tend to keep even the dancing parties within the limits of decency. But a hall used exclusively for dancing must possess an atmosphere of sensuality and religion that makes it entirely unsuitable as the meeting-place of a Sunday school. If the school is available for the Sunday school sessions they ought by all means to be moved to it.

S. P. K., Consort, Can. 1. Theologians designate three dispensations: the Patriarchal, the Mosaic (or Jewish) and the Christian. The first began with Adam and ended with the giving of the Law; the second from the Law to the death of Christ, and the third—the Gospel dispensation—is now in operation. 2. We are not familiar with the doctrines of the denomination you mention. 3. Why not stick to your own church? Unless there are stronger reasons than your letter would imply, a change might be unwise and would be very apt to prove unsatisfactory. No denomination has a monopoly of the truth, whatever its adherents may claim.

Mrs. O. L. P., Canyon City, Ore. At the time of the crucifixion, we are told in Matt. 27: 51-54, there were great signs and wonders with an earthquake and sudden darkness and the veil or curtain of the temple was rent from top to bottom. The temple itself, however, did not fall.

Cadet, Brooklyn, N. Y. It is claimed that the periscope was the invention of an American, Chief Engineer Thomas Doughty of the United States monitor Osage, who suggested to Admiral Selfridge as a means of observation for the operator in the monitor's turret. It was made of a section of three-inch steam pipe with pieces of looking-glass inserted as reflectors and served very well.

Reader, Oakland, Calif. The prophecy in Isa. 13 regarding Babylon has been literally fulfilled. It is a heap of ruins; it has never been rebuilt and is uninhabited, save by wild birds. Its extensive ruins are traced on the east bank of the Euphrates River. The region, once fertile, has become a sterile waste, largely marsh. Explorers have made many excavations, but no one, we believe, has ever suggested the rebuilding of Babylon.

Reader, New York. According to the recognized authorities on parliamentary law all amendments should be seconded. Each amendment to the main motion must be disposed of before a new amendment to the main motion can be entertained by the chair. A new amendment may, however, be entertained when it does not deal with the main motion, but with the preceding amendment still pending. All amendments being disposed of, the vote then comes upon the main motion as amended.

K. S. B. There are many people who, for rough exterior, carry faithful and sympathetic hearts. We only see the outward appearance, and are prone to judge wholly by it, and this is often not only a mistake but a great injustice. Possibly if one were to visit some of these places where good works are done in secret, he would find many a revelation of Christlike helpfulness and sympathy on the part of those who love to do such things without publicity. These are the people who have "learned the glory of doing good."

Arthur J., Deer Park, Wis. There is no data from which to determine how long a period of preparation was passed by John the Baptist before his public mission began. Banishment of his instructors (mentioned by Josephus) records that he was with John three years in the wilderness, sharing his austerities. He doubtless spent a much larger period in preparation, however, but the whole of his life from childhood until about his thirtieth year is hidden in obscurity. His public ministry began about A.D. 25, and his death occurred in A.D. 28.

Discouraged Mother, Montana. It is unfortunately true that the burden of an "unlucky yoke" is a heavy one. In some cases it may almost become intolerable. (See I Cor. 7: 16 and II Cor. 6: 14.) We do not think any individual is qualified to judge or to advise in such cases. Faith in God and the powerful influence of an upright life, added to kindly persuasion and patient prayer, are the best weapons for such conditions as you describe. In any case, if you labor on this line, our Father, who knows all our troubles, will open a way out of them for those who implicitly trust in him.

When sunshine paints the sky with gold,
And crimson streaks the west;
When every bird has settled down
Into its tiny nest—
When evening quiet fills the farm,
My sorrows from me fall;
For, as I watch, the ducks come home,
To answer Molly's call.

The barnyard noise has died away
Into a drowsy hum,
The cows and pigs and horses wait,
For supper time to come.
Ah, somehow as I stand and watch,
Life seems serene and sweet;
When Molly calls her feathered flock,
And gives them food to eat.

C. C. W., Troy, N. Y. Why is it that the Abyssinian Church proclaims Pontius Pilate a saint?

Many strange legends concerning Pilate have been preserved. Concerning these, one commentator writes: "The disposition to represent Pilate as himself becoming a Christian explains, perhaps, the belief of the Coptic Church that he died a saint and a martyr." His wife, Claudia Procula, according to the tradition, had already become a convert to the new faith, and on that account she is honored as a saint by the Greek Church. Some of the early Christians seem to have identified her with the Claudia of II Tim.

Sunday School Treasurer, Oregon. Is it right to hold Sunday school in a hall used at other times for dancing? Those who favor holding our Sunday school sessions there claim it is right to do so because the building was designed for all public purposes, although so far nothing but dancing affairs have been held there. Our Sunday school has formerly met in the public school building.

It would be far better not to have the Sunday school meet in such a hall. If the former plans for the building had been carried out, and it were a hall to which the community looked as a center of social and civic life, and dances were only occasionally had there, the situation would not be so bad. The thought of the children about the building would be of its lectures, concerts, debates, forums, conferences, or possibly its athletic contests, or reading rooms; the dancing being only incidental would not be largely in their minds, but would be thought of in a matter-of-fact way as something which some of their elders sanctioned and others disapproved. Again, the fact that other interests

WAR ORPHANS IN HOLLAND HOMES

PROBABLY no country in the world has had a more difficult charity problem to contend with than little Holland. Right nobly has it risen to the emergency, and not only the Belgians—of whom there are vast numbers of refugees still enjoying the shelter and kindly hospitality of the Dutch people—but the English, the French and the workers of the American Relief Commission have been struck with admiration at the efficient manner in which the Hollanders have handled a trying situation. When the Christian Herald War Relief work was started a committee was organized in Rotterdam known as "The Christian Herald Dutch Committee for Relief to Widows and Orphans of the War," with headquarters in the American Relief Commission Building in that city. With the fine gift, $10,000, from the fund, a remarkable work was accomplished and many thousands of destitute Belgian families were relieved. We published accounts of the committee's work from time to time, and today we take pleasure in presenting further details, received by the latest mail, in the following letter:

"ROTTERDAM, July 23, 1915.

"Our Christian Herald Family:

We feel that you would like to know, and that you are more than entitled to know, what we have been doing with that part of your generous gifts which has been sent to us for distribution in Holland. As you are aware, we have thus far received two remittances, one of $10,000 and one of $2,500—and we are now busy making up a full report as to the way in which the money has been distributed. Were sorry to say the bottom of our exchequer is now visible, and we will have to forego the pleasure of being able to help in many cases where it is so urgently needed.

On the whole, our task has been a very delightful and grateful one; but nothing has given us greater satisfaction than the help we have been able to give, in your name, to the poor little orphans of Belgium. Harry Brands of Amsterdam has formed a committee, under the name of "The Home for Belgian Children," and he and his friends have gone into the heart of Belgium to find the poor little children whose parents had fallen as victims of the cruel war, and who were now practically without either home, clothing or food. Knowing you would want us to do so, we have devoted $200 to this splendid work, and in this manner it is possible to hire a house in Amsterdam, and arrange it as a temporary resort for the little children arriving from Belgium. At the home they are cleaned, clothed and well fed, until the necessary number of [Dutch] families is found to take in one or more of the children each as their own. No doubt you wonder whether these youngsters ever thought of the Christian Herald Family, and whether they were grateful. Just look at the accompanying pictures and convince yourselves! (Look at faces and banners.)

"Do you know there are thousands more poor little children in Belgium now without any support worth mentioning? Just read the translation of letters we have received from Mr. Brands and then decide for yourselves whether you will leave these little ones to their misery, or continue to help, as you have helped those others, who will never forget who it was that saved their lives.

"Yours very sincerely,

"CHRISTIAN HERALD DUTCH COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE WAR.

"P. C. JONGENEEL, Secretary."

The appealing letters mentioned in Secretary Jongeneel's communication are given in translation below, and will be read with wide interest:

"ASSOCIATION HOME FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN,

"AMSTERDAM, 21 July, 1915.

"Dear Sir: At the request of Professor Niermeyer [chairman of the Christian Herald Relief Committee] I herewith send you photographs of our Passage House, set up with the 5,000 francs ($1,000) given by the Christian Herald. We are really in need of money, otherwise we shall not be able to keep this going. Yesterday I received a request to house 75 Belgian orphan children, and this morning a request to bring 187 impoverished and hungry orphans, who are gathered together at Andenne, over to Holland to be placed with families."

In another letter, Notary Brands writes: "There are at this moment 18 children in our Passage House, brought from Belgium, where they were in the greatest misery, and who were brought over the frontier with very much difficulty. There have been more, but some are already placed with families, and since these photographs were taken, others have come in their places. This change is going on continually. It is pity that we are obliged to be so sparing with the money. The children are in urgent need of better clothing and of strengthening food. We should also like to save more children, but our resources do not permit this. You would therefore be doing good work by requesting the Christian Herald to place say 10,000 francs ($2,000) at our disposal to supply the wants of the suffering Belgian orphan children."

"From the beginning, a separate book has been kept for the Passage House, and the accounts and reports will be sent to you as soon as the work is finished. Yours, etc.,

C. E. J. BRANDS.

IN view of this very interesting development of the relief work, and also in consideration of the strong recommendation of the Christian Herald

Committee in Rotterdam, a further sum of $2,000 (10,000 francs) has been appropriated for the needs of the Passage House in Amsterdam, and the money has been cabled to Treasurer Jongeneel for that purpose. We believe this gift is one which will meet the warm approval of all the contributors to the fund.

Our readers will not fail to appreciate the significance which attaches to the relief that is dispensed in the name of the Christian Herald, namely, that the recipients cannot but feel that the sources of this help are Christian hearts. "Christian" Herald Relief Fund means to thousands of these sufferers that the good people of America are remembering them in their need for His sake. Such a charity, wisely administered, is a real missionary force. The name of Christ is glorified and his love is shed abroad in human hearts through such an agency as this which our readers are sustaining. As we have previously announced, we shall keep the fund open so long as generous hearts wish the Christian Herald to forward their gifts.

THE CHRISTIAN AND BUSINESS

A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH*

TEXT. "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Rom. 12:12

NO one is sent into the world to pass the time in idleness. He who gave us being gave us also something to do. Though the Christian is an heir of heaven, he has earthly duties to fulfil which claim a share of his time and thought, and through these duties, if performed in the right spirit and with right motives, God may be served as acceptably as in any other way that may be open to us. All about us are proofs that work is one of God's best gifts to men. Nature, in all her manifold activities, from the lowest to the highest forms of life, teaches us that action is life. Stagnation always spells death. It is a mistake to think that while our hands are busy with our daily toil, our hearts cannot be in communion with God. The real incarnation of the Gospel truths in human personalities and the right expression of these truths in concrete forms respecting man's relations with his fellow men would make all work sacred. His business would then become a method, and for him perhaps the principal method, of expressing his interest in the kingdom of heaven and his fellowship with God.

Work has a vastly deeper meaning than being the chief means of contributing to our sustenance. Vigor of body and mind and soul depend upon it. To be employed in some right vocation is as much a moral necessity as it is a physical necessity. The man who does not work degenerates physically, mentally and morally. If it were possible for all to live without engaging in some useful occupation, the low condition to which mankind would sink is scarcely conceivable.

Christianity a Living Force

Our business should never be regarded merely as an occupation. We should have something of the conception of the artist who had worked for more than a year to reproduce the features of Wendell Phillips. When the bust was completed he said: "I put my soul into it." Putting one's soul into one's business does not mean that one should be wedded to it so as to make it a success financially, but that it may be a medium of expressing the life one now lives by faith in the Son of God. To the Christian business cannot be an end in itself, but simply a means to an end. He is never controlled by it; he never allows it to become his master. He recognizes the fact that Christianity is vitally related to his business; that Christianity must control him in his commercial activities as fully as in those which by common consent are called religious. For Christianity cannot be confined to the sanctuary, expressing itself in psalms and spiritual songs; but the counting-room, the shop and the farm are to be sanctified, set apart to the holy uses of work and worship.

As a class the Christian business man is perhaps not more tardy in the performance of his Christian duties than others. But the dangers to which he is exposed, the temptations that assail him on every side, often put his principles to the severest tests.

There are some businesses with which a Christian cannot be connected either directly or indirectly—which he dare not even countenance. The thought to be emphasized is not the choice between a business that is ruinous in its effects upon all who engage in it and a business which is essential to human needs, but the right conduct of a business right in itself. Here is the crux of the whole matter. This is the danger point, and right here is where thousands fail. It is a law of mathematics that there can be but one straight line between two points; it is just as true of business. The slightest deflection from this rule is the beginning of a man's downfall. It does not always end in financial bankruptcy. The disaster is greater; he becomes a bankrupt in character. A business man confessed to his friend that the memories of his life came back to him and their company was anything but agreeable. It might have been otherwise. He might have tried for higher things but did not. He did not rob, nor steal, nor lie—at least not much. He was oversharpened in his dealings at times, and said some things he did not quite mean; but the wrong was chiefly in the principle and spirit of his life. He did not see how much good he could do, but how much money he could accumulate. The folly, not to say the sin, of such a course is being recognized more and more. A prominent merchant died recently leaving a large fortune. After providing for his family, church benevolences, etc., he arranged to have the business continued with the stipulation that it be conducted upon the high plane of the Golden Rule, to the practice of which he had attributed his own success. At a meeting of advertisers not long ago, one of the speakers said that the "advertising men are in a fight for ideals in business and to stamp out debasing practices." The publicity director for a great dry goods merchant said: "There is a new type of man in business today."

But Christianity must do even more for him than this. Many do business along the lines indicated, who make no professions to piety. There are men who hate falsehood, who cannot be bribed, who will not cheat, men who possess unimpeachable integrity, men who, of choice, exemplify the ethics almost universally accepted as true according to the world's standard, yet who are not Christians. It is easily possible for one in business, whether he is a banker, a lawyer or a merchant, to adorn his calling from other than Christian principles. Pride may be the motive of what is externally right conduct. It may be the pride of business merely, or of ancestry, of reputation, of family, or respect of friends. These "ideals in business" must be Christian ideals and this "new type of man" must be the type the Gospel of Christ alone can furnish. Business and Christian morality dare not be divorced. God himself has joined them together. A separation here as surely works the ruin of character as separation of the marriage bond wrecks the home. To stop questionable bargaining, discarding false balances, turning resolutely away from short measurements, refusing all misrepresentation of values, scorning to lie under any circumstance—to shun everything that would not square with the line of the best ethics when viewed merely from a secular standpoint—would, as Dr. Johnson once said, "revolutionize trade and change the conduct of many a man who now goes unquestioned as to his business standing."

A Man and His Calling Are One

High as is the level to which a man is raised who follows the best code of business ethics according to a worldly standard, Christianity lifts him to a much higher altitude. He must conduct his business along the line of the best Christian ethics. The man who does not allow Christianity to control him in the so-called secular activities for which nature and experience have fitted him has no Christianity worth anything to himself or to others. The Golden Rule, not the rule of gold, must be the basis of all his actions. No fervent singing of psalms, no amount of direct effort, no exhibition of piety, no liberal contribution however frequently repeated or large the amount, no matter how great the need and worthy the cause, can atone for the conscious departure from the path of rectitude.

St. Paul expresses the right relation in I Cor. 10: 31: "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." This is the high Gospel ground upon which men, and especially Christian business men, should prosecute their work. It is not possible to narrow down this principle to those duties we are accustomed to call religious, but it is to be applied to all our activities, whether great or small. The thought of the apostle seems to be that, whether in secular affairs or in religion, everything we do should be done under the compulsion of love. For love to God and love to man is to be the dominating force in our lives. Love is to be the motive compelling and controlling every action. Business, instead of being considered as something separate and distinct from Christianity, as having nothing to do with religion, is to be regarded as one of the many methods of expressing its life and power. Our commercial transactions are to be regarded as sacred as our worship. Trade is to be conducted with the righteousness enjoined by the New Testament. Then business becomes a mighty agency of spiritual blessing. It is then an expression of righteousness that honors God and blesses the world. When the law of love takes the place of the law of the jungle, we may expect the kingdom of God to grow mightily. Charles G. Finney once said that if Christian men would do business one year on Gospel principles it would shake the world.

A manufacturer said to me: "Business is a proposition. It is not a charitable institution; you can't produce the goods you have got to produce. This was said with reference to the employments of men. It is easy to see that the practical application of that principle soon becomes as hard as adamant. With few exceptions corporations are held, and still hold, the same view. Men, professedly Christians, accept directorship in corporations, who by their own admission have very limited knowledge of how the business is managed or of the hard conditions under which their employees are compelled to labor. And what is worse, they do not seem to care. This is not true of all; perhaps not of most. Under the old Jewish system no one would become extremely rich or extremely poor permanently. What would be the conditions today if the teachings of our holy Christianity were allowed full supremacy in all our affairs?"

Evangelizing Power of Business

The Christian business man takes Christ into active partnership, and never uses his ability to get rich for his own sake, or to pile up a fortune for his children. He is God's representative among men. The love and life that shall fit him for the life hereafter are manifested in his dealings with his fellows with ever-increasing faithfulness. In him the teachings of the Gospel and the spirit of Christ have gotten the mastery over greed and selfishness. Carey once said in answer to inquiry: "What is your business?" "My business is to serve God; I mend shoes to pay expenses." At a business men's convention in Chicago, a delegate from Philadelphia, Pa., who spoke in one of the leading churches on Sunday, June 20, 1915, said: "The sacred mission of business is to acquaint man to know and to love his fellow man, to refine his nature for the world to come. For I believe that the gospel of business, which is the Gospel of the Golden Rule, is part of God's plan for the regeneration of the world." The universal acceptance and observance of that principle would produce a revolution as great as the Reformation.

Christian business men hold in their hands perhaps more than all others, the power that shall make Christ King in all the earth. Would that God they could all see this and make use of the opportunity!

In the Afterglow

MOTHER o' mine, in the afterglow
Of mothering years, I love you so;
For loving me e'er life I knew,
When next your heart a new life grew;
Loving me on into fair childhood,
When I so little understood
The long, hard way we all must go,
Mother o' mine, I love you so.

Loving me, too, when life so sweet
Tempted my wayward, girlish feet
Away from paths of truth and right
To paths that lead to sin's dark night;
Winning me back with loving tone
To ways that you had made your own
By struggle and stress and pain and prayer,
By love's own cords you held me there.

Mother o' mine, 'tis mine to take
The burdensome load, the stress, the ache,
That come in motherhood's fair years,
The joy, the pain, the love, the tears;
'Tis mine to give what you gave me,
Mother o' mine, I would faithful be
To the highest note in the song you taught
My girlish lips, the music fraught
With all the mother hopes and fears,
That fill to the brim the mothering years.

Mother o' mine, in the afterglow
Of motherhood's years, I thank you so
For gifts to me from out your heart.
At thoughts that rise my hot tears start;
God give me ways to make you know
How great is my love before you go Away to rest from your mothering;
I would remove life's every sting,
And give you rest in the afterglow,
For, mother o' mine, I love you so.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Songs of the Road

SUNDAY, August 22. Isaiah 35: 10. "The ransomed of the Lord shall come to Zion with songs." In his very gracious and inspiring life of his father, Denholm Brash, his son tells us of his father's passionate love for the Methodist Hymnal, and how they agreed to call the sections on Pilgrimage and Guidance "The Songs of the Open Road." I like the title. It tells me that heavenly pilgrims are to be known by their songs. When we overtake them, or when they pass us on the road, they are to be distinguished by their singing. When Christian was creeping through the appalling Valley of the Shadows, and he became very disconsolate, as the way was exceedingly narrow and full of abominations, he heard another pilgrim singing, "I will fear no evil," and with that he was made glad, for he hoped to have company by and by.

Pilgrims must sing for their own sakes. Songs are the appointed helpmeets of the journey, and if we reject them the road doubles its length. "If the way be weary, tell it Him in song," and in the very telling some of the weariness will have fled. In one of the most powerful of his poems Wordsworth describes a marvelous sunset which he saw from the cliffs on the northwestern coast of England. And this is how he says he felt: "Wings at my shoulders seemed to play." And those are the very wings which play upon the shoulders of pilgrims who pace the highway of the Lord singing the songs of Zion. The song fills the soul with a sense of lightness, and gives nimbleness to the heavy feet. Even Mr. Ready-to-act "footed it well" when Mercy began to play upon the lute, and melody was heard upon the road.

And we must force ourselves to sing the song even when the bird has injured wings. "How can we sing the songs of Zion in a strange land?" Yes; but, as Dr. Rendal Harris has somewhere said, What might have happened if they had tried? What misadventure influence there might have been in the uplifted psalm? A song in the night has a haunting strain! "Nearer, my God, to thee," sung when the tempest is sweeping down the road, becomes a call to an evangel to many who have not yet turned to the pilgrim road. And so the pilgrim heart should be home of song. Song shortens the road, it doubles the service. J. H. J.

He Is with Us in the Hour of Trial

MONDAY, August 23. Isaiah 43: 1-13. "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee." God does not preserve his children from the waters or the fire. We might have expected the veil would run, "Thou shalt never pass through the river; thou shalt never be called to tread on the burning coals." But so far from this, it seems to be tried as a matter of course that there will be overflowing floods of sorrow, and the biting flames of hell. God's people are not saved from trial but in it. Fire and water are cleansing agents that cannot be dispensed with. The gold and silver, the brass, iron, and tin, everything that can abide the fire must go through it, that it may be cleansed; and that which cannot abide fire must go through the water. See Num. 31: 23.

The world may wonder at seeing God's children in trouble like other men—not remembering that the King himself passed through flood and flame, and not realizing that there are fords in the floods and paths through the heart of the flame. God does not take us to the city that hath foundations by an easier way than the path of the Cross. But there is his compensation: that he is with us, that the floods are under his control, and the fire has not power to singe the hair of our heads or leave the scorch-brand on our skin. Ponder verses 1 and 7. The reason for our safety is in the purposes of eternity, in the deeds of Bethlehem and Calvary, in the everlasting covenant sealed by blood, in the great price of our redemption. Is it likely that a purpose which reaches back to the blue azure of eternity will be lightly abandoned? The early dew may dry up, the gourd of the night wither, the haily formed purpose be abandoned, but thy election was in the heart of God ere seraph's voice struck across the depths of the sea of glass!

Live at Peace with All Men

TUESDAY, August 24. Genesis 13: 8. And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I am with thee, between thee and me, and between my herdsman and thy herdsman; for we are brethren. It is not always easy to get on with one's relatives. The saying, "Save me from my friends," is not without meaning. Any two people possessed with decided views, or strong strain of temperament, are almost sure at times to clash. Certain people, moreover, are seemingly inherently repugnant and uncongenial to one another, and neither is to blame and neither is necessarily bad, nor is it impossible for either one to get on excellently with some one else or in another environment.

Abram saw this. He did not begin by censuring or minimizing Lot and his family because they could not get on peaceably together. He did not say in a tyrannical, brutal way, "These servants and people are opposed to me and my people and must come to my will and my way of thinking." He was big enough to see that the world was sufficiently large for both Lot's family and his own, and he generously gave to Lot his choice of places to live in and do his work. This is a great teaching, this thought that generosity and bigness of vision are better than disapproval and censure. Today I shall try not to condemn the man who can not agree with me. I will not bully a weaker person into my ways of thinking, simply because I am stronger in argument. Neither will I be a Pharisee and glory in my moral superiority. I will at least learn not to mistrust or to judge or to despise people. Certainly I will not allow my dislike to harden into spitefulness or hate. This would be to injure both of us and to waste my own time. Gladstone said: "I haven't time to hate anybody." There is no force more deadly and destructive of happiness and success than hate and harsh censure. Today I will follow Abram's method, wishing my uncongenial friend or relative all good fortune in his own way and in his own place. C. S. C.

The Unity of the Household of Faith

WEDNESDAY, August 25. John 11: 47-57. "That He should gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad." Without realizing the full import of his words, Caiaphas uttered an opinion which was much deeper and truer than he thought. These scattered children of God are probably the same persons as those designated in the words of our Lord, when he spoke of those "other sheep" which did not belong to the Jewish fold, and whom he was to bring, that there might be one flock and one Shepherd; 10: 16. Either phrase suggests that in every age and under every sky there have been true children of God, who, amid the obscurities and errors of heathendom, have been led by the Light which lights every man coming into the world, and by its torch have groped their way instinctively to the Father's heart. They have not received the true knowledge of the Father, they do not understand how much he loves or has done for them, they have no apprehension of their union with a multitude that no man can number, who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb—these are "the children of God that are scattered abroad."

But notice that they were included in the sacrifice of Calvary. Jesus died, not for the Jewish nation only, but to become the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. Some day, in the world of face-to-face vision, this will be explained; and men like the good Cornelius will be led into the fulness of joy because into the fulness of understanding. Then the whole family of God will be one—one in a common nature; one in a common love; one in a common redemption; one in a common home; one in a common bliss; one in a common devotion to the Shepherd who leads to living fountains of waters, even farther into the heart of eternity. F. B. M.

Joy the Christian's Heritage

THURSDAY, August 26. Psalm 16: 11. "In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore." Religion, according to the Bible, should have a gladdening effect upon life. The Gospel of Jesus, as well as the Psalms, taken as a whole, affords constant rebuke for sad and lugubrious Christians. A lack of joy in our daily life is a sign that we do not trust the promise of God, and also that we do not appreciate the heartening influence upon others of a joyous personality.

The Japanese are taught from childhood to show a smiling face because, as I have been told by their teachers, it is thought unfair to others, as well as unmanly and unwomanly, to injure the happiness of their friends by sullen or unpleasant faces.

There is an Italian proverb to this effect: "If all cannot live in the Piazza, every one may feel the sun."

Fasting in the first century was probably not a very pleasant exercise, any more than it is today, and the Jews were inclined to aggravate its disagreeableness by showing to others their long and forbidding faces. The Master, who cannot be conceived as sad-faced, said to these Jews: "When thou fastest, wash thy face, that thou mayest not appear unto men to fast." He bequeathed to us his joy, a deeper thing than mere happiness, a thing that has peace in it, and trust, and a constant assurance of his guiding and guarding presence. Joy is our heritage. Joy is our duty to the world, which longs for it.

So take Joy home,
And make a place in thy heart for her,
And give her time to grow and cherish her;
Then will she come and oft will sing to thee,
When thou art working in the furrows; ay,
Or weeding in the sacred hours of dawn.
It is a comely fashion to be glad—
Joy is the grace we say to God.

The Consciousness of Pleasing God

FRIDAY, August 27. I Thessalonians 4: 1-8. "To walk and to please God, so abound more and more." These words in a pre-eminent sense set forth the life of Jesus. During his residence on our earth, he walked so as to please his heavenly Father. "The Father," said he, "hath not left me alone, for I do always those things that please him." But though we can never attain to the closeness of that blessed life, or the pleasure which elicited from the Father the words, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased"—yet there is a sense in which we may give God pleasure. "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord, and he delighteth in his way." "Enoch walked with God, and before his translation he had this testimony borne to him, that he pleased God." And the beloved apostle evidently had the same consciousness, when he said, "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments and do the things that are pleasing in his sight." Clearly there is a walk that pleases God.

A friend of mine once met an aged lady, a member of the Society of Friends, who in her earlier life had known Stephen Grellet. He asked her if that notable evangelist were as good and noble as he is depicted in his biography. This was her reply: "We have many excellent Friends, but no Friend like Stephen Grellet; when he came into a room you felt that he brought God in with him." This is characteristic of those who please God. They bring with them the sense of God's presence. But to attain this we must remember what the peasant Nicholas of Basle said to Tauler, the great theologian and preacher: "Know that you must take up your cross and follow Jesus Christ in utter humility, sincerity and patience, setting before you his sufferings, and without doubt, if you so do, the eternal King will look down on you with the eye of his good pleasure." The Compassion of Jesus

SATURDAY, August 28. John 11: 35. "Jesus wept." Did Christ weep because Lazarus was dead? Was it not out of sorrow for the afflicted sisters? He knew Lazarus would soon be alive again. He sorrowed because those he loved were in the depths of bereavement. "He is touched with the feelings of our infirmities" and afflictions. Go to him, dear suffering one, and let him weep with you.

But if we knew all that he knows about the outcome of our tribulations, our grief would often be turned into delight. Jesus saw the dead brother coming forth to the embrace of loved ones. He saw God being glorified by the wonderful miracle.

If we could see the silver linings of our dark clouds, how bright they would become! If we believe God's Word, we know that our light afflictions are working out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. With Paul, we can glory in distresses, in persecutions and trials, that the power of Christ may the more fully rest upon the soul. Christ's mission was to give "the oil of joy for mourning, the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Next to being a Saviour, Christ is the compassionate Comforter, "for he healeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds." E. W. C.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

"FATHER OF THE FIGHTING NAVY" DIES. General Benjamin Franklin Tracy died in New York on August 6 at the age of 85, after a lingering illness. As secretary of the navy under President Harrison, General Tracy earned his popular title of "father of the fighting navy" by determined efforts to take that department out of politics. He is credited with having brought the navy up to the point of efficiency that was so apparent in the Spanish-American War. Our first really great battleships were designed and built during his term in office. General Tracy was born in his father's farmhouse in Tioga County, New York. He won distinction not only in his administration of the navy department, but as a jurist and also as a soldier, for he raised two regiments of volunteers in the Civil War and won the congressional medal of honor for bravery in battle. In 1890 the wife and daughter of General Tracy were burned to death in his Washington home, a tragedy from the shock of which he never fully recovered.

GENERAL B. F. TRACY

STORM AND FLOOD WORK THEIR WILL. The month of August was ushered in on the Atlantic coast by a phenomenal storm, which collected a toll of 30 or more lives in passing, and strewn millions of property wreckage in its path. At Erie, Pa., a cloudburst, followed by the swelling of a stream called Mill Creek, which runs through one section of the city, and the bursting of the Glenwood dam, was responsible for 29 deaths at least and the destruction of fully 300 homes and half a hundred store buildings. In that vicinity the railroads were at a standstill, and scenes of the wildest confusion and terror were witnessed. For a time all light and power was shut off. The stream rose four feet in as many minutes and rushing through the city literally hurled houses from their foundations and piled them upon each other. Many manufacturing plants were hard hit, and intense suffering was caused to the hundreds of families who lost their homes. Among the tragedies at Erie is that as against 1,218,480 for the earlier year; 24,111 others were willing, but we were not and refused them admission. Furthermore, 204,074 emigrants left our shores in this latter twelve months, leaving a net gain to us of about only 122,000. But in the same period 180,000 transient aliens departed and 107,544 of the same class arrived, which further reduces the net gain in foreign population to about 50,000. Italians pleaded a previous engagement in largest numbers, some 238,000 fewer arriving than in the previous year; next in order of decrease were the Poles, then the Hebrews, Germans, Russians, and after that races of less prominence.

THE PANAMA CANAL IS NO PARASITE. It is evident that the government will not have to support the Panama Canal. For the year ending June 30, the total earnings were $4,343,484, and operating expenses were $230,833 less. This surplus, with some Federal help, will take care of the interest on the investment, depreciations and various other items not chargeable to operating expenses. This record of the Canal's first year in operation is prophetic of a prosperous future. It is pointed out in connection with these figures, that commercial traffic through the Suez Canal has fallen off nearly 40 per cent., while warship tonnage passing through has increased almost sufficiently to balance that loss. The Suez Canal collected over $25,000,000 in tolls for the year (about a million decrease over the previous year), and the operating expenses were nearly $6,000,000. But the Suez Canal is 45 years older than the Panama Canal.

A CHANGE OF TILL? The Des Moines Leader publishes the fact that "since the saloons have closed, the number of pay checks cashed in banks has increased almost 100 per cent." in the experience of one banker, who declares that his bank has a hundred thousand dollars more on deposit than it had before the saloons closed. Bankers in the city seem to agree that there is actually a change of till into which the breadwinners of that city are dropping their spare cash.

TO SET US ON FIRE FOR SUFFRAGE. The Women's Political Union has devised a symbolic "torch of victory," which has been relayed about New York State in automobiles to enthruse the friends of woman suffrage, and its magic power is to be tried on all the states in succession. The transfer of the torch of victory from New York to New Jersey was accomplished with much pleasing ceremony midstream of the Hudson on Saturday, August 7, tugs bearing representatives from the two states drawing together at high noon.

and increases in wages, and therefore the national strike which was contemplated will not be necessary. The demands for the extension of the eight-hour day will be continued throughout the country.

OUR OWN PRIVATE WAR. Our naval forces in Porto Rico, numbering about 1,500, have occupied the capital, Porto Prince, and have been obliged to kill three or four of the revolutionary natives who persisted in defying them. The battle of Connecticut is now on the scene, and Admiral Caperton in charge; Colonel Cole of the Marine Corps is in command of the land force for the maintenance of order. Additional reinforcements are being sent by the Navy Department, but at present there is little disposition on the part of the natives to accept American control.

ENDEAVORERS PRAY FOR PRESIDENT CLARK. The continued serious illness of Rev. Francis E. Clark, founder of the Christian Endeavor Society, in his home at Auburn, Mass., is a matter of deepest concern to his countless friends and members of the great organization which he founded and many others are praying earnestly for his recovery.

A LOSS AND A GAIN. The Laymen's Missionary Movement has lost the leadership of J. Campbell White, general secretary since 1907, and Wooster University, Ohio, has gained him as president. Wooster is the largest of the Presbyterian colleges and has an enrollment of about 800 students and endowments aggregating almost two and a quarter million. Mr. White belongs to the United Presbyterian body. He was one of the founders of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, which began with a prayer meeting in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

THE EASTLAND INQUIRY. Investigators who are trying to fix the responsibility for the Eastland disaster have continued in more or less of a muddle, and, up to the time they go to press, had given the public no satisfactory accounting of their work. The total number of persons who perished is then officially as 981, of whom 111 are still missing.

PAN-AMERICAN COERCION IN MEXICO. At the invitation of the American Government, the republics of Chile, Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, Uruguay and Guatemala may meet with our government in making such representations to the leaders of the warring factions in Mexico as may bring them to their senses and to an agreement for peace. Diplomatic efforts of a family of four, who perished because, on account of the illness of a little baby of thirteen months, they refused to heed the warning to flee. Other sections of the Atlantic seaboard were caught in one of the most terrific downpours of rain in their experience, accompanied by high winds, which left its mark upon almost every community. The path of the storm extended hundreds of miles inland, but the greatest harm appears to have been done near the coast. Several boat wrecks along shore are recorded, with the deaths of members of the crews, and a great many small craft were sunk at their anchorage. Besides buildings, crops were damaged to an enormous extent, especially in New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

PORTUGAL ELECTS PRESIDENT. The Congress elected Bernardino Machado president of the republic of Portugal on August 7. Senhor Machado was once minister to the United States under the name of Thyro, according to accounts. He is reported to be very popular with all classes, but his first candidacy for the presidency (just after King Manuel II was dethroned and the republic proclaimed, October 5, 1910) was defeated by Dr. Manuel Arriaga, whom he now succeeds. Recently rumors had it that three different revolutionary movements were under way in Portugal.

PREVENTED FROM COMING BY A PREVIOUS ENGAGEMENT. Almost 900,000 fewer immigrants entered the United States during the twelve months ended July 1 than in the previous twelve months, the total admissions being 326,700

WITH THE STRIKERS. The trouble in the cloak-making industry of New York appears to be settled, both sides signing a peace agreement binding for two years, under which a higher wage scale will prevail. For a short time it looked as though several hundred thousand workers would be plunged by the cloakmakers into a prolonged strike. A statement issued by the International Association of Machinists claims that more than 200,000 machinists have now received the eight-hour day are being made to include all of the American republics in this move, which at this writing, August 7, is still in a formative stage. Meanwhile the situation is growing daily more tense, and a spirit of restlessness prevails because of the lack of definite action to terminate the condition of anarchy that prevails. The civilian population has been under long-continued hardships, and there is absolutely no indication that victory is hovering above any one of the bandit armies.

THE SPIRITUAL FIELD RIPE FOR THE HARVEST. The Massachusetts Federation of Churches has addressed an appeal to all the churches of that state urging that they engage with renewed zeal in the most energetic campaign possible, with unceasing prayer and personal work by every follower of Jesus Christ, in order to take full advantage of the unusually favorable opportunities for urging the claims of God's kingdom brought about by circumstances connected with the worldwide war.

BON VOYAGE! With 16,500 tons of war munitions aboard, and nearly 300 passengers, including a number of Americans, the White Star liner Adriatic sailed from New York for Liverpool on August 4. The utmost care was taken to prevent placing aboard of the Adriatic any device that might cause the vessel's destruction at sea. The innocent and harmless cargo of munitions is said to be the largest yet shipped from an American port.

There is a home in New York City consisting of two rooms. There is one window in the two rooms, looking on a space that is almost filled with fire escapes and clotheslines walled in by surrounding buildings. The furniture in the rooms would not be given space for storage in our barn: if you owned it you would burn it up rather than keep it around. A woman, whose win clothing and general air of dejection fit into the surroundings, is the mistress of that "home" and its sole support. There is really nothing attractive about her. But up at Mont-Lawn a little thin boy who is luxuriating in great open spaces of land, in a clean bed in an airy room, and in what seems to him sumptuous fare in the dining hall of Fort Plenty, has an awful twitching and aching and yearning in his heart every day he is there for his home and mother. Between him and that two-roomed home there is a strong bond of affection. He wants above everything else to make his mother know what a wonderful place he is in. Unconsciously, he knows that a mother-heart can be light and happy in two bare rooms such as these, just because she knows her little starved boy is happy somewhere else. Her hearts are the same the world over.

We have not room this week to do something the another time, probably next year, we intend to do; and that is, give you some sample letters from among the many scribbled, misspelled notes that the boys and girls at Mont-Lawn eagerly send back to their sweltering homes with a breath of cheer. The best we can do is to put together, as though it were one letter, the experience of several boys, and tell those experiences in their own peculiar way of speaking. The letter is just as true as though it had been written from start to finish as it appears here. It is a make-up letter, but it is not a made-up experience. We have drawn upon our intimacy with these children and with their letters here in this "letter" from "Billy." These are the things he would say if he wrote so long a letter, and that he does say when he really gets "home." We want him to speak as typical Mont-Lawn boy writing to his mother, so that you can see things at Mont-Lawn through a little boy's eyes. And then after you have done that we want to ask you a question or two about your impressions. Give practically the same things. Call this a boy-and-girl letter, if you prefer.

DEAR Mama, I wish you was up here to. You couldn't have that ache no more, I bet you. Yesterday I saw a girl just like Mamie, the very same kind of a frame to her left leg and all. And she was having as much fun as the best of them. But poor Mamie has to lie out there onto the fire escape all day,

FROM A BOY'S HEART—HOME

and be pulled in onto that hard old cot nights; honest Mama, I cried when I thought of her. How do you like me in the picture the teacher took? Say Mama, you know them old shoes that was give to you for me and you made me bring them? They was a boy here like me and he wouldn't run in the races, and when I asked him why not, all he did was to point to his feet, and what do you think? He had on girl's shoes. So I gave him that pair. Do you mind? Only afterward I heard he could of got sneaks off of the Superintendent, if he had of told her. I guess he was ashamed to. I wish you could have what we get for meals. All you got to do is to hold up your hand and you get another big piece of bread and jelly. The kids that's new up here won't believe it when we tell them first. And two cups of milk, and everything. Say Mama, heaven can't be no better. I only wish you could get as much to eat. That patch came off my pants again, but a teacher fixed it. Some kids have got two pants. You didn't know that Mary Garris got to come did you? You wouldn't know her now to see her. She ain't white any more, and she ain't crying all the time like she did. You used to say her arms and legs was like matches. But you ought to see her run now. And she is all brown. I bet you she won't get sent home from school no more with head aches. Three hundred of us is a lot, ain't it Mama. You ought to hear us sing in chapel, its grand. And we pick all the flowers we want when we go walking every day with the teachers. O dear Mama, I wish you could be here. I wish Mamie could to. Why shouldn't you ask the minister if he could somehow raise the three dollars to get her here for the ten days? Then I bet you her mother would be glad like you was when I came. You told me to be sure to get to sleep nights, because that was what was the matter with me. Well, I can't help sleeping I get so full of good air and tired with playing and the beds are so different from that old sofa you let me have. We salute the flag every day, and nobody grabs his food at the trades, and we all sing a blessing, and every time a kid goes home when his ten days is up he nearly cries, or if its a girl she does. I got four whole days yet. I wish you was here with me. Tell Mamie about it.

With love,

BILLY.

P.S. don't tell Mamie, it would make her feel too bad.

WE wonder if there is anybody who would fail to understand such a letter if it were indeed real. "Mamie" is indeed all too real—is there anybody who will send her to Mont-Lawn before it is too late: too late in the season—the Home closes just after Labor Day; too late—anyway. So many poor, crippled little Mamies drop fast to sleep dreaming of the beautiful times they are going to have "next year, when Mont-Lawn opens." True, we can take care of the crippled children only with great difficulty, but this year we had a score of them, and their faces have been one continuous smile. "Billy" and "Mary Garris" were sound enough; all they needed was nourishment, sanitary surroundings, sleep and play, play, out on sun-swept fields.

And oh, what numbers of little children must get through the withering summer without one whiff of country air, not one sight of green fields, not a night's sweet sleep the whole summer through! Yet for three dollars one such child can have all there is of glorious Mont-Lawn for ten whole, life-giving, tissue-building, hope-forming days. We can care for three hundred at a time. Who will help us keep Mont-Lawn filled to overflowing for the balance of the season? Who will give one rapidly wearing-out child a new start toward health, happiness and heaven?

MANY of the letters received from contributing friends of the Home show a cordial interest in the welfare of our little guests. H. M. C., Schenectady, N. Y., writes: "I send $5 to give some child an outing at Mont-Lawn. I feel that I should like to do some one good, as God has been so good to me." This beautiful and practical idea of "sharing our blessings" is expressed in many other letters. E. B. M., Hollywood, Calif., who sends $3, writes: "While taking a summer outing, we are reminded of those less fortunate. I trust this small gift may bring joy and refreshment to some little one." Another friend writes from Yonkers, N. Y.: "I am going away myself in a few days and was going to let this matter go until my return; but I thought that between now and then there might be some child who would want particularly to go to Mont-Lawn, but perhaps could not on account of the lack of subscriptions to the fund. I suppose they are all more or less disappointed if they cannot go; yet I am sure there are some to whom it means more. I hope you may find such a one and be able to send him." Our friend judged rightly, for there are many who are waiting eager to be sent to the Children's Paradise, if only the gifts are forthcoming.

It is pleasing to know that there are many friends of the work who remember Mont-Lawn regularly every summer, and keep it prominently on the list of their benefactions. One of this class of patrons is Mr. J. S. T. W., of Ogden, Iowa, who writes: "I enclose my annual gift of $6 for Mont-Lawn and trust it will do some little soul some good." And it will, for two little guests are the beneficiaries of his generosity and are enjoying a splendid, health-giving, ten days' outing.

Send all contributions, for Mont-Lawn to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

WAITING FOR THE PLAYGROUND CALL AT MONT-LAWN

HER GENEROUS MOMENT

By IDA ALEXANDER

GILBERTA ALLEN, pinning on her old hat, paused and turned around as Mr. Allen came in. He gave a low whistle as he saw her attired for the street. "You're going—today?" he asked. Mrs. Allen nodded brightly. "Yes, I heard the lion in his den today," she answered. "I might as well get over. She wrote for me to come this week." Mr. Allen groaned. "It kills me for you to go," he said. "Why, I don't mind it a little bit. At last, if I do," she added honestly, "I'm thankful to have it over." "I ought to go," he said. "It's a man's work." "Oh!" she cried. "You go, when you're scarcely able to hobble! I just see myself letting you go! It isn't as if I had to go to a lawyer, or anything like that. Just to see a woman in her own home and explain why the mortgage is overdue—who'd mind that?" "But such a woman!" "She's just," said Mrs. Allen, "and justice is a great thing." "But we need—we're asking—generosity." "Justice and generosity aren't as widely different as is supposed." "They're wide apart as the poles!" he cried. "Why, I don't suppose she knows what the word generosity means. If she does, she hasn't that reputation. Levin told me, when she took over the mortgage, to beware. I remember his exact words. 'I'm sorry the mortgage has fallen into the hands of Mrs. McAllister,' he said. 'She'll have her pound of flesh, that woman, though the skies fall.' Of course, it didn't mean much to me then—steadily at work, well and strong. But it means a good deal now."

Mrs. Allen turned her eyes down as she answered him. Her eyes told tales and she could not add her anxiety to his own.

"Don't be afraid, dear," she said. "You're getting stronger every day. And as soon as we have steady money coming in again, everything will be all right."

But it was not with a light heart that she went upon her way. Even better than he, she knew Mrs. McAllister's reputation in the neighborhood.

"A hard woman," one had told her. "When she dies, they won't have to open the window—her soul will go through the keyhole," said another. "She'd foreclose on her own mother," a third had charged.

But one and all—and upon this Mrs. Allen based her hopes—had agreed that she was just.

She walked down the street slowly, turning over in her mind the events which had brought matters to such a pass; events which they would have weathered in some sort of fashion. But when Mr. Allen fell ill of rheumatism, when the outgo increased and the income stopped, there was only one thing to do—beg a reprieve.

And now she was on her way to keep an appointment with the woman whom she had never seen, but of whom she had heard many things; the woman who held their future in the hollow of her tight-closed hand.

The house and plot of ground, well-kept but simple, announced the manner of living of Mrs. McAllister, even before she herself opened the door and ushered her visitor in.

"Come in, Mrs. Allen," she said. "You are prompt."

"Yes," said Mrs. Allen, "I came the first day of the week you said."

There was a moment of silence

Religion and the War

IF Christ had never come to save the world, what would have been the condition of human society today? Could it have been any worse than we see it in those countries that are now given over to strife and slaughter? In view of the apparent impossibility of stopping this frightful war, would it not be well to suspend the teachings of Christianity until the strife is over, seeing that its principles and doctrines cannot be practiced while the war continues?"

This startling suggestion of a religious moratorium until the close of the war, which some irreverent writer in Europe has set afloat for the purpose apparently of discrediting religion, like many other efforts at mischief-making, may become productive of good results, after all. A world which disavowed Christ and voluntarily tried to forget God would be a thousand-fold worse than if it had never known either a Creator or a Saviour, and had been left in its original darkness. "The wicked," says the Scripture, "shall return to Sheol, even all the nations that forget God." Such has been the fate of the ancient peoples and civilizations that gave themselves wholly over to wars, ambitions and the pursuit of pleasure. They were broken to pieces at last upon the hidden shoals toward which every human organization, without a religious anchorage, inevitably drifts.

But instead of the war turning the people away from religion, the Gospel is making wonderful progress, despite the war. Helpless, stricken, despondent, the multitudes are seeking God as their only hope. In the trenches and in the shadowed homes, they are seeking help from the only source whence it can come. And this experience, in degree, is not confined to Europe. If we turn to missionary fields we find that there, too, it has intensified religion. In recent letters to the homeland, missionaries tell of the influence of the war upon the natives among whom they are laboring. They picture the native attitude as one of astonishment that nations professing to be Christian should have so far forgotten the teachings of Jesus Christ as to enter on a war which has shocked the entire world. Yet the missionary work goes on. Instead of halting and weakening, the Gospel is winning more glorious victories than ever. During those twelve months of Europe's war, seven thousand of the high officials and literati of China have accepted Christianity and are organized in Bible classes. A wave of evangelism is sweeping across Japan. Ten thousand new converts are awaiting baptism in India. Uganda, in Africa, has become a Christian nation, and lately crowned its new ruler with Christian ceremonies. South America is witnessing a remarkable awakening. Korea is adding its thousands to the followers of the Cross. And we learn of wonderful religious arousals in Bulgaria, and even in some of the countries where war is now raging.

Glancing at the comparative cost of the two great wars—the material and the spiritual—we find here an amazing discrepancy. According to the estimate of statisticians, the nations of Europe have spent in a year of fighting "more treasure than they have unitedly accumulated in 500 years." The useless war, which has already killed off millions of men and decided nothing, is being kept up at a cost of $35,000,000 a day. This equals the united annual resources of all the Foreign Mission Boards of the world. It means that the warring nations of Europe are spending in the neighborhood of $1,450,000 every hour in wholesale destruction of human life, while the united Gospel forces of the globe, who are carrying out the "Great Commission" and bringing the whole world into the light of the Gospel, are doing their divinely ordained, life-giving and soul-saving work with financial resources that are infinitesimal in comparison. But divine reinforcement is fighting on their side, and will continue to fight until the last stronghold of heathenism and sin is taken for Christ.

If I Were Rich —

WHAT would you do if you had a thousand dollars? If you have that much, what would you do with a million? A woman wrote to Washington the other day asking for a thousand dollars. She had noticed the account of a man's sending ten thousand dollars to the government Conscience Fund and wrote to say that she thought she had better use for one of those ten thousand than the government could possibly have. She said she wanted to buy a cow, an automobile and a set of false teeth. In a fun story of Harvard life entitled "Pepper," by Holworthy Hall, is the following conversation:

"Pepper," said Sewall thoughtfully, "what would you do if you had as much as a million?" "Get a shine," said McHenry. "No—seriously." "Seriously?" repeated Pepper, "impossible! I could not be serious if I had that much." "Well, suppose we were just beating it along, as we are now, and a lawyer came up to us and told you one of your ancestors had died in Hong-kong and left you his wad. What would you do?" "I'd stand right where I am and yell for a taxicab," said Pepper. "I'd drive out to Cambridge, and then I'd buy the machine and give it to the chauffeur for a tip. Then, I'd get you a shine."

Not so much a person's possessions as his wishes are the true test of character. Lowell writes:

The thing we long for that we are
For one transcendent moment,
Before the present poor and bare
Can make its sneering comment.

What are your hopes? If you will tell us that, we can tell you what you are.

While it is delightful to think of the good we might do and the happiness we might bring to others if we had large sums of money, we must remember that wealth is not needed in order to make life useful and fruitful. Thoreau said: "Money cannot purchase a single necessity of the soul." He might have added that money cannot purchase any absolute necessity for the work of truly uplifting others. The world's most munificent benefactors have usually been its poorest men, who could say like Peter: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I unto thee. In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk."

Do not waste moments truly golden in thinking about what you would do if you had stores of fancied gold. You may laugh at the old woman and her curious desires or at the whimsical college boy, but perhaps if you were among those who are counted fairly wise you would do a foolish or even a harmful thing with your money when it came.

"Having food and raiment, therewith let us be content." "They that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." Make wise use of the golden hours, of the opportunity for speech that is pure and helpful as silver; learn to be rich in faith; find the spiritual jewels, charity, hope, joy—and you shall add your life to the noble company of those who have been classed as "poor, yet making many rich."

Progress in the Wrong Direction

NOT only the people of New York State but every American citizen should keep a close watch of the doings of the State Constitutional Convention in session at Albany, N. Y. Certain sinister influences are seen to be at work there to undo some of the progressive legislation of recent years and thwart future plans for similar legislation. To be sure, the new constitution must be ratified by the voters of the state, but the machinery of elections is so intricate that popular pressure ought to be brought vigorously to bear now upon the convention itself so that the framers of the new constitution will feel it unwise to submit the vicious reactionary measures proposed.

One of the worst propositions suggested to the convention by the Committee on Legislative Powers, of which William Barnes is chairman, is as follows:

The legislature shall not pass any bill granting to any class of individuals any privilege or immunity not granted equally to all members of the state; providing for or authorizing the expenditure of any public money to be paid to any person except for services rendered for employment by the state or a political division thereof; establishing a minimum wage for service to be paid to any employee by any private employer.

Could anything be more preposterous than for a group of politicians to try to manipulate the formation of the new constitution so that such social legislation as old age pensions, mothers' pensions, workmen's compensation acts, limitation of hours of labor for women and children would be impossible? To make such a constitution would be absolutely to contradict the fundamental principles of justice and democracy. It is hardly to be believed that the convention will either wish or dare to adopt such an outrageous suggestion to be submitted to the voters of the state.

Elihu Root, president of the convention, startled not only the convention itself and New York State but the whole country when he remarked the day that from his forty years' experience in public life he had come to believe that New York State enjoyed no more real democracy than Venezuela. When we remember Castro we get an idea of the democratic liberties of Venezuela. Mr. Root recommends giving the people some truly democratic measures. He counsels wisely. Yet some of the factions of the convention have been actually manipulating to abolish the direct primary—a popular victory won within a couple of years for the people of the Empire State.

An event which should have attracted far more notice than it did was the visit to the Constitutional Convention of a member of the firm of a famous New York banking house to protest against the proposed provision that the books of banking institutions should be at all times open to public investigation. He declared speciously that particularly in war times, when delicate international situations were involved, it was a bad thing to have the transactions of certain banks made public. This lays bare the whole pernicious purpose of the reactionaries, which is that the people be kept out of financial and legislative affairs so that the politicians and the financiers can have their way.

But this is precisely what the American people are getting tired of. And if the New York Constitutional Convention now in session insist on presenting to the electorate a document that will make impossible or difficult the progress toward fairness, liberty, a wider prosperity and a truer democracy, the voters of the state will tear their work to pieces.

Shining Examples

OUR good neighbor, The Continent, has been experiencing qualms of remorse over the iniquitous munitions traffic. Recognizing the contention of those who try to justify the traffic as in accordance with international law, and holding that "it is not fair play to change the rules while the game is on," the Continent, in its issue of July 8, has this very frank declaration concerning the higher aspect of the case:

But this estimate of official national duty should no longer be a public opinion from paying an enthusiastic meed of honor to those individuals and firms in this country who have refused, on personal conscience despite legal right, to accept war orders. Their unwillingness to make financial profit out of the blood of their fellow beings is a noble earnest of a universal spirit which in time to come will render wars impossible. Their impulse will shine brighter as days go on. Especially must it contribute to that needful popular sentiment which, when the war over, should, and undoubtedly will, demand new national legislation for future exigencies, whereby American citizens will be forbidden for all time to sell arms and explosives to any government while engaged in armed conflict. Such a statute, placed on the statute books in an hour of no immediate application, will be open to no objection of unneutrality, and thereafter stand as fair notice to all possible belligerents of what may be expected—or rather not expected—from the United States. Then they can take that factor into calculation before they go to war.

This is equivalent to an admission that the munitions traffic, as it now exists in the United States, is diametrically opposed to the spirit of Christianity and to the principles of humanity, which require of a nation profess to hold in such high regard. If those firms that have declined to take part in the unrighteous traffic and "to make financial profit out of the blood of their fellow beings," are to be commended as examples that will shine with increasing brightness, by what rule of logic can we be justified in withholding condemnation from those who are engaged in supplying the material that keeps the slaughter-mills of Europe busy and the world with widows and orphans? It is a business which no man can square with his conscience, however hard he may try. The national conscience should be strong enough to keep us clear of the horrible mess altogether.

While we write, the news comes by cable that W. A. Albright, president of one of the leading phosphorus manufacturing concerns in Europe—Albright & Wilson, of Oldbury, England—has resigned, together with one of his directors, rather than yield to government pressure which sought to force him into the business of making money out of the killing of human beings. The New York Evening Post remarks editorially: "In such conscientious revolts as these against the barbarity of war, there lies one of the hopes of ending it." Mr. Albright's sole reason is summed up in a single word: the traffic is "non-Christian."

Must Raise More Beef

THE American Feed Manufacturing Association, which has a decided interest in the increased production of cattle, has decided upon a campaign of education among the farmers of the country, on the advisability of devoting greater attention to the production of meats. The association claims that within the past fifty years the number of beef cattle raised for market in proportion to population has decreased 50 per cent. According to census figures, 66 were finished and marketed for each 100 of our population in 1900. In 1914 the number was only 36 to each 100 of population. Unless the farmers can be induced to raise more beef cattle, either there must be less meat eaten in the country, or reliance must be placed on foreign imports to supply the lack. There is danger that the days of low-priced meat are gone. The unlimited free range has gone. The homesteader and the wheat-raiser long ago took over the best of the old range. The farmer and the irrigationists are tying up what was left of the range. Farmers ought to make money raising cattle, sheep, and hogs, but more of them must be produced, or the people will more and more have to turn to substitutes for meat as food. The raising of meat products was the chief industry among the ancient Hebrews. This mention of the fact in the record of the exodus: "And a mixed multitude went up also with him; and flocks, and herds, even very much cattle." (Ex. 12: 38.)

Spots on the Sun

SPOT six times the diameter of the earth was observed upon the sun the other day by astronomers at Christian Brothers' College. The first appeared last February. Professor of Astronomy Eric Doolittle, of the University of Pennsylvania, commenting on the observation made by the Christian Brothers' College astronomers, said: "The period of time which we are passing now is known to astronomers as 'sun-spot maximum.' It means a time when large numbers of great spots are observed upon the sun, and occurs every eleven and eight-tenths years. The spot in question is about 45,000 miles across, which does not seem so large when it is remembered that the sun itself is 900,000 miles across." There is nothing in nature that is absolutely perfect. Even the magnificent sun, the center of the system, source of light and heat and life, vegetable and animal, has spots upon it. The imperfections of nature, however, are only relative; they are trifling. There is virtual perfection in the beauty, harmony, and unity of God's handiwork. There are spots on human nature that the blood of Christ alone can take out. The average person has weakness and faults enough, if attention should be focused upon them. Some little and mean people are always looking for these imperfections in their neighbors. They will overlook a sheet of white paper in their effort to find a blot; a beautiful character in their search for some defect. They do not see the glorious sun; they are so busy looking for the spots that are upon it. Our God, whom the sun glorifies, is perfect. He is absolute in his holiness. "Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." (Mal. 4: 2.)

Farmer's Whiskers Foil Mosquitoes

COME farmers of the West, especially in Kansas, have returned temporarily to the fashion of wearing long whiskers and hair to prevent the mosquitoes from interfering with harvesting. The farmers and their helpers report that this is the only protection they have from these insects. The continued wet weather has caused stagnant water in the fields and along the roadsides, and great numbers of mosquitoes infest the fields. The farmers say these insects are unable to bother them when faces and necks are covered with long hair.

Aside from the annoyance and pain of the mosquito bite, it is frequently quite dangerous as a carrier of disease. A few years ago, this fact was not known, and hundreds and thousands of children and grown people were killed every year by the deadly fevers caused by the bite of this mosquito. By the draining of marshes and the use of coal oil and other chemicals, a start has been made in the destruction of this dangerous insect. Annoying, painful and destructive insects were common in olden times. There is this reference to them: "He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them." (Ps. 78: 45.)

OLDEST CITY ON EARTH

DAMASCUS, a city of Syria, the largest in Asiatic Turkey, is the oldest city of the world. Damascus was old when Abraham was young. The steward of Abraham's house, Eliezer, was from Damascus. "The city is beautiful as well as ancient. The bright buildings, sparkling beneath a Syrian sun, rise out of a sea of variously tinted foliage, while all around, save on the northwest, where stretches the long, bare, snow-white ridge of the Anti-Lebanon, extend charming gardens, rich cornfields, and blooming orchards, with the river Barada (the Abana of the Scriptures) and its branches winding through until they lose themselves in the Lake Bah-el-Mejd." The city has 150,000 inhabitants, including some Europeans, a few of the Turkish nobility, and many Turks of number station. The exteriors of the houses, as a rule, are not comely; but some of the residences of the wealthy are furnished elegantly. Oblivion is the law of the past. Most of the great cities of old have been buried under the dust that Time has sifted through his fingers. It is only of late years that even the places where they stood have been discovered by digging deep among the ruins. Damascus has defied the ravages of time and men. It was this city to which Paul went to arrest Christians, and into which he was led, blind, to surrender as a captive to Christ, and thus to begin the civilization and Christianity of Europe and America. In Paul's account of the incident he says: "And I said, What shall I do, Lord? And the Lord, and unto me, Arise, and go into Damascus, and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do." (Acts 22: 10.)

Hawaii, has extended that wireless service nearly two-thirds the way around the globe. The first wireless from the station in Japan was received in New York July 27. It traveled in the air 3,350 miles, from Japan to Hawaii, and then 2,087 miles from there to San Francisco. The next link in the chain around the world will be from Japan to Singapore, extending the system 3,000 miles further. The next great station west of Singapore is to be Bangalore, capital of Mysore, India. Then the next is to be at Aden, on the southernmost tip of Arabia. The last link of the chain will be at Alexandria, Egypt, which will send messages east of Aden and west to Carnarvon, Wales. From the new plant at Belmar, N. J., wireless messages cross the Atlantic. Besides this great chain, girdling the globe, other lines will be instituted, bringing almost every great city of the earth into wireless communication—the marvel of our most marvelous age! This word of Scripture with reference to the heavens vocal with God's glory is being verified: "There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard." (Ps. 19: 3.)

Mental Maximum at Twenty-nine

DR. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL, president of Harvard, in a recent address magnified the ability and achievements of young men, and said that a man advances steadily in mental faculty till he is twenty-nine years old, when he reaches the maximum of his powers, and then steadily declines in his intellect and his service. Dr. Lowell enlarged upon the subject with scientific precision. Many, on reading the statement, will put an interrogation mark questioning the accuracy of it. It would be hard to reconcile that theory with the tremendous grip Gladstone had on England, Emperor William II and Bismarck on Germany, Francis Joseph on Austria, Victor Hugo on France, and Tolstoi on Russia, all old men, overtopping their contemporaries in Europe. A metropolitan daily has taken occasion to differ with President Lowell in claiming that the mental maximum is reached at twenty-nine. The paper printed the faces of twenty-one American men and four American women in a group, the youngest being 57, the oldest 87, averaging seventy-one and eight-tenths, all great leaders and now at the maximum of their mental powers. They are now conspicuously active in business, in philanthropy, in education, in literature, in law, in medicine, in invention, in diplomacy, in finance, and in other callings. It seems that President Lowell did not reach his maximum at twenty-nine, but is at his climax of power as president of Harvard at 59; and the mind that has been predominant in the educational world in America for a generation is Dr. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, at 81. Young men and old are now in the forefront of activity in the world, and in our nation today there is room and need for both without jealousy or criticism each of the other. The patriarchs were powerful men, and Moses was in his prime at a hundred: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." (Deut. 34: 7.)

Income for Faithful Horse

DR. GEORGE P. GRIFFING of Brooklyn died recently and in his will left a fund of $5,000 for the care of his faithful family horse Frank, who through day and night, summer and winter, sunshine and storm, had carried his master on professional errands. The horse was sent to Sag Harbor for tender treatment the rest of his days. As he is twenty-nine years old now, he cannot live many years. At the death of Frank, the $5,000 is to go to the Congregational church of Jamesport, New York, of which Rev. Frank Voorhies is pastor. The will, among other remembrances, gave $10,000 additional as a fund to the Jamesport Congregational Church. The horse is a beautiful, affectionate, faithful animal. Dr. Griffing was one of the number of those who had an especial affection for his faithful servant and companion. But the horse is not fast enough, nor strong enough, and he must go to make way for the horseless vehicle. Dr. Griffing was a sincere, active Christian and loved the church with intense devotion. He acted like a just man in his provision for his faithful old horse, illustrating the truth: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." (Prov. 12: 10.)

Best Preparation for Death

REV. R. G. CALLISON was addressing a large congregation in the tabernacle of the Oregon Christian Church Convention at Turner, Oregon, the other day, when he fell to the floor of the pulpit and expired in a few seconds. The preacher's theme had been that a good, devoted, useful Christian life is necessarily as preparation for the future life. The last words that came from the minister's lips before he fell with the stroke of apoplexy were: "Prepare to live, and you will be prepared to die." God has made the love of life so strong that the fear of death is natural. Faith in Christ, his atonement, his resurrection, and his promise of immortality, has cured that dread of death. The minister was right when he taught that the best preparation for death was to do our duty every day, and every hour in the day. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (Rev. 2: 10.)

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

THE BUSIEST STREET IN WARSAW, CALLED "SUBURB OF CRACOW"

WARSAW, the Russian capital of Poland, the rich military prize for which 6,000,000 men have been fighting for months, was taken by the Germanic allies on Thursday, August 5. Prince Leopold of Bavaria led the first troops that entered the captured city.

The fall of Warsaw, while of the first importance in the European War, also illustrates the uncertainties both of war and of news. Our correspondent's story of the events of the week ending August 4 as given below looks forward to the possibility of the fall of Warsaw, but with no expectation of an immediate capture of that Russian stronghold, and the story had scarcely left his desk in Boston when the news was received in this country by cable that the Russian evacuation of the Polish capital was a fact and the German possession of that ancient city had already taken place. We shall present Mr. Arnoux's narrative as written, for it gains in interest because of the details it gives concerning this vast enveloping movement whose first objective, the taking of Warsaw, has actually been attained. The second objective, the cutting off of the Russian armies from a safe retreat, may not be attained, but this great military movement, one of the greatest if not indeed the greatest in history, is here clearly described. The latest news upon the situation as the Christian Herald goes to press will appear at the close of the article.

IN the eastern campaign the line to which the Russian army is now endeavoring to withdraw, and on which withdrawal depends its continued existence as an army, begins a little to the east of Riga on the shores of the Gulf of Riga, and thence runs southeasterly along the east bank of the river Duna to Dunaburg on the railroad running to Petrograd. At Dunaburg the line turns to the south and follows this railroad as far as Wilna. At Wilna it turns abruptly to the west and runs to a point a little northwest of Kovno, around which city it curves, at the end of the curve turning to the eastward and parallel to the line running from Wilna to the northwest of Kovno for a few miles until it reaches the river Niemen. On reaching this river the line turns suddenly south and runs along the east bank of this river until Grodno is attained, from which town it continues in the same general direction, finally curving slightly to the eastward as it reaches Brest-Litovsk, from which place it continues on a more accentuated curve to the southeast through Kovol to Rovno, which latter place is situated about 85 miles directly north of Tarnopol in Galicia.

Whether Russia's armies will be able to reach the above described line in reasonably good order is a question of paramount importance to the Allies.

If, in endeavoring to reach this line, Russia's armies are cut to pieces and largely destroyed, it will be impossible for that power to assemble, drill and equip another army of sufficient size to be at all menacing to the central empires, and in the meantime these empires will be able to use two-thirds of the large forces which they are at present hurling on Russia in such other sphere of action as they may choose. It, therefore, becomes extremely interesting to examine the exact present situation in Poland.

There are three main arteries of railroad communication leading from Warsaw to this line of battle, and beyond it to the sources of supply of men and munitions in the interior. The first runs north-east to Petrograd, and is at the present time entirely in Russian hands, but is seriously threatened at two places; southeast of Pultush, comparatively near Warsaw, and much further north near Svenzjany and Dunaburg.

A GLIMPSE OF THE JEWISH MARKET, WARSAW

The second runs almost directly east to Moscow, and its control may hereafter be threatened through Brest-Litovsk, this depending on the events of the immediate future. The third runs southeast to Odessa, and is completely cut by the Teutons, who hold it from near Ivangorod to Cholm, and whose possession can at any time be extended to Kovol farther to the east with ease, thus cutting the left wing of the proposed new Russian line of battle at this latter point. But it would be much more advantageous to cut this left wing at Brest-Litovsk, directly north of Cholm, the two places being connected by a railroad sixty miles long. This cutting would also cut the second of the lines of communication with the interior of Russia. As this—the Ivangorod-Lublin-Cholm-Kovel line—is the most important and critical sector of the Russian retreat at the present time, we will glance at what has taken place there during the past week.

On the western end, the Ivangorod end, the fortress of that name has been completely surrounded on all sides but the northern, and the portion of the defenses of this fortress which lay on the western bank of the Vistula are to all intents and purposes in Teutonic hands. A railroad runs from that portion of the fortress on the eastern bank of the Vistula to Brest-Litovsk, about half way to which this line is connected with Lublin by a subsidiary line running eastwardly to that city.

From the outskirts of Ivangorod all the country to the eastward has been seized by the Germans, whose troops have penetrated some twenty miles north of Lublin and perhaps thirty miles north of Cholm towards Brest-Litovsk, the two cities of Lublin and Cholm having changed possessors during the week.

From these two cities and on the whole line between them the Russians are retreating as rapidly as possible, with the Germans on their very heels, toward Brest-Litovsk, and it is a race as to who will reach that fortress first. Ivangorod can hardly be held much longer by the Russians.

The whole situation here is very bad indeed for the Russians, and it is extremely hard to see how the entire left Russian wing, the portion of the army embraced in this sector and the sectors to the southeast of it extending from Cholm along the Bug to Tarnopol and the south, can escape practical annihilation by capture and casualties.

The next sector north, from Ivangorod to Warsaw and Novogorod and northeast from this fortress to the east of Ostrolenka, in slightly better condition for the Russians. True it is that the whole line will have to be abandoned and Warsaw, Novogeorgievsk, etc., pass into Teutonic hands, but in this sector the lines of retreat are still open and probably the Russian forces will be able to reach the line of the new positions from north of Brest-Litovsk on the line of Bielsk-Bielostock-Grodno, with only the normal losses of a retreat engaged in continuous and heavy rearguard actions. Yet the menace southeast of Pultusk against the Warsaw-Petrograd railway could become converted into a Teutonic possession, this retreat would become infinitely more difficult and dangerous.

Only enough pressure is being put on the center, Warsaw and its neighborhood, by the Germans to hold the Russians in their positions, and driving in this center would force a too precipitate retreat by the Russians, thus spoiling the German plan of bringing their two wings together to cut off this retreat, viz., the approaching of the north and south

SOME BY-PRODUCTS OF THE WAR

THE war in Europe has produced many unusual incidents. Perhaps never before have such graves been dug as that—shown in the upper left-hand corner of this page—in the military cemetery at Chalons on the Marne. At the opposite corner is a group of men, most of them cripples or over-age, who are said to have been the only men left in one English village after recruiting had taken place. Between the two, German boys are shown in a new sport at riding a captured gun. The men below, holding what appear to be cross-bows, are French soldiers with their new military weapon designed to throw menolite grenades from the trenches. Opposite is an interesting group of prisoners in a German detention camp, amongst whom are Frenchmen, Englishmen, Belgians, Russians, Hindoos, and Jews. In the circle below is seen an automobile adapted for travel on railway tracks in northern France. To the left of it is a scene all too common in every war, a soldier taking leave of his slain comrade; and opposite it are children of Germany bringing all sorts of copper household utensils for the use of the government. At the foot of the page are war orphans waiting before the Red Cross kitchen for food.

The outstanding feature of this war is the suffering it is causing. Individual heroic acts are being performed, of course. Opportunities for individual renown have been few. The fighting in this war is done by cataracts of shells and avalanches of men. Death, like a twin specter, leads opposing millions into a bottomless morass.

Another outstanding feature of the war is the outpouring of charity from neutral countries. A pitying world turned aside from its customary occupations to comfort the widow and the fatherless. No charity has ever before equaled this in volume. It is strange indeed that while the world learns anew how implacable is hatred, it also learns anew how inextinguishable is love.

ers of the arc of the semi-circle by which the general position of the eastern campaign was described last week.

The sectors farther north, from east of Ostrolenka to the Baltic near Riga, form the German left wing, the Russian right. At and near Kovno the Germans made sustained and successful efforts to drive the Russians from their positions defending the fortress on the southwest and north, apparently with the view of a siege. Farther north still, a little to the east of Mitau, the Teutons have made steady progress to the eastward.

An enormous force of cavalry, forty thousand strong, it is reported, under General von Bönninghausen has been thrown in advance of the infantry, and is moving at the top of its speed for the railroad connecting Włocławek and Dunaburg, apparently with the object of cutting between Warsaw and Petrograd, which would adversely affect the power of Grodno to resist a siege.

His advance in Courland, if followed up to the Dunaburg-Włocławek line, would put the Teutonic forces in a position from which (assuming the Russians in the center succeed in retreating to the Brest-Litovsk-Berlin line) they would be able to carry out a flanking and enveloping movement against that line by proceeding south from Włocławek through Lida and Slonim, favored by favorable railroad communications. This movement would probably render the new Russian position untenable, and bring about a further retreat, which second retreat would be a far more difficult operation than the retreat now under way.

Germany has made public the past week the existence of a defensive alliance between Serbia and herself, looking to the protection of the spoils these two countries obtained from Bulgaria as a result of the second Balkan war, and thus, of course, directed mainly against that country. The importance of this news lies in the fact that it does not seem to be a nature calculated to bring about a revival of the old Balkan League, and unless this league is revived there would appear to be very little chance that either Bulgaria or Rumania will enter the war on the side of the Allies.

The Italian campaign against Austria is slowly making progress, particularly in the operation against the Tarvis group of fortifications; on the Isonzo River the progress is much slower. In the mountainous region of the frontier the Italians have launched a rather strong new offensive which has, however, not yet fully developed its strategic plan.

Submarines have been rather active during the week, British shipping having suffered considerably. A British submarine also sunk a German transport in the Baltic, and another has succeeded in penetrating again into the Sea of Marmora, where it did considerable damage to Turkish shipping, on the Asiatic side principally, though it did penetrate to Constantinople itself and shelled the arsenal, but with no particular known result.

The Dardanelles campaign still remains what it has been for the last three months, a war of trenches in which each foot of progress is won only by the most costly sacrifices. The fleet has apparently taken no part whatever in the operation of the land forces.

Such reports as reach us from Macedonia indicate that the situation there is increasing in seriousness, both on the northwest frontier and in the amount of interior unrest and sedition. It is positively asserted that Great Britain has been sending a large number of troops there continuously for the last four months, and that this unforeseen demand for soldiers from this quarter is one of the reasons for her army on the continent of Europe has not been brought to the number which it was anticipated it would have attained by this time.

The western campaign again presents an uninteresting and eventless aspect. There has been some fighting nearly everywhere along the line of battle, but this fighting has been characterless and and the Moselle Rivers have been quieter than usual.

THE morning of Friday, August 6, the great campaign in Poland gave into Germany's hands the city of Warsaw. The ultimate abandonment of this city by the Russians was foreseen in the exodus of hundreds of refugees for days before, and the denuding of the city of all removable material that would have been an advantage to the enemies. The copper wires of the telegraph and telephone service and the trolley wires were removed by the Russians. A correspondent of the London Times who witnessed the evacuation says that the city was shaken by the heavy detonations, and the sky was dotted with aeroplanes soaring amid the smoky clouds from bursting sharp-shells.

The Russians withdrew from Warsaw with deliberation and at first took up position in Praga, the suburb to the east of Warsaw, to cover the retreat upon Brest-Litovsk. They also held the entrenched fortress of Nowogrodziec, northwest of the city.

The capture of Warsaw was due to the great enveloping movement already described in the Christian Herald, under the combined command of General von Hindenburg in the north, and Field Marshal Mackensen in the south. Prince Leopold of Bavaria is named in the news despatches as having led the troops that first entered the city, the outer and inner fortresses to the westward having been taken by successful assaults during the preceding days. On the following day Ivanogorod, the very important fortified city to the southeast, was abandoned by the Russians, and on August 9 the disposition of the German armies was practically as shown in the map on this page. The general line held by the Russians can be traced by following the description given by Mr. Arnoux at the beginning of this article; of course changes of importance have already taken place along the whole front.

The purpose of the Germans is to complete their victory by cutting off the main portion of the Russian army from escape. Reports differ as to the likelihood of success. The Russians are giving ground slowly, and the fact that they still hold Nowogrodziec is greatly in their favor. The outer forts of that post are beginning to give way, however. The press of August 9 states that the Germans had been defeated in their attempt to take Riga, and forced to retire from that general region; this in itself would tend to delay the drawing together of the outreaching arms of the great German encircling movement.

The Warsaw campaign is regarded as the greatest in all history. Between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 men have been engaged along the one-thousand-mile front extending from the Baltic to the Rumanian boundary. For two months the opposing hosts have been in almost daily furious combat, and the Russians gave their allies in the east reason to hope that the German movement would be ineffectual. The Russians have been gradually forced back from East Prussia and from Galicia, and crowded to the extreme eastern portion of the ancient kingdom of Poland. The retreat out of Galicia took place before the Warsaw campaign proper developed.

But it was not until the very close of July that the actual retreat from Poland began. From that date hope of staying the Germans was abandoned, and the whole Russian defense then aimed at saving the army from being cut off. The progress of this military movement has been described from the beginning in our war stories, and is brought up to the moment of the taking of Warsaw in the first part of the present article.

Warsaw is one of the remarkable cities of the world. It is almost prehistoric in its origin, and has been again and again the battlefield of opposing races. It was in 1813 that this capital of the Polish people came into Russian possession by action of the European concert. Warsaw has a population of about one million and is the terminal of several great trunk railroads running from Berlin and Vienna to Moscow and Petrograd and on across the continent into China.

GOD'S CARE OF ELIJAH

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST 29.
1 KINGS 17: 1-16

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Cast all your anxiety upon him, because he cares for you." 1 Peter 5: 7

Everything that makes for our peace is contained in this precept; but the condition here must be complied with. God is always caring for us, whether we cast our care on him or not. But it is only as we definitely cast our burden on him that we enter on peace that passeth understanding. We must not only pray about our worries, but we must absolutely hand them over to God. We must not only lay them before the mercy-seat, we must leave them there. After Samuel's mother had laid her request before the Lord, she went her way and "was no more sad." I remember hearing an aged Christian say that often at night when she prayed and told God her troubles, she could not get right down to sleep, she pulled them all in after her. Such conduct will not help us. We must definitely hand things over to God, as we commit an intricate matter to a wise and a friend, and leave it in his hands. When once the committal is made, do we phone him each successive hour, to know if he is remembering and acting? And when once we have handed an anxiety over to God, we must refuse to re-open it, saying with the psalmist: "Mine eyes are ever towards the Lord, and he shall pluck my feet out of the net."

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

ONE of the ideals of my life has been to study the Bible where it was produced and to read its stories and review its events where they occurred. The greatest prophet of the Northern Kingdom and in many respects the one standing nearest Moses is Elijah. One of my first journeys was into the land of Gilead east of the Jordan, and even though his birthplace is not exactly known, there was charm in the thought that I must have crossed his childhood paths again and again, and perhaps the spot from which he disappeared at the end of life.

About that time I met the young lady who became Mrs. Hoskins in the ancient city of Sidon. We had many a ride along the seashore toward the city of Eth-Baal, where the wicked Jezebel was born. We knew the ruins of the temple, as well as the hills and river valleys beside them. Among the earliest memories of Mrs. Hoskins's childhood in Sidon were the homecomings of her father, Dr. Eddy, from his missionary tours to Tyre and the country east and south. At Zarephath—Sarepta—where Elijah met the poor widow, the seashore is covered with peculiarly beautiful shells about as large as olives, and Dr. Eddy always brought large numbers of these shells in his saddle bags to delight the children of the home. Then for many years the Sarepta promontory, about six miles from Sidon, was a favorite place for picnics on horseback.

Later journeys took me many times to Jezreel and Samaria, where Elijah faced Ahab and fled from the face and wrath of Jezebel. One journey took me to Diban, the spot where the Moabite stone was found, the inscription on which refers to events in the days of Elijah. Another long journey carried me all the way to Horeb, the mount of God, the grand old mountain which has many traditional sites connected with the life of Elijah.

Many centuries after Elijah's visit to Zarephath a modern city was built there, which became in the Christian centuries a bishopric. After still other centuries of change, the ruins of this city, Sarepta, were used as a quarry for the fine stones which were transported to Beirut and built into a great military hospital which is in front of my eyes as I write these words concerning our neighbor Elijah.

The Sword in the Hand of Love

By Amos R. Wells

WHAT gave Elijah such power that he could say to Ahab there should be no rain throughout the land for three years except at his bidding, and for three years the fountains of heaven were sealed? Arthur imagines an army before a fort. They intend to batter it down. How? They point to a cannon ball. But all the men in the army could hurl the ball against the walls in vain. They point to the cannon. But a child might ride on it, a bird perch in its mouth. They point to the powder. But a bird might peck at it, a child scoop it up. "Ye this powerless powder and powerless ball are put into the powerless cannon; one spark of fire enters it and then, in the twinkling of an eye, that powder is a flash of lightning and that cannon-ball a thunderbolt which smites as if it had been sent from heaven." Elijah was touched by the fire from heaven, and so his life was a battery of enormous power.

What kept Elijah safe during those three years, with a desperate, angry king searching for him? Was because he knew a hiding-place in Gilead, or went far away near Sidon? No, but because God's arm was around him. At Holyhead, England, there is a magnificent breakwater which cost more than seven million dollars. Its massive stones rise thirty feet above the waves, which beat upon them in vain, though in storm they dash against them with the terrific force of three tons to the square foot. Ships lie back of this breakwater in perfect safety. For every obedient child of God he is such a protection, whatever waves may beat and storms may roar.

Whether the ravens brought bread and meat to Elijah, or whether, as some scholars think, we must translate the word "Arabs," it was a way for God to send the food by sea as by the other. One snowy Sunday night a neighbor sent to the Alcotts to beg fuel, as their baby was sick and the father on a spree with his wages. The Alcotts' fuel was low, and they too had a baby, but Louisa Alcott's noble father said: "Give half our stock and trust in Providence;" and the noble father said: "If our half gives out, we can go to bed and tell stories." After they had sent the wood, later the evening a farmer came in out the storm and said he had started for Boston with a load of wood, but it drifted so he wanted to go home and wouldn't the Alcotts like the wood? They needn't be in a hurry about paying for it. That is the way God sends his blessings, by the most unexpected messengers; but they always come.

Of course not all things go smoothly for the Christian. "No man has a velvet cross," said Flavel. Elijah must have had some anxious days as he saw even the brook Cherith drying up. He did not know what would be the next thing for him, and may a troubled Christian has had the same experience. But there is always a Zarephath after a Cherith.

It was sublime trust, that deed of Elijah's for the widow's last bit of food and the widow's prompt response. A naval officer and his wife were at sea in a terrible storm and the wife was amazed at the comfort of her husband. "How can you be scalm," she asked, "when the ship go down any minute?" He rose, managed to get his sword, and pointed it at her breast. "Aren't you afraid?"

he asked, as she did not flinch. "No."
"Why not?" "Because my husband loves me too well to hurt me." "Well," said the officer, "the storm is in the hands of One who loves me."
This is the lesson of Elijah at Girith and Zarephath. Poverty is a harp sword. Pain is another.
Life is full of swords, and all are sharp, and all are pointed at us. But they all are held in the hands of love.

God's Man

By Arthur H. Howland

It seems strange that Elijah, mightiest of the Old Testament prophets, left no written words behind him.
There have been quotations from a lost document bearing his name, and said to consist of 316 verses, but it is not believed to have been a genuine product of the prophet's pen.

Sometimes the things that are said or written to a man, particularly with the character of the one writing or speaking is considered, are as important as the things he himself says or writes. And two things were said to Elijah by Ahab, the wicked king, with express to all the world for all ages the message and the meaning of Elijah's life:

Art thou he that troubleth Israel?"
Hast thou found me. O mine enemy?"

When a king like Ahab laid the troubles of his land to Elijah and coited him his enemy we may know the kind of a man this prophet was.

We are to have four lessons about
Elijah, the prince of the prophets.
This week we study his sudden appearance to Ahab with his amazing prophecy of punishment because of the nation's sins, and his experiences of God's care by the brookside and in the home of the widow of Zarephath.

Two great spiritual lessons stand out from the narrative of today's story—first that God will positively take care of the people who are speaking his words and doing his work.
The quibble of interpretation as to whether they were birds or Beduins thiefed Elijah is unimportant. God feared him.

A few weeks ago I attended the Peacostal-Nazarene camp meeting at Beacon, N. Y., at which Rev.
George Schurman, of Haverhill,
Mass., was the evangelist. The camp meeting management had stipulated a certain sum to be paid for his services, but since they were experiencing considerable difficulty in raising the season's expenses, he told them he would not hold them to this agreement. Instead, he would accept as his offering whatever the people wished to give at the last service of the ten-day meeting. He had preached the Bible fearlessly, so at the last service, Rev. W. H. Hoople, president of the Camp Meeting Association, first announcing that with the exception of the evangelist's salary all the expenses of the season had been provided for, asked him, greatly to his embarrassment, to stand down at the altar with his open Bible in his hand while the happy people came forward singing "I believe the Bible," and laying their contributions on the open pages of the book in his hand. There was positively no prearrangement, or plan, or scheme of any sort, but the freewill offering came just past the precise figure of the original contract.

The faithful evangelist smiled as he bore witness that when the Master called him to preach he had said:
"Boy, you preach what I tell you to,
and I'll take care of you."

The other lesson is that it pays to share our little with others. Much has been written about this, all summed up in Mrs. Charles's beautiful lines:

Is thy cruise of comfort failing?
Rise and share it with another,
And through all the years of famine
It shall cheer thee and thy brother.

At some time during the lesson tell the pupils about the Moabite stone, the remarkable monument found in 1868, which for nearly three thousand years was holding its mute testimony to the accuracy of some important points of Old Testament history. It verifies the fact that Omri, king of Israel, had successfully oppressed
Moab and annexed part of its territory and that for half of the reign of Omri's son (the Ahab of Elijah's time) this portion of Moab was still in the hands of the Israelites. After its discovery the stone was broken into bits by Arabs, who hoped to make a large profit out of selling the fragments. Two large fragments and eighteen small ones were recovered and of these the stone was rebuilt. One complete and one partial "squeeze" had been made of the inscription before the stone was broken and from these the missing words were inserted in the reconstructed stone, which now stands in the Paris Louvre.
It is of blue-black basalt, about three and a half feet high, two feet wide, two feet thick, with a rounded top.
A facsimile of the stone as restored is in the British Museum at London.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S TOPICS FOR AUGUST 29

Frivolity: Its Dangers and Remedies

Christian Endeavor Topic. Eccles. 3: 1-17

YOU have perhaps heard of the young Christian boy who was rebuked by one of the elders of the church simply for vaulting over a high fence. Many of the older Christians of other days seemed to feel that there was something essentially sinful in any manifestation of youthful spirits. We understand human life and particularly the spirit of youth better in these present days, and we know that play, laughter and merriment, games and exercise are not only not harmful but are necessary, vital facts of life.

At now, however, there seems to be danger of going too far in the other direction.
"Frivolity" is a dreadful word. It does not mean temporary recreation, but permanent failure to take life seriously. It is all right to play but to make play the business of life is vicious.

Along the dangers of frivolity is the inevitable and perpetually increasing power that this habit, like any other habit, will gain. If we refuse to be serious, and keep demanding more and more excitement and amusement, we shall lose our capacity for serious thinking, serious working and serious living. Then frivolity in its means a ghastly waste of time. There is so much important work to be done. It is criminal to waste the golden moments in frivolity that cannot minister to our permanent happiness and usefulness. Then frivolity readily leads to outright sin. Careless ways lead almost inevitably to sinful ways. Further, frivolity weakens our influence. People who see us living carelessly, even if we ourselves keep from outright sin, may by their own careless living be led forward into sin.

The remedies of frivolity? A true appreciation of what life means—the obligation to help others, to relieve the suffering that is in the world, to show men a juster and kinder way of living, to help bring people into the kingdom of Christ.

Workers for the Harvest

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Matt. 9: 35 to 38

NOTICE the motive of the call for the harvest toilers: "He was moved with compassion" (Matt. 9: 36). It was the compassion of Jesus for the wandering, cold, hungry, helpless people that made him long for fellow workers. And no fellow worker with Jesus can be successful unless he has some of that infinite compassion of the Saviour for those who suffer.

Plenty of harvest, few laborers (Matt. 9: 37).
In India today there are thousands of native clamoring for Christian baptism and instruction, for whom there are no teachers or missionaries available. A harvester is not likely to have much success unless he feels that God has sent him forth (verse 38). The disciples went out (chapter 10: 1) as harvesters with the authority and blessing and power of the Master upon them. So may we.

THE REAL SUPREMACY TEST

Do you know what extreme tests are made by makers of fine cars in adopting a new-type tire?

A Packard official, for one thing, drove a car from Detroit to Indianapolis, equipped with Goodyear Cord Tires. Then for 1000 miles around that speedway at 65 miles per hour.
The usual limit of tire life in racing is about 500 miles.
The treads wore off, but the Goodyear Cord Tires, without a blowout, took the car back to Detroit.

The Franklin Company, on May 1st, ran fuel economy tests in 137 cities. The three cars making the highest score were equipped with Goodyear Cord Tires. One made a world's record—55 miles on a gallon of gasoline. One made 53 miles, and one 51.8 miles.

Of the 15 cars making 40 miles or better, 10 had the Goodyear equipment.

These Men Know

Here are tests for endurance, for power economy and for resiliency.
And Goodyear Cords won each class. Not our tests, remember, but tests made by car makers whose prestige is at stake on their judgment. Their wide adoption of the Goodyear Cord Tire proves these things about it:

- First, that the Goodyear excels in strength and endurance.
- Second, it excels as a power saver.
- Third, it has no superior in resiliency and comfort.

An Eleven-Year Result

Goodyear is not the first-type Cord Tire. That original type had short-lived vogue. Its chief shortcoming was high cost per mile.

We have spent 11 years in improving it. We have brought down that cost per mile. And we have done it without lessening by one iota the tire's comfort and resiliency.

First, we made the Goodyear Cord Tire vastly oversize. We increased the air capacity by 30 per cent, which adds immensely to comfort and to durability.

Second, we use from 6 to 10 cord layers—depending on size.

We embodied in them our No-Rim-Cut feature. For extra security we vulcanized 126 braided piano wires into each tire base.
In addition to the Ribbed tread, used widely abroad, we built them with our All-Weather treads, our double-thick, resistless anti-skids.

SEE SOMETHING BEAUTIFUL!

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"I HATE this ride," said the girl, as our train swung like some giant worm across the meadows that make the entrance into the outskirts of the city. "It's so horribly tiresome. The levelness is so unbroken by any tree or building, and it's all the same dull green color. I hate this ride!"

I looked out of the window, and my mind echoed the words that she had spoken, for the heat waves of an August day crept dully over the duiler landscape—a landscape that met a grayish, warm-looking sky. It was level, it was dull, it was unbroken by any tree or building, that stretch of meadows! I sighed.

"I don't wonder that you sigh," said the girl; "you look at it every day. It must get on your nerves."

Again my eyes traveled off over the meadows, and as I looked, as if in answer to her challenge a tiny breeze flew straight down from heaven and fled murmuringly across the dull green of the grass. And as I looked, I saw the long spears bend their heads and ripple as the waves of the sea ripple. I saw a strangely silver shade in the midst of the greenness, and I realized as I gazed that a dull meadow, in August, can be a very beautiful thing indeed.

It's rather odd, when you stop to think, how many really beautiful things we take for granted in this world of ours. Of course, the beautiful things are sometimes very little, sometimes things that we have seen so often that we are completely accustomed to them; but they are beautiful nevertheless. It's a wonderful thing to know that God has taken the trouble to form each clover leaf into a picture, and make a masterpiece of each cloud, to put the sunlight in a girl's hair or rosy flower tint in a baby's cheek.

Some famous writer once said, "You should see something beautiful every day." If you follow that rule it makes life happier, and smoothes out a great many of the rough places that make the way hard. When you dislike something or are bored by something or are absolutely indifferent to something, if you stop to analyze it you will doubtless find something remarkable that you have never noticed before—that you have never taken the trouble to notice.

I have a friend who works in a dingy office in a dingy part of the city. Because it is necessary for her to work, she was obliged to take a position that did not interest her, that had nothing fascinating about it. She tried to do her work well, but every day the task grew duller and more gray-colored and more downright hard. After she had had the position for a month, she came to see me and I noticed the change in her usually cheerful face.

"Why, Marion," I said, "what is the matter? You look so worn out and discouraged and almost sick. Has anything gone wrong?"

"No," sighed the girl, "nothing's gone very wrong. Perhaps that's part of the trouble. In my work nothing ever goes wrong—or very right either, for that matter; it just keeps on being tiresome and dull and—sordid. I hate it so that it's beginning to get on my nerves, it's beginning to take the happiness out of my heart. It's beginning to ruin my disposition. What shall I do?"

It's rather embarrassing to have one's friends ask advice. What should I tell her? I racked my brain for an answer, and then suddenly, like a flash of light in a dark spot, the thought of the famous writer's words swept across my mind.

"Have you ever tried to see anything interesting or funny or beautiful in your work?" I asked. "Have you really tried?"

The girl wrinkled up her forehead for a moment and thought. Suddenly a pink little blush crept up to her pale cheeks. "Why—why, no," she stammered, "I never have. I've only seen the horrid side of it. I've only tried to see the horrid side of it!"

Several weeks went by before I saw my friend again. In that time I wondered about her very often; wondered if she had been able to find anything bright in the sordid little office, or the dull part of town, or the uninteresting people she came in contact with. And then one day my unsolicited questions were answered, for I met her by chance in the street, and one look at her rosy, happy face swept away all of my misgivings and wonderings.

"It's better, isn't it?" I said by way of greeting. "You don't hate it so much, do you?"

The girl looked at me with something very like wonder in her large eyes. Quite suddenly she laughed. "Oh," she gasped, between giggles, "oh, you mean my position. Why, I've forgotten that I ever did dislike it, it's so interesting now. Why, I'm crazy about the work!"

I stood before her with open-eyed amazement, there on the street. It was such a change, such a remarkable change to come about in a few weeks. "How does it happen," I questioned, "that things seem so much better?"

The girl puckered up her brow in an effort to think. "It happened," she told me, "the day after you spoke about seeing something interesting. I was sitting up in the window looking way down on the street, and instead of thinking of the people who were walking so far below me as little black ants (I always had thought of them as little black ants), I began to imagine that each one had a personality. And then, after I felt a little happier about the streets, I looked around the office—it was empty then—and instead of thinking how dirty and dull and unpleasant it looked, I thought instead, 'Why, the wall's a good color—under the dust; and the table would be real pretty, if it wasn't so muddled up, and new blot- ters would do wonders to these desks.

"I hadn't much to do that day and whenever I was alone I sat and straightened up and cleaned. The next day I did the same thing and by that night the change was really remarkable. When that cross Mr. Blank came through on his way home, he almost jumped, he was so surprised. 'Do you know,' he told me, 'I've never seen the place looking so well for years.' He smiled, and for the first time I noticed that he had pleasant eyes and a good face." She smiled appreciatively.

"So that's why you're happy?" I questioned.

"Yes, that's why I'm happy," said my friend, and her voice was very musical. "Things have been different ever since. Everybody's been nicer, and the room is beginning to look awfully pretty. One of the men put up some shelves for the books, and another one had a furniture store away the desks to be polished. Mr. Blank has smiled—often, and, suddenly she laughed again, "and my work now!" she told me.

No, it isn't hard to brighten up your life if you try to see beauty in commonplace things. I fancy very little that couldn't seem beautiful, if you pick out the best and ignore the disagreeable ones. There isn't a swamp that hasn't some beautiful flowers growing in it, and there are mighty few unpainted, weather-stained barns that haven't got a swallow or two keeping under the eaves. If you open the dullest gray oyster, you may find a pearl in it, and if you look at a buzzing, biting mosquito in the right kind of a light you will see what a chiffrony things its wings are.

It's a good rule to live by the famous author's rule: "See something beautiful every day." If you make it a little stronger and say, "See something beautiful in everything," you can even get a thrill from watching a tiny breeze play over a field of dull meadow grass.

after they were seated in the pleasant living-room. Mrs. McAllister broke it.

"In your letter, Mrs. Allen, you asked for an extension, on account of your husband's illness. I thought it would be best to have a personal interview. I'm obliged to you for coming. Will you tell me just how long this is to run? I think it best to have a clear understanding in business matters of this kind. And then we'll see what we can do."

Gilberta Allen looked up and met the eyes of the other—blue eyes, not kindly, but frank and, as she had been told, just. Looking into them, for all their lack of a friendly light, she took heart.

"As soon as my husband is able to go to work," she explained, "we can begin payments again. We can not before, because—we won't have it. But just as soon as he's well, we'll make these deferred payments up."

"But when will that be? I do not wish to press you, but I believe in a thorough understanding. The circumstances being as they are, I'm willing to wait a reasonable time. I've never refused that. At the same time, I never mix sentiment and business. I allow the person to state when payment will be made. I wait the time. If they don't pay then—"

She did not complete the sentence. But her eyes that narrowed, her lips that closed to a thin pink line, finished it for her. Quite suddenly Mrs. Allen shivered. When she spoke, her voice trembled.

"I hope—we hope," she faltered, "that he'll be able to go to work next week. I'm more sorry than I can say to keep you waiting. But this illness has eaten up our savings, and I could not make a payment at present. In a month, I think, I can safely promise to pay again."

"Shall we call it two?" suggested Mrs. McAllister. "Can you promise surely in two months? I should like a certain promise two months off, better than a half promise one month off."

"I think I can promise surely by then."

"Very well. Today is the tenth. Two months from today your first payment will fall due."

"Two months from today," echoed Gilberta Allen. "And thank you for waiting. I—we—it means a great deal to us, your kindness."

"Not kindness," disclaimed Mrs. McAllister; "justice."

MRS. ALLEN went out into the sunshine, with a measure of it warming her own heart. The load which had pressed on her was lightened. The aspect of her little world had changed. Her feet, shod with joy, sped fleetly homeward.

Mr. Allen was watching at the window, the baby in his arms. She waved him a gay, reassuring greeting.

"Didn't I tell you," she began, before taking off her hat and coat, "didn't I tell you she was just? Well, I found her more. She's going to wait two months. Think of that—two months! And I only asked for one! Isn't that splendid? Before two months we'll certainly be all right."

Mr. Allen brightened.

"Yes, two months ought certainly to fix us. Next week I'll be working away like a beaver, making up for lost time. This little extension will save us—save our home."

"Our dear home," said his wife. "I never liked to tell you how I felt about it. I thought I'd rather die than lose it. I used to—cry about it. You didn't think I was so foolish, did you?"

She sat down in a low chair and reached out her arms for the baby. She pressed her cheek against his downy head as she went on:

"Yes, I used to cry about it. Sometimes, when I was twining the sweet peas, I used to wonder who would pull them. And my eyes were often so blurred that I could hardly see the string."

"And you bore it all alone! Why didn't you tell me?"

"Tell you! I'd like to have seen myself adding a straw to your burden! You had enough to bear, as it was. But I don't think I'd be happy anywhere else. I love the place. I always thought God meant this little home for us. It was so funny how we happened to hear about it and everything. It wouldn't happen again in a thousand years. It seems almost too good to be true, to feel that I can hope again!"

The next week Mr. Allen was working again, disturbed only occasionally by twinges of his powerful foe. His wife sang at her work and joyfully coaxed the sweet peas to climb.

When the first of the month came, bringing a load of bills—doctor's bill, druggist's bill, grocer's bill and many others—Mrs. Allen was thankful that the extra month had been allowed.

"I don't know how we would have managed, if we had had to make her a payment, too," she said Mr. Allen. "Some of these just had to be paid. But next month, even cent can go right to her. Everything else can wait. After that, I don't think we'll ever be behindhand again. I'm going to be so careful!"

"Nothing can stop us now!" boasted Mr. Allen.

But the something that waited in the near distance.

ONE night he came home to find a pale girl seated before the table in the kitchen. He welcomed her cordially.

"Well, Miss Jean," he said, "I've been wondering why you didn't come over. You haven't been here for weeks."

His wife answered before the girl's trembling smile could solve itself into speech.

"Jean has come to make a visit," she said.

"Good!" said Mr. Allen. "You two girls can have great times together."

Presently Mrs. Allen left the room and made a sign for him to follow. She closed the door of the dining-room and spoke cautiously.

"Robert," she said, "I asked her here because she has no place to go. She has been ill and couldn't do much sewing to do. Think me not knowing! She was months behind with her room rent."

I w the landlady. She was—horrid. She kept Jean's sewing machine as security. I told her we would pay part what is due sometimes—of course, not for months and months. I couldn't help it. Did I do right? You see, I knew how it must be to lose a home—even a home like that. Was I right?"

Robert Allen put his arm around her and drew her to him.

"Right?" he echoed. "Just right. I don't see how you could have acted otherwise. I'm glad she's here. She's a good girl and she'll be lots of company for you."

"And one won't make much difference," went on his wife. "I'll be as careful as I can of the money."

"Money! What's money?" he laughed. "We'll have plenty before the year's out."

They vied with each other in making the little seamstress feel at home. But, for all their cordial welcome, she ate little and seemed ill at ease. Yet several days passed before she acknowledged that she was ill. Mrs. Allen hugged the crying girl to her.

"Don't fret," she cheered her. "I'll run down and telephone for our doctor. He's such a splendid doctor! He'll have you well in no time."

Robert stayed her with her feverish hand.

"O," she cried, "I can't let you. You've done too much already. And I—have no money."

"Money!" laughed back Mrs. Allen, but as her husband had done to her. "What's talking about money? And as for as doing too much is concerned, I don't know what you mean. Who was it kept the baby when Robert was ill? Who was it ran over and made things tidy before the doctor came? Who helped me through all that awful time, though she had known me such a little while, and had plenty of worries of her own? Jean, don't be selfish. Let me pay at least part of my debt."

Presently Jean was persuaded to lie down, and she cried weakly on the pillow while Mrs. Allen telephoned for the doctor. They did not wait on before he came. His face was grave as he finished the examination. Mr. Allen followed him into the hall. "What is it?" she asked. "Is she very ill?"

"Very ill," he answered. "Appendicitis. She must be operated on at once if her life is to be saved."

"An operation?" repeated Mrs. Allen.

"Yes. And the sooner the better."

"But—but," she stammered, "there's no money, and you know how we've fixed. What can we do?"

"I operate," answered the doctor, "and that can wait indefinitely. It will only be at the expense of the hospital charges. They, of course, must be met. But they're not high. I could manage that?"

Mrs. Allen nodded, without speaking.

"It—will it be dangerous?" she asked.

"There is every chance if we operate once."

Mrs. Allen broke the news to Jean. She took it more calmly than she expected. She seemed chiefly concerned about the expense. But Mrs. Allen cheered her with the doctor's promise to wait.

They operated the same day, and Mr. Allen haunted the telephone office until she was assured that all was well. It was only after this assurance that the thought of money bothered itself upon her. A little worried frown appeared on her forehead.

"It we can manage, I guess," she heard herself. "The doctor said she might be well in ten days. Ten days, twenty-five dollars a week—that'll be something under forty dollars. We have to pay just a hundred to Mr. McAllister. I think she'll be satisfied with that. And we can pay her, or almost that, every month until she's straight."

But Jean did not mend in ten days. The operation had not been performed in time; she had been weakened from deprivations. After the very first, the doctors saw that it was not a promising case.

It was three weeks, and more, before she was well enough to be brought home. There had been a special nurse, too, part of the time, when the danger was worst. All kinds of little incidentals had cropped up. One night Mrs. Allen counted things up. Her lips were white. Of Mr. Allen's salary of one hundred and fifty dollars, there would be nothing left, when these latest bills were paid. Her mind flew from thought of the home to the girl for whom they lost it.

"Jean must never know!" she cried to herself.

This was the first of the month. Nine days were left before she must again appear before Mrs. McAllister. They were long hard days for her.

"There are three days of grace," she comforted herself.

Upon the second one, she opened the door to Mrs. McAllister.

She showed her into the living-room calmly. There was good blood in Gilberta, and it stood her in good stead now. There would be no scene; no begging for further grace; little, if any, explanation. She had lost, and she would pay the price, if not cheerfully, at least without spoken regret.

While she searched for words, Mrs. McAllister spoke.

"You didn't come on the day you set," she said.

"No," Gilberta answered, in a voice that did not tremble; "no, it was no use. I meant to come tomorrow. I thought there were three days grace. But—it made no difference. We—I haven't the money."

The visitor did not speak.

"How long before we must go?" Gilberta asked.

"Perhaps not at all," the other answered. "I'm minded to give you another chance."

"Another chance!" Gilberta trembled. Her steady eyes filled with tears.

"We Scotch are superstitious," Mrs. McAllister went on, almost as if she were thinking aloud. "We believe in dreams, and things like that, whether we acknowledge it or not. Last night I dreamed of you. A strange, mixed-up dream it was. It was you, and yet not you, but my little sister."

Her voice faltered over the word.

"I haven't mentioned her name for years, yet she is never far from my thoughts. Three years ago I sent for her to come to me. When the ship got in, I was in a hospital, dying, every one believed. My husband, fearing to leave me, got to the dock too late. He searched as well as he could with little money. But he found no trace. The city had swallowed her up. When I was well again, they told me. The news brought on a relapse. And, when I was well once more, the case was hopeless. Even with money, it would have been difficult; without it, no search could be made. I threw myself into making money then. And I have succeeded."

Her eyes went hard again, then softened.

"But I couldn't rest for the dream. I thought of you and your home, that you said meant so much to you. And I hoped—God forgive the selfish reason!—that if I had mercy on you, some one might have mercy on Jean."

Jean! The name, the thought that followed thrilled Gilberta to her heart of hearts. The color flamed, then faded, then faded from her face. Her hands shook.

"But it couldn't be," she said to herself. "It never, never could happen that way, except in a story. It could never be her Jean."

And yet it was.

Gilberta left the two sisters together, and rocked and hugged her baby, while tears ran down her face.

It was an hour, or more, before they came to seek her. The hardness, the pride, the reserve, were gone from the face of Mrs. McAllister. In their place a wonderful light had come. She fell on her knees, encircling Gilberta and the baby with her arms.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

THERE will be ten instead of twelve lists of Bible questions this year, the first half of the year's contest closing with the May questions, the second half beginning with the August questions.

As was done last year, the second half of the year's work will be thrown open to new contestants and those who answer all the questions of the last five lists will receive a special prize. This will not affect the standing of contestants in the all-year contest, to whom prizes will be awarded on the basis already announced.

But the new half-year contest gives every one the chance to win a prize. The next lists will not be as difficult as the one appearing below. But follow the epistle carefully, chapter by chapter, and you will readily find the answers to these questions. Because of the lapse between this list and the last and because this new list appears at vacation time, four weeks instead of two will be allowed for answering it. This will necessarily delay the publication of the Honor Roll. All answers to this list must reach the Christian Herald office by September 22. Address, Bible Contest, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

The name of Mrs. J. A. Ferguson should have been added to the Honor Roll of List No. 5.

TOMAS W. CHURCHILL
President New York City Board of Education

REVOLUTIONIZING THE SCHOOLS

A REVIEW OF THE RECENT INTERESTING EXPERIMENT WITH THE GARY SYSTEM IN THE SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK CITY

BY MARY KENDALL HYDE

ALL probability there will be established on an extensive scale in New York City the system of public school instruction known as the "Gary Plan," practiced successfully in Gary, Indiana, and other cities.

See Thomas W. Churchill has been president of the Board of Education of New York City, he has added himself to the task of remodeling the courses of study in the public schools, emphasizing in the curriculum provision for training children in conformity with the demands of an industrial age that places a premium on "hand instruction" in contrast to mere "book instruction." Mr. Churchill believes in "vocational schools," in having pupils "manually-minded" as well as "mentally-minded." He contends that boys and girls graduated from grammar or high schools should find themselves equipped for earning a living.

Athorized by Mayor Mitchel, the Board of Education has visited many cities especially in the West, where (to use Mr. Churchill's own words) "there is less of machinery and more of inspiration" in the school systems.

"1849 men went to California to look for gold," says Mr. Churchill; "we went west to look for knowledge, for that wisdom which is 'more precious than rubies.' Dean Snyder of the University of Cincinnati, a pioneer who has accomplished wonders in industrial or vocational schools, and William W. Wirt, the organizer of the Gary school system, have been helping us, since our return, by experimenting in our schools with gratifying results."

"Houses are built, homes are planned, public institutions are organized, all primarily for adults," says Mr. Wirt. "There is now a tremendous movement under way not fully to consider the needs of boys and girls, and to give them the opportunities they ought to have. We now provide for all the children of the city what is now enjoyed by those able to attend private schools. The school seat and desk are only a part of the many things needed for the equipment of schools. As accessory facilities, we should have playgrounds, gymnasiums, workshops, sewing rooms, art studios, music studios, science laboratories, libraries, swimming pools, and auditoriums for en-

tainment and singing. There should be alternate attendance between these various departments and the regular classrooms. Work in school is now needed, in cities at any rate, to take the place of that done by children thirty years ago on the farm, or in the shop across the street kept by their fathers, or helping their mothers in housework. It is a physical fact that sitting still for a long time affects the blood's circulation; it is neither natural nor desirable for a growing boy or girl to keep still for three hours on a stretch. It is also a fact that children do not learn so well when studying for a long time consecutively. A school day should give children a chance to play all they want to play, work all they want to work, and study all they want to study.

The Gary plan has been tried for several months in Public School No. 89 in Brooklyn and in Public School No. 45 in the Bronx. At the Bronx school, situated in a district largely Italian, there is a school farm of five acres, with a flourishing crop of vegetables, and an extensive playground with swings and other equipment.

School No. 45 has been divided into two sections, X and Y, which alternate in their use of classrooms, gymnasium, laboratories, workshops, playground, etc., thus accomplishing twice the results previously attained. One great merit of the system is the doing away with the "part-time" method, due to overcrowding in congested sections. While some of the pupils are in the regular classrooms, others will be in the special studios and still others on the playgrounds. The children will not be massed, as under the existing system, all at play at one time or at study at one time, but the whole force will be broken up into alternating groups. By thus alternating the groups in the classrooms, shops and gardens, it is estimated that the present accommodations of the New York schools would be increased to nearly 1,500,000 pupils, as against the 750,000 or so in attendance during the year just ended. There have been about 35,000 children on part time.

While the Gary plan does not include any co-operation of school and church, the flexibility of its program does make it possible for a child to receive religious instruction in some of the so-called "free periods." That is, for some period scheduled for the library or playground or excursion may be substituted a period of religious instruction in the church.

About one hundred representatives of the Catholic, Jewish and Protestant faiths were invited recently by the Demonstration Church School Committee to attend a meeting held in Columbia University addressed by Mr. Wirt. As an outgrowth of this meeting, an interchurch committee was formed to consider plans for utilizing the opportunity given by Mr. Wirt's system for religious instruction during school hours.

Already plans have been made to experiment in three centers next autumn. Members of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant faiths must be appointed for each sub-committee directing these centers. At Public School No. 45 in the Bronx, Commissioner John Whalen is chairman; Dr. Albert G. Lawson (Baptist) is chairman for Brooklyn; Dr. Abby Porter Leland (Episcopalian) is chairman of the Manhattanville center.

"The Inter-Church Committee is not endorsing any particular school program," says Dr. Leland. "It is primarily interested in giving adequate religious instruction during the week at such times as various school programs may permit children to be free for such instruction. Two types of centers have been chosen; one where the Gary plan is being tried and one where the regular five-hour day is followed."

Among the nearly forty clergymen of New York City on the Inter-Church Committee are Bishop Frederick Courtney of the Episcopal Church, Bishop Luther B. Wilson and Dr. Allan MacRossie of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Robert G. Boville (Baptist) of the Daily Vacation Bible Schools, Rev. Dr. Charles E. Jefferson (Congregational), Dr. Anthony H. Evans (Presbyterian), Dr. Walter Laidlaw of the Church Federation, and other well known leaders.

The plan is to "secure co-operation, if possible, between the church and the educational authorities of state, county, city, so that through the Gary system or some other system to be devised, credit may be given for such religious education as shall be approved by the state educational authorities. It shall be understood that the churches shall provide the funds for such religious work."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE WOMEN AT NORTFIELD. The twelfth session of the Northfield Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies was a notable gathering. More than 900 delegates registered, including Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Dutch Reformed, Lutherans, Episcopalians, and other denominations. Mrs. Henry W. Peabody and Mrs. Iele Barrett Montgomery, who returned recently from a missionary world-tour, aided by the conducted the devotional exercises and the classes. An outstanding feature was the allyable class taught by Dr. Charles R. Erdman, Princeton, and another was the study of "The King's Highway" under the guidance of Mrs. Montgomery, the author of this new textbook. Addresses by the missionaries are among the central figures of interest. Thirty-one were seated on the platform the last evening, and as their names were called each gave his or her station and a single sentence about the work. Dr. Coleman of Africa summarized his labors thus: "They are domestic, industrial, educational, evangelistic, medical, dental, and if there be any other I was it!" Their terms of service ranged from three years to more than half a century. Of the eleven from India, five belonged to the Scudder family. Of the twelve from China, three were the Murdock sisters who labored together the last seven years at Hwai-yuen, as doctor, nurse and evangelist. Foreign countries represented were India, China, Japan, Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Turkey and Mexico.

—EVANGELIST FRANK A. MILLER, Elgin, Ill., writes: "For twenty-five years it has been my privilege to live in the homes of the people during my evangelistic work over twenty-three states. I have become more and more convinced of the need of a genuine revival of home religion. By this I mean the careful teaching of the children the vital truths of the Bible, the need of daily secret prayer, and the re-establishment of daily family worship. It will increase reverence. It will re-establish God in the home. Children must see father and mother worshipping; this is the only way religion can ever be made real to them. See that every member of the family who can read has a clear-print reference Bible. Take the daily readings of the Sunday school lessons, or the Bible by course if you prefer. Let father read a verse, then mother, then the oldest child, and so on around, until part of a chapter has been read. Comment a little; take the best verse to remember through the day. Then sing a verse or two of some old sweet song, and kneeling together let father or mother offer a short prayer, mentioning the need of each child by name. This whole exercise need only take five minutes, if time is limited, and a blessing will follow."

You know this trade-mark
through national periodical advertising

TRADE-MARKS
are the guides which enable the purchaser to repeat every satisfactory buying experience and to avoid the repetition of every unsatisfactory buying experience.

National advertising is the force which induces a great number of people to try a product—so that the economy of quantity production can be attained if the product gets general approval.

The trade-mark is the thing which identifies a maker so that we can repeat—or avoid repeating—the experience we had with his goods.

National advertising is the thing which makes enough of us use a product so that it can be produced economically and can be sold to us at a price much lower than the manufacturer would have to charge if he did not advertise and therefore sold to only a few.

These are the reasons why trade-marked, nationally advertised goods are so generally the best goods of their kind and are sold at such relatively low prices.

Trade-marks and national advertising, working together, are the two most valuable public servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while reducing prices and stabilizing them.

Called Higher

WHEN a very young man dies, the loss is not often felt by more than a sorrowing family and a comparatively small group of friends. When Ralph Irving Bond was drowned on June 18 of this year, while swimming, a very large number of people grieved deeply and sincerely for him. His young life held a wonderful record of good deeds and acts of loving-kindness.

"The boy," his father told me when he called one day at the Christian Herald office, "was always looking for some opportunity to help some one. Often he would bring home some hungry boy and give him food and lodging until he was able to find work or in some way help himself.

"We were great chums, we two, and used to go everywhere together. I only wish that I could have been with him on that day when he was drowned—I might have saved him! But somehow, I cannot help feeling that perhaps he was too good to stay on this earth, that God wanted him up in heaven.

"There were memorial services held at Protestant, Catholic and even Jewish churches, and I have received a number of messages from folks who were his debtors for some act of kindness. I did not appreciate the work that he did until he was gone."

Mr. F. Irving Bond, the father of the drowned boy, is now living alone in the little home in Brooklyn, for his son was the only one left of their family. He is broken-hearted over his boy's death. "But," he told me with a sad smile, "I am glad that his life was a blessing. And—it was God's will."

THE NEW DIPLOMATIC NOTIS

FIVE notes have now been exchanged between the United States and Great Britain dealing with the question of the course pursued by the latter government in the seizure and detention of American vessels and cargoes, and also as to the arbitrary prize court methods of the United Kingdom. The latest and most important of these was the British note of July 31, in response to the American note of July 16. An earlier note had been prepared and forwarded by the British government on July 24, but it was recalled and the note of July 31 substituted. This note, which is signed by Sir Edward Grey, opens by disclaiming knowledge of any differences or divergent views existing between the two countries as to the principles of law applicable in cases before prize-courts. It cites by way of precedent the principles applied by the American prize-courts in the case of the Amy Warwick, in which it was held that prize-courts are subject to the instructions of their own sovereign; that in the absence of such instructions their jurisdiction and rules of decision "are to be ascertained by reference to the known powers of such tribunals, and the principles by which they are governed under the public law and the practice of nations." The note claims, therefore, that the principles applied by the prize-courts of the two countries are identical. A judgment of Lord Stowell, in the case of the Fox, is quoted in substantiation of the claim that the prize-court is bound to administer the law of nations and also bound to enforce the Orders in Council, these being not at all inconsistent with each other; in other words, that the action of the British prize-court in the American cases in question conformed to the recognized law of nations; and that, as was declared by the president of the prize-court in the case of the Zamora, "the nations of the world need not be apprehensive that Orders in Council will emanate from this government (Great Britain) in violation of the acknowledged law of nations."

The note explains that an endeavor has already been made to convince the United States government that the government of Great Britain was compelled to adopt measures (in consequence of the acts of its enemies) the legality of which had not yet been made the subject of a prize-court decision; but it is open to any American citizen who may be dissatisfied with the ruling of a British prize-court, who contends that any Order in Council which may affect his claim is inconsistent with international law and therefore invalid, to appeal the same to an international tribunal. This paragraph of the note is regarded as essentially weak, for the reason that it is based upon a justification of reprisals which may or may not be defensible.

The British note also cites various cases, the proceedings in which showed that the decisions of national prize-courts were subject to international review, and it points out that this principle was recognized by Great Britain in the Jay Treaty of 1793, and by the United States in the Treaty of Washington of 1871. The procedure in certain cases to which the United States was a party is referred to in support of this general claim of international adjudication and review, where the parties to the proceeding believed themselves aggrieved by the prize-court decision. The note points out that this principle of appeal and review was substantially accepted both by the United States and Great Britain in 1907.

In conclusion the British note says: "It is clear, therefore, that both the United States Government and His Majesty's Government have adopted the principle that the decisions of a national prize-court may be open to review if it is held in the prize-court and in the judicial committee of the Privy Council, on appeal, that orders and instructions issued by His Majesty's Government in matters relating to prizes are in harmony with the principles of international law; and, should the government of the United States unfortunately feel compelled to maintain a contrary view, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to concert with the United States Government in order to decide upon the best way of applying the above principle to the situation which would then have arisen."

The prevailing opinion of leading American newspapers on the British note is that it is notably weak in certain essential points. The New York World says: "No attempt is made to enforce the blockade in the Baltic. . . . Under the form of blockading Germany, Great Britain is in reality blockading the United States, while permitting German commerce with the Scandinavian states to proceed without restraint."

The New York Times says: "The British position, as set forth in the note, is a defense of the belligerent's right to enclose his enemy in a blockade which shall cut off all his sea-borne imports and exports, and Sir Edward is unable to admit that a belligerent violates any fundamental principle of international law by applying a blockade in such a way to cut off the enemy's commerce with foreign countries through neutral ports, if the circumstances make such an application of the principles of blockade the only means of rendering it effective."

The New York Tribune regards the British contention of the blockade being a necessity or reprisal as inadmissible, and says: "We have refused to accept German arguments based on British violations of international law, real or alleged. We can do no less with Great Britain. . . . The British note does not meet and cannot satisfy American demands. Between American and English interpretations of international law and precedent there is a wide gap. Indeed, in a whole range of questions it is almost necessary to recognize that law and precedent alike are lacking. As Admiral Mahan foresaw long ago, the dominant naval power is endeavoring to rewrite international law."

The German Note on the Frye

SOME weeks ago, the United States Government in a note to the German Government refused to admit the question of compensation for the loss of the American vessel, William P. Frye, to a German prize-court. On August 4, a new note from Germany on this situation was published, in which that government reiterates its declaration that the sinking of the Frye was not in violation either of the general principles of international law or of the existing treaty between the United States and Prussia. In this note, the German Government expresses again its willingness to make reparation for the loss of the vessel and any American property aboard it, but stipulates that such indemnity must not be considered in the light of satisfaction for a violation of international law or treaty, but simply a compensation for property destroyed.

Since the American Government is unwilling to submit the question of the amount of the indemnity to a German prize-court, the German Government suggests that each nation name an expert to consider the case and agree to pay any sum named jointly by the experts. The note adds: "Should the American Government not agree to this manner of settling the matter, the German Government is prepared to submit the difference of opinion arising a question of the interpretation of the existing treaties between Germany and the United States to the tribunal at The Hague." This note covers in effect the case of the Leelanaw as well as the Frye.

Questions and Answers

G. P., Topeka, Kan. 1. The passage in Ps. 116: 15 should be read and compared with Ps. 72: 14. The psalmist was describing God's zealous care for the lives of his people, which he valued so dearly as to use his infinite resources to shield them from hurt; but most precious of all were those who gave up their lives for his sake. There are many passages in the Bible that carry out this idea. 2. Eccles. 1: 18, like many other passages in this book of wise sayings, is tinged by depression. An eminent commentator regards the opening chapter as giving the keynote to what follows—the note of pessimism, which, while admitting the existence of the good there is in life, yet views it as a whole as something that cannot satisfy a being like man, if he lives apart from God. "In much wisdom [that is, in mere human acquirement] much grief," refers to our speculative knowledge of man's nature, "which, the further it goes, gives one the more pain to find how unsatisfactory and deceptive it is." 3. The passage in chapter 3: 18-22 is in the same pessimistic spirit. Without God manifesting himself in our lives, the problem of existence becomes impossible of solution. Read the last two verses of chapter 12, which give the antidote to the weariness and depression of human philosophy. 4. Hypnotism is a pseudo-science, and, unfortunately, is mainly in the hands of charlatans, who love to humbug people with what seems to be mysterious and inexplicable. Better leave it alone.

J. E. W., Round Lake, N. Y. Mr. Bryan's greatest public service to America and the world has been the thirty or more treaties he concluded, while secretary of state, with other governments in the interest of peace and arbitration. He has been a consistent friend and advocate of peace for many years, and has taken every opportunity to advance the cause of international conciliation and arbitration—an attitude which won him the hostility of powerful interests. A life of Mr. Bryan is published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

A. E. C., Brooksville, Fla. 1. The two subjects you mention are pseudo-sciences, and are so largely in the hands of charlatans that they are regarded with suspicion. We would not advise any one to pay attention to the claims that are made for them. There are several warnings in Scripture against necromancers, soothsayers and wizards, and those who pretend to raise spirits. It is well to give a wide berth to all such pretenders. 2. The admonition not to let the left hand know what the right hand is doing, is directed against doing good ostentatiously, when it ought to be done quietly and without seeking the world's applause. You would doubtless be very much helped in studying these difficult passages by having beside you the book, "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered."

A number of correspondents to the Prayer League have asked prayer that they or some friend might be reconciled to the loss of loved ones. These letters contain sentences and phrases like these: "Pray that I may be reconciled to the death of a son"; "Pray that a mother may become reconciled to the death of a young daughter"; "Pray that I may have strength to bear the death of my husband"; "That I may have strength to bear the death of a sister"; "That a friend may have strength to bear the death of a son." What can we say to these friends? In the first place they must quickly and with intense determination seek God. They may feel that their minds are almost shattered by the crushing blow, but the one steady fact upon which to rest in the midst of all the anguish is God himself. Or it may be that instead of sharp agony some feel a terrible weariness and bewilderment. They, too, must seek God for his rest. It is a time for creeping into "the secret place of the Most High, and abiding under the shadow of the Almighty." They will begin to realize something of the depth and strength of God's great love for them, a love even greater than their love for the dear one who has gone. They will think of the cross of Christ, where God shows 'so unmistakably his love for mankind. They will see Christ going through that strange experience of death, and coming out untouched by it, untouched except to be glorified. Then they will see Christ "sitting at the right hand of God"—and know that out in that other world their loved ones are safe with him. They will realize again that the abiding things in human life are thought and love and character; they will know that their dear ones have not lost those things which made them dear, but have only laid aside the garment of flesh and gone out into the world of the spirit, their true home, and ours. Most wonderful and blessed of all, they may come to feel, as many have come to feel, that those whom we call dead are nearer to us than ever before—no one knows how near. A young man who recently lost his wife bears testimony that he is sure she knows what he is doing and how he and the children are getting along. May we not find, after all, that the real world is not the world of clay and stones and wood and flesh, but that all the atmosphere and ether are the real abiding places and working places of human spirits, that even the stars are nothing but the golden nails in God's house and that the house itself is all that we call "space," in which there is ample room for all the spirits who have ever lived and shall live hereafter? But at any rate we may know Jesus, Master of life and death, and know that our loved ones and ourselves are safe in his strong and sympathetic keeping. Tell these friends that "his grace is and on Sunday is at church and Sunday school. She teaches a class of young women.

J. F., Indiana. The only answer we can give in the case is that when one is seriously in doubt concerning any course of action—as to its being right or wrong—it is a good, safe plan to leave it alone. If you know that your walnut logs, if sold to certain buyers, will be used in the manufacture of gunstocks for the war, why sell them to these people? There are other and better uses for good, sound walnut. We quite agree with you that it is not desirable to have on a man's conscience the knowledge that he has been making money by supplying weapons to keep up the murderous game in Europe.

R. H. T., Hatcher, Ky. There are many books published on Revelation, the writers of which profess to explain the mysteries of that prophetic work, but none are quite satisfactory, and very few take the same view. The passage to which you refer is one concerning which the day;

Is vanishing swift away.

She sits by the window reading,
And the day that is almost done

And weary and worn with pain,

Like a plant to the fragrant rain.

sufficient" even for their time of bitter anguish. Tell them to come close to him and thus get in closest possible communion with those who have passed out of sight. Tell them he will give them strength to bear this burden of grief, and enable them to lead others to the rest of faith they have found. A further helpful thought is found in the realization that our dear ones are only gone before, not only to prepare a welcome for us but also to create an atmosphere in which, when we come, we shall feel at home because surrounded by those we know and love.

Mr. A. E. Fry, Zeoring, Iowa, writes: "In your issue of July 14 I noticed a short article, giving an account of what was said to be the 'only woman mail carrier.' Ada Pearce of Manhattan, Kan. This is a mistake, as we have a woman here whom I have known personally for about twenty-seven years. Some time in February, 1901, C. N. Thather, her husband, was given the mail route here. He kept the same about one and a half years, when he resigned, and it was given to her in July thirteen years ago, and she is still running the route at twenty-five and one-half miles each day. She has been very faithful, having missed but few days, even through the storms of winter. Mrs. Anna Thatcher is the mother of two daughters. She does all her own housework, there are many conflicting opinions. Revelation should be studied as a whole, and not in a fragmentary way; and to do this satisfactorily, we would suggest that you procure a book on the subject by some well-informed author. We are sending you a note on the subject.

Mrs. W. D. C., Ocala, Fla. 1. The passage in Isa. 8: 12 is preferably translated "a conspiracy," which was an appropriate term for the strange combination of Israel with the Syrian foreigners against Judea, to which Israel was bound by ties of blood and religious association. It was unnatural that Israel, a people of God, should have combined with the heathen Assyrians against their own brethren. The prophet's warning was that disaster would certainly be permitted to overwhelm such a combination. 2. For inquiry regarding John the Baptist see Christian Herald of a recent date.

J. A. A., Seattle, Wash. The views you express are doubtless shared by many others. The questions at issue are discussed from week to week in the Christian Herald.

Reader, Wisconsin. Any one teaching the doctrines you mention is out of place in the Christian pulpit. He should take his philosophies and his convictions to the lecture platform, but certainly should not impose them on people who meet together to hear the Gospel and to learn the way of life. We believe that a Christian, without being dogmatic or quarrelsome, should be ready at all proper times to stand up for his religion, and to give his reason for the faith that is in him. "Whoso shall confess me before men, him will I confess," etc.

J. W. M., New York, sends a kindly note enclosing a contribution for the Christian Herald Children's Home, and adding: "But why is it that there are so many fresh-air excursion and homes for children and almost none for the aged? They are the greatest sufferers in even moderately hot weather." We would be glad to see an effort made by some generous-hearted Christian folks to carry out this suggestion.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. D. J. S., Hillsdale, Mich. The poem not in our collections.

Reader, Fm'enton, Pa. The answer to the riddle you mention was published. It was "a whale."

E. C. S., Maysville, N. C. The whole subject is controversial, and cannot be decided by discussion in the Mail-Bag.

Mrs. F. L. C., Gloucester, Va. There is a statement on the subject, either in the biographies of Grant or Lee, as far as we have been able to discover.

C. M., Knoxville, Tenn. 1. When Jesus drove the money-changers out of the temple, he gave the reason in Matt. 21: 13, Mark 11: 17. He had profaned and defiled it with their merchandise. Their occupations were worldly, and had no proper place in the Lord's house. 2. He taught the doctrine of peace in the most comprehensive sense.

E. S. O., Sea Cliff, N. Y. We are glad to mention again four good books about prayer: (1) With Christ in the School of Prayer, Andrew Murray (Revell); (2) Quiet Talks of Prayer, E. D. Gordon (Revell); (3) Men Who Prayed, Henry W. Frost (China Inland Mission); (4) Wireless Messages, C. N. Broadhurst (Revell).

H. L. D., Lima, Ohio, a reader of the paper, writes telling of the visit of the Liberty Bell to Lima, where 25,000 people greeted it. During the half-hour stop, thousands of school children bearing flags and banners passed in to view the old bell. He concludes his letter with this aspiration: "Would that the old bell were permitted to ring again for world-wide peace from the destructive wars now raging also to proclaim to the world peace and freedom from sin."

J. B. N., Perkasio, Pa., writes: "I think the Christian Herald is a very good paper. I read it first in 1899. Now I am a regular reader. J. B. N. encloses a poem on 'Peace Our Guiding Star,' from which we take this verse:

"God-honored land, where Peace would dwell,
Ensample be to those in war;
There's nothing gained where shot and shell
Are belching forth to kill and mar.
'Tis not the way our peace to sell
Munition-makers to enrich.
Why prostrate in the bloody ditch,
When in our power to mount afar
The way of Peace—our guiding star."

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

MEXICO AN INTERNATIONAL PERPLEXITY

By WILLIAM BAYARD HALE

IRESIDENT WILSON again urges the American Red Cross organization not to abandon its efforts to get food and other necessities of life, together with medical supplies and surgical implements, to the suffering people of Mexico.

Will not President Wilson supplement his kindly most exhortation by mercifully directing that certain other American organizations, namely, the arm and ammunition manufacturers, do abandon the business of sending into Mexico the implements which make Red Cross relief a necessity?

Te President again urges the rival Mexican leaders to compose their differences; he warns them rather vaguely indeed, but still he warns them that they positively must cease their fighting. Will not the President supplement his godly admonition with an order stopping the sending from the United States to these Mexican rival leaders of the gun and cartridges with which alone they can continue to fight?

It is right for the President to appeal, as he recently has appealed, to the American people to contribute money with which in some slight degree to ameliorate the work of destruction and death being wrought in Mexico, may it not be permitted the American people to appeal to the President to contribute, namely—the signature of his name to a proclamation forbidding the exportation from our borders of guns, shells, cartridges and dynamite, with which the destruction and death which he asks us to ameliorate are being dealt out? It is a kind act to supply the Mexicans with antiseptics and lancets, beans and cornmeal, but would it not be wiser to withhold the tools which are killing Mexicans by the thousands and maiming the by the tens of thousands, and bringing famine to a devastated land? If it be right for the United States to concur Messrs. Carranza and Vill. Zapata, Obregon and the rest to desist from their disagreeable activities, must it not be wrong for the United States to furnish them the means with which to flout and defy its reasonable requests?

In the plain mind, it is a little difficult to justify the simultaneous despatch to Mexico of food and cartridges, of surgical instruments and lethal tools, of proclamations demanding peace and train-loads of munitions with which to continue war.

AFFAIRS in Mexico are really pretty bad. Since the night of February 22, 1913, when President Madero and Vice-President Pino Suarez were taken from the National Palace and assassinated by Victoriano Huerta in the darkness back of the penitentiary, there has been nothing entitled to be looked upon as a government. Half a hundred barbed chiefs have been wrestling in a bloody struggle which has swept from Sonora to Yucatan. The miseries of the ravaged country can hardly be described. Anarchy is a word easily spoken, but as an actual state of things very hard really to imagine; it is, however, the condition in which thirteen million Mexican men, women and children have been living for many months. Starvation is a thing impossible, really, in the midst of orderly civilization, to bring the mind to conceive; but the starvation in Mexico.

It grows cheap as we go toward the Equator, and a few score thousand killings may be no great matter down that way. The nerves of the Mexican people are not exquisite; a Yaqui or Zapotecan boy-soldier of fourteen or fifteen will sit on his blanket and smoke a corn-husk cigarette while his torso is probed for a bullet. The cripples and the blind whom one sees by the cityful nowadays down there are not perhaps acutely conscious of their misery. In the best of times twelve of Mexico's millions have never any too much store for the pot. Yet when the frioles and the tortillas utterly fail, and there is nothing but a cactus apple and salt to boil in the olla, when the fields stretch for miles in abandoned aridity, and the peones crouch in the ruins of their huts, hiding from the daily raiders—why, it really seems to the plain mind hardly worth while to attempt to help the afflicted population otherwise than by declining to furnish further tools of affliction.

the war zone; he had mustered an army of 100,000 men on the border for the purpose of meeting any emergency that the war might provoke. In truth, this state of affairs was in no wise different from what it had often been before, for instance when Francisco Madero was in revolt against President Diaz, a year or two years earlier. The United States had not then forbidden its ammunition-makers to help Madero; now, when Madero had become president, and Vasquez Gomez and Orozco were in rebellion against him, the United States Government concluded to forbid them the aid of our ammunition-makers. This our government had a perfect right to do. Moreover, the act was humane and wise.

President Wilson, taking the executive chair, continued the Mexican embargo in force for nearly a year. On August 27, 1913, the President, addressing Congress on the attitude of the United States Government toward the two governments struggling for existence in Mexico, declared that to forbid the exportation of arms or ammunition from the United States to any part of Mexico was to "follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality."

President Wilson declared that he deemed it his duty "to see to it that neither side to the struggle now going on in Mexico received any assistance from this side the border." "We cannot," he continued, "in the circumstances be the partisans of either party to the contest."

However, during the first year of President Wilson's administration, the situation greatly altered. By the end of 1913 there were two chief governments in Mexico: that of Victoriano Huerta in Mexico City and that of Venustiano Carranza in the north of Mexico, with the land in actual anarchy, bands of marauders under petty chiefs riding and raiding throughout the states.

Such being the new conditions, President Wilson saw fit, on February 3, 1914, to lift the embargo and to allow weapons and ammunition to flow across the border. Although he had approved the embargo as in line with "the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality," and had maintained it for a year, he now felt constrained to remove it.

What was the reason, what the justification, for this reversal of policy? It was not, we may be sure, made lightly. There were those at Washington who appreciated the grave responsibility involved in opening the doors into Mexico to the murderous products of our ammunition factories. Was it not throwing fuel on the already wickedly fatal fire? Was it not fostering and encouraging the too prevalent Latin-American habit of violence, giving aid and comfort to revolutionists and promoters of revolution? Finally, was it not putting into the hands of Mexicans arms which might be turned against Americans—a fear to which the result has given a melancholy justification?

THE embargo which the President had first enforced, and then removed, was an embargo equally against General Huerta and General Carranza. When the embargo was in force, the attitude of the United States was one of perfect legal neutrality. It was more than that. It was, on the face of it, humane—for it is humane to

CHARITABLE SUPPLY STATIONS ARE A CONDITION CREATED BY THE "REVOLUTION"

IHAVE nothing to say on the general subject of President Wilson's policy with regard to Mexico. It is not my purpose to debate, or to raise a debate concerning, the wisdom of his course or any step of his course. I restrict myself to pointing out a single undeniable fact: that the chaos which obtains in Mexico is in large measure the work of guns and cartridges made in the United States and exported to Mexico, where they have done their perfect work.

Up to the year 1912, arms had been freely brought into Mexico from the United States. In March of that year, Congress empowered the President to stop the traffic, and on the 14th of that month Mr. Taft, in conformity with the authority conferred upon him, laid an embargo on the exportation.

On the theory (which quite recently has been advanced) that a nation has no right to change its laws of export affecting countries at war, this act was in effect an interference in the internal affairs of Mexico, an interference in behalf of Madero as against his opponents, Vasquez Gomez and Orozco. In my opinion, the Mexican disorders of that time were exaggerated, but in the mind of the Administration at Washington, Mexico was in a state of war. The President had warned Americans to flee the country, to keep out of

FOR WHAT MAY WE PRAY?

A SERMON BY REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.*

TEXT: "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray." James 5: 13.

THESE words, taken by themselves, have a laconic sound. "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray." Pray for what?

I have been interested in the histories of God's saints in the Bible, to see what they pray for in affliction, and I ask you to accompany me in the same reflections for the help it may be to you in those hours of trial that come upon all of us.

First, I found that, judging by their example, we may pray for God to consider our affliction. Listen to David: "Have mercy upon me, O Lord. Consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me." And Jeremiah: "Remember, O Lord, what is come upon us; consider and behold our reproach."

It may be said, Of what use is it to ask God to consider our complaints? Have they not come upon us by his permission? Of what advantage to ask him to consider them? Perhaps no advantage so far as God is concerned, but great advantage to us. Is it not natural to pour our complaints into one another's ears? Do we not find relief merely in relating our tale of woe, even though the one to whom we speak already knows it, and though he may not be able to help us by a word? Alas, that we often tell our complaints to one who seems a sympathizer, who in an hour of enmity uses our confidence against us! Yet for all this we tell our woes, and call upon our neighbors to consider our complaints. How much rather spread the matter before God, a true Friend, "the same yesterday, today, and forever?" Moreover God expects us to do this. He says, "Put me in remembrance; let us plead together." Not that he forgets, but that he would not have us forget! Indeed, what is every command to pray but an obligation to tell God what he already knows? God loves to hear his children's voice and regards with jealousy our making confidants of others to the exclusion of himself.

Knowing That He Careth for Us

A second thing we may pray for in affliction is his presence and support under it. One gathers this from such words as these: "Why standest thou afar off, O Lord? Why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?" And again, "Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble."

Some years ago, a prominent business man of Boston was convicted of embezzlement and sentenced to prison. On his journey thither he was accompanied in the carriage by his pastor, Phillips Brooks. That pastor, able as he was, could not procure the pardon of his friend, nor shorten his term of servitude a single day. Perhaps during that sad journey he did not utter a word that furnished any real solace to the convicted man. And yet who shall say that his simple presence was not a help and an assuagement to his grief, supposing him to have been penitent?

We all know how it is when we are sick. How a child longs for his mother in the room at such a time! She can not alleviate his pain, but she can hold his hand; she can lay her soothing palm upon his brow; she can just stay there where he may see her, and that will be a help!

I would not think much of the Christian experience of one who is unable to interpret this feeling in the language of the spiritual life. Who has not borne affliction when he felt that God could not consistently relieve him of it, borne it almost gladly, if God has given him that delightful sense of his presence and support under it? We have an illustration in the history of Jesus. Compare his words in the night in which he was betrayed with those elicited by the agony of the cross. In the one case he predicts his desertion by his followers and speaks of himself as left alone. "And yet not alone," says he, "because the Father is with me." He could spare every earthly friend if he had Him. Now recall Golgotha, when the Father judicially withdrew that presence, and we hear the melting cry of a breaking heart, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

A third thing to pray for in affliction is our deliverance from it. Listen to the psalmist: "The troubles of my heart are enlarged; O bring thou me out of my distresses." And Isaiah: "Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things, O Lord? Wilt thou hold thy peace and afflict us very sore?"

It may be said, This is something we know without going to the Bible to find out. If there is anything we are sure we ought to pray for in affliction, it is to be delivered from it. But just here we are apt to fall into mistakes the very opposite in character. For example: we are apt to pray for deliverance in the spirit of a demand. We talk as though God ought not to have allowed the affliction, and that, in sheer justice, it should be taken away. Those animated by such a feeling I would remind that oftentimes the greatest curse with which God could visit us would be to answer our prayers. How would Moses have felt had God taken him at his word, when he asked that his name be blotted out of the Book of Life, if the sin of Israel were not forgiven? What a loss to Elijah had God answered him when, disgusted and discouraged with his life, he craved to have it taken away! Was not his translation to heaven worth while waiting for?

Learning Through Suffering

You may have read a story in verse which illustrates this, the story of a young wife whose husband was very sick, and who was told that he must die. In her wild agony she flung herself upon the ground and demanded of God that he be spared to her. "O God," said she, "I cannot live without him! Thou must spare him to me! Take aught else, but leave my husband!" The story runs that the husband's life was spared, but he remained an idiot. It was years afterward that, while wearily enduring his vacant stare, she was enabled to feel, and to say to God:

My Father, thou hast taught me now
To suffer and be still;
And bowed my rebel spirit down
To thy unerring will.

Hast taught me that there is a pang
Greater than death can give;
And punished my idolatry,
Bidding my idol live!

But the other mistake is of the opposite character. I was speaking with a young man who had trials of a domestic nature, and while he was a professing Christian and tried to live a consistent life, still he never thought of praying for deliverance from those afflictions. They had come upon him in a sort of natural way, and he thought he should bear them without question. This sounds at first like dutiful submission. But probing him, I discovered under the guise of a Christian the features of a fatalist. That betrays scarcely the faintest conception of the Fatherhood of God, which prevents a child of his from asking to be delivered from a burden if consistent with his will. Paul furnishes an example here. There was given unto him "a thorn in the flesh," a "messenger of Satan" to buffet him. Thrice did he beseech the Lord that it might depart from him. Was he undutiful in presenting that petition more than once, or in presenting it at all? No; for when the answer came, "My grace is sufficient for thee," he at once exclaims, "Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities." And we have an example in the history of Jesus. Hear him in Gethsemane offer his threefold supplication, that if it were possible the cup might be taken from him. Was he undutiful? No; for when the affirmative answer failed to come, we hear his sweet reply, "Nevertheless, Father, not as I will, but as thou wilt!"

At this point my researches took a different turn. For I found from the histories of God's saints that we should not only pray for God to consider our affliction, or grant us his presence and support under it, or deliver us from it, but that we should pray to know the cause of it. Here we have the witness of Job: "My soul is weary of my life. I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me. Teach me, and I will hold my tongue, and cause me to understand wherein I have erred." We may lay it down for a fact that for all our affliction there is a cause, a cause, I mean, other than a natural one. As Longfellow says:

These severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,

And it were the highest wisdom to ascertain this cause, that by removing it we may honor God by making it no longer necessary for him to afflict us. I ask your attention to a passage in Lamentations bearing upon this truth: "Thy prophet have seen vain and foolish things for thee, and they have not discovered thine iniquity to turn away thy captivity, but have seen for thee false bow and causes of banishment." These words addressed to the people of Judah, carried into captivity by Babylon, and who seem astonished at what happened to them. They wonder how they have been brought to pass, and what is the cause of their affliction. They have false prophets, who are leading them astray, and suggesting various causes, none of which are right. And perhaps Judah is trying to govern herself by them. She is imitating this and that reform, and making this and that move upon the political chessboard, that the result may hasten her hour of liberty. "But no," says Jeremiah; "you are wrong. The cause of your affliction is your sin; never until you turn away from your idolatry will you be turned away from your captivity." It took Judah seventy years to find this out; but cured of her idolatry she was permitted to return to her own land.

There is an important lesson for us here. Sin is the root cause of affliction, and he is a false prophet who advises us to stop short of it in our investigations. I do not say that we are always the authors of our trials; but it is an axiom that if there were no sin there would be no sorrow, and when a certain kind of sorrow comes, it is really a wise prayer that asks to have the sin pointed out and put away.

Like as a Father Pitieth His Children

Finally, we should pray for the divine teaching of our affliction is intended to afford. Listen to Elihu: "Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement; I will not offend any more. That which I see not, teach me: If I have done iniquity, I will do no more." I have remarked that every affliction has its cause, its cause the mind of God. It is equally true that in the same sense every affliction has its object. You recall the words, "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them which are exercised thereby."

It is the part of wisdom to ascertain the true cause of our affliction, but no less so to endeavor that it may work out in us the divine ends. There are few sadder expressions in the Old Testament than God's lament over Israel, "Why need I be stricken any more? Ye will revolt more and more!" It were as though he said: "I might as well remove my rod and allow you to hasten your destruction." The object in such affliction is always to direct us in the way of truth, to make us understand God better, and to live more nearly as he would have us. Happy is he who as the result of it can say with Milton in his blindness:

On my bended knee,
I recognize thy purpose, clearly seen;
My vision thou hast dimmed
That I may see
Thyself, thyself alone.

A Californian told me that the people there paid less attention to religion than elsewhere because there was so much sunshine. The climate is so delightful that they were outdoors most of the time, and their Sabbaths were given to excursions, so that the church was neglected. A less salubrious atmosphere would have been better for their souls. And in the kingdom of God there will be many with cause for eternal gratitude that the sunshine of worldly happiness faded in time to lead them to appreciate "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

There is a big difference between being on God's side and thinking that God is on our side. If we are on his side we can't lose. If we think he is on ours, we may.

Thoughts come to us as strangers for the first time, or as friends who have been present for a long time. If we do not entertain the stranger or the friend they will not remain. Neither will the thoughts if we do not entertain them. The man who has many friends is poor, but the man who has no thoughts is doubly poor.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

The Security of the Heights

SUNDAY, August 29. Psalm 91: 14. "Because he hath set his love upon me . . . I will set him on high." The only moral security is to be found in the heights. The only escape from many things is to be above them. If we meet them on their own level we shall be undone. The principle of immunity is this: salvation by elevation. The deadly chlorine, which has been used in his war with such frightful destructiveness, moves along the ground, closely clinging to it on its fatal errand. It assails the foot-soldiers; it does not reach the aviator, the man with wings! In the realm of the spirit there is a "pestilence which walketh in darkness." It is of the earth, easy, and it steals along the low grounds. It finds its victims among those who are described by our Lord as "from beneath." It has no power over those who have risen with Christ, and who sit with him in the heavenly places. The lofty character carries its own immunity.

Perhaps we have over-emphasized the element of struggle in the Christian life. Perhaps we have proclaimed too vigorously the necessity of fighting our way through serried ranks of foes, and we have said too little about rising above them. Maybe we have not known as we might the power of the resurrection. We have only regarded foot-warfare; we have forgotten the wings! We have counseled men to face their enemies; the Lord is calling us to rise above them.

The secret of security is devout communion with the Lord. We must think less about our foes, and more about our Saviour. We must set our love upon him. Love always moves in the direction of the beloved. That is a spiritual tendency which cannot be broken. If we love the Lord, we surely begin to rise. We enter into the wonder of "the upward calling of God in Christ Jesus." The soul experiences its ascension. We mount up with wings as eagles. And the ground-enemies, the deadly gases which creep along the low levels, have no power over us, for they have been left behind. "Nether shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling."

The Preciousness of Praise

MONDAY, August 30. Isaiah 43: 14-28. "They shall show forth my praise." The word here rendered praise is said to be from the same root as Hallel in "Hallelujah;" and that it means, first, a clear and shining light; next, a sweet flute-like sound; and from this we gather that the people of God are to reflect his glory till it shines from their lives, attracting others to himself and that they are to celebrate his praise in notes that shall arrest and captivate their listeners. We may show forth God's praise by suffering, as much as by active service. To lie still day after day without complaining—satisfied with what pleases him, and resolute to suffer according to the will of God, though no word fall from our lips, may be more provocative of praise than to write psalms, anthems, and spiritual songs.

Be the certainty of the divine progress. "They shall show forth my praise." God's purpose cannot be set aside. If the soul willingly acquiesces, there will be no great strain, no pressure or anguish. Strength will be adequate to every task; the back need not be every burden; the gradient not too steep for the engine. But if there is obstinacy, rebellion, murmuring complaint, like that which so often thwarted God in the history of the chosen people, they will be suffering, captivity and exile; the wanderings in the wilderness, the long delay; and only after years of such discipline will the soul come back to stand again at the gate of Canaan. Hast thou brought thyself into the waste? He will even make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert. Formed for himself, thou shalt yet show forth his praise.

Ideals That Uplift the Soul and the Life

TUESDAY, August 31. Philipians 4: 8. "Whatever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." Paul exhorts the Philipians, as the first essential for character and godliness, to "think on these things" that are admirable as the guiding motives of ministry and service and education. He would say it is of primal importance to watch your ideals, watch your thinking, watch the trend of your imagination.

Elihu Root, speaking not long ago before the Union League Club of Philadelphia, said: "The tendencies of a nation or an individual are along the line of their ideals, consciously or unconsciously held before the mind and will. The difference between men and nations depends upon what they reply to the question, 'What makes life worth while?' Tell me your ideals and I will predict your destiny. Our ideals may recede before our eyes; they may lack much of attainment; but if they are high and we never cease to strive toward them, no failure or loss really counts.

Is our ideal the song of the sword? Then our rewards will be in the terms of the sword or in brute force. Is our chief ideal money? Then we must give up hope of the highest culture of the mind and spirit. The things we admire and imagine, these mold us, these become our masters. We must choose our ideals with thoughtful care, for whether we know it or not, they are our idols and all our worship is colored by them.

Let my imaginations be above the flesh, above the things that perish as I touch them. Let me build up in my thoughts ideals that lift me above the restless surge of my lower passions—then I am safe—then I can walk in the dark and enjoy bright day.

He Reads the Motives, Judges the Hearts of Men

WEDNESDAY, September 1. John 12: 1-11. "Let her alone. Why trouble ye her?" We can imagine the scene. The village amid olive trees and oleanders. The long-drawn shadows of the western sun. The one-storied houses covered by vine-leaves. The spacious apartment with the low tables and couches and guests. The simple provision of bread and wine, and freshly picked fruit. Jews from the city, peasants clustering in the doorway from the neighborhood. The Master and his apostles; Martha with household cares; Mary absorbed in her loving act of devotion; Lazarus newly recovered. Then the breaking of the alabaster box. Judas scowled and talked of waste. Jesus smiled and spoke of everlasting remembrance.

He shields. Whenever you are molested or assailed, look to him, shelter in him, hide in his cleft side, and you will hear him say: "Touch not mine anointed." He approves. It is wonderful that he should account anything wrought by human hands as good; but he looks beneath to the love that inspires and prompts. If he shall ever speak of any of our poor work, what a heaven it will be! It has been so full of failure; the promised crops have been ruined; our hopes dashed with repeated disappointment; and men have either sneered or turned away with open contumely. But if his verdict is good, we shall be more than repaid. He interprets our inward purpose. No one could have guessed what Mary meant by that gracious act; but he knew, and vindicated her. He reads our motives, sees what we put into any act, understands what we hardly dare to say, and before the universe will some day give us credit for it.

What a Master is ours! Let us give crowns for his brow, alabaster boxes for his person, tongues to tell his love!

The Wideness of God's Mercy

THURSDAY, September 2. Jonah 4-11. "And should not I have regard for Nineveh, that great city?" Jonah was told by Jehovah to go to Nineveh, the wicked metropolis of the Assyrian Empire, to warn them of the wickedness of the people, but he shrank from the ministry in a city which was non-Jewish and fled before the face of the Lord, taking ship for Tarshish, the Spain of to-day. The difficulty one encounters in disobeying the inner voice of conscience is manifest in Jonah's experience in the storm that followed. After his trial, Jehovah again commanded Jonah to go as a missionary to Nineveh, and this time he heeded the call.

The Assyrian city repented in sackcloth and ashes, and the Lord heard the prayer of the people of Nineveh, and saved their city from the destruction predicted by the prophet. Strangely enough, Jonah was angry and disappointed that Jehovah should hear the prayers of a heathen city, whose people did not follow the Jewish rites of sacrifice or their manner of prayer. God then shows him the lesson we all must learn if we are to understand the great heart of our heavenly Father, that the children of God are dear to him wherever they live and whatsoever forms of prayer they use in addressing him in their cry for help and forgiveness. Jonah's fault was narrowness. He only wanted to believe in a God who would save by the Jewish method.

We can find God even in the midst of heathen cities, as did Jonah in Nineveh. We can find him in the prayers of those who do not accept our faith, or assent to our creed, or use our forms of worship. We cannot escape from God's presence, any more than Jonah could by taking ship to a foreign land. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold," said Jesus. The great God of love looks not upon the form of our sacrifices. He looks upon our hearts. True repentance before God is the same in every language, it is the same under every name.

May I remember by this lesson that, while my neighbor's creed may differ from mine, the common craving of the human heart is the same, there is but one language of the spirit. May we be kept from Jonah's fault of narrowness, may we see the breadth of the heart of God. May we remember that he hears and answers not our words but our needs.

Of Those Who Have Gone Before

FRIDAY, September 3. I Thessalonians 4: 13-18. "Concerning them also which sleep in Jesus." This expression does not mean that our beloved are unconscious or insensible, but that death will make as little difference in them as sleep does. In sleep the body rests, but the soul continues its activities; so in death, whilst the body passes into dissolution, the immaterial part of us will be with Christ, which is far better; will serve him day and night in his temple, and will enjoy those wider opportunities of knowledge which are not ours as yet. But this is the one point that we care for—we shall find our dear ones to be as they were when we said "good-by."

A widow lady recently approached a minister and requested the loan of the service-book that he used for the burial of the dead. He asked her why she wished for it. She replied: "My own minister's son died in action in France on Wednesday, and my own son was killed yesterday, and I don't want them to be put in the ground without the service being read, so I want to bury them myself with the holy words." When she brought the book back, there was a wonderful look on her face, with gleams of hope and joy. She said, "I found a quiet place yesterday and read the service over them. They are rightly buried now." It was only natural and beautiful that the mother who bore should also bury. But after all, her son is not there; he was already borne into heaven and awaiting her, for God is not a God of the dead or unconscious; all live unto him. Death is an act, not a state; a passage, not an abiding-place; a swift transition from the prison to the palace.

The Scars of Spiritual Conflict

SATURDAY, September 4. John 19: 34. "But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side." Paul said, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." He was branded with the marks of the stoning at Lystra, of the teeth of wild beasts at Ephesus, of stripes at Philippi, of rods three times that penetrated to the bone. Verily, Paul was crucified with Christ. He died daily, like Jesus on Calvary; he was in jeopardy every hour. Paul was proud of his scars; they were the seals, the insignia of his Christ-like ministry. He was the slave of Christ, branded so no one else could claim him.

Every Christian has his Calvary; we die to self and sin; the soul bears the marks of spiritual pain, self-denial, persecution, temptation and tribulation. Spiritual scars are the keenest kind of crucifixion.

Sin brands souls and bodies with a superscription of fallen character, so Satan will know his own. The stamp of iniquity is indelible to all powers except the blood of Jesus. He can reconstruct, transform, recreate the fallen majesty in ruins, and restore his own image where it shone first in glorious manhood.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

THE WAR BREEDERS. Much space has been given in the newspapers to the camp at Plattsburg, N. Y., where about twelve hundred men, many of them prominent in social, commercial and political life, have been receiving military training under the direction of officers of the regular army. Among the prominent persons who thus voluntarily submitted to the restrictions and hardships of military life was Mayor Mitchel, of New York. On Wednesday, August 11, General Wood, commanding general of the United States Army, visited the camp and made an address to the men. He severely scored the policy of "unpreparedness," and made most surprising statements as to what he considered necessary for our country. He recommended compulsory military service, and his whole message indicated a desire to transform our democracy into a military nation. Putting greatest emphasis upon the need for soldiers, he also recommended a great navy. "We want a big navy—perhaps not the biggest in the world, but certainly the second biggest, and as efficient as the biggest." In addition to these statements, General Wood is reported to have made a remark which would indicate that he is completely out of touch with and altogether fails to understand the spirit of true democracy and the principles upon which our republic is based. "I hope," he said, "that you will use your influence as good American citizens, in contrast to the ignorant masses by whom you must not be influenced, to do all within your power to help obtain good, sane legislation for the establishment of an adequate armament." The time has long passed when a public leader can afford to speak of the "ignorant masses." These "ignorant" masses are far wiser than the aristocrats and bankers and politicians who are trying to stir up the war fever in America and drag us into the hell of Europe's wicked and needless war.

NEW JAPANESE FOREIGN MINISTER. The foreign portfolio under the new cabinet of Premier Okuma, who recently resigned, as did Minister of Foreign Affairs Kato, has been entrusted to Baron Kikyojiro Ishii, who is at present ambassador to France, and who by direction of his government visited the United States to investigate the operation of the California law as affecting Japanese residents here, the omission of the Japanese government to reopen negotiations on that subject after Baron Ishii's visit leading American officials to believe his report had been favorable to the American position. Count Okuma is also considered as favoring harmonious foreign relations.

OUR TEMPORARY PROTECTORATE. The republic of Haiti has been taken under the wing of the American government, pending proof that the new president, General Dartiguenave, elected August 12, is able to restore and maintain order. Our naval officers are administering the revenues for the time being, and a treaty to authorize permanent American control of the customs will probably be proposed to the new Haitian government when it has been recognized. The American forces have the situation well in hand.

SKY-HIGH FRONTIERS. The Canadian Government is reported as having complained to the State Department in Washington that American aviators are making a practice of flying across the international boundary and over Canadian territory, in violation of the Canadian order in council, thereby inviting regrettable incidents, as Canadian troops are under orders to keep the air space clear of foreign aeroplanes. In this connection it is interesting to note that a story has appeared in the press to the effect that cellophane, "a tough, transparent, non-inflammable film," invented by a German engineer, is now being employed by his country to make aeroplane wings invisible at a height of 6,000 feet. The story declares that the Wright Brothers rejected this substance without giving it a trial some years ago, and that the United States Government did likewise, and also that it is manufactured by at least one firm in Boston. British aeroplanes are now made almost indistinguishable at the same height by a scheme of splotchy coloring.

PREPARING FOR A MEMORABLE CONGRESS. President Wilson is said to be in active conference with the secretaries of war and navy, drawing up a legislative program in the interests of greater preparedness against war, for consideration by the next Congress. The War Department recently began a canvass of all American manufacturers of war supplies in order to learn their exact productive capacity in an emergency.

MAY ROB WINTER OF ONE OF ITS TERRORS. We should be able to fill our coal bins in the future at a few cents less per family than formerly, as the Interstate Commerce Commission August 12 called for a five to eighty cents per ton reduction in transportation rates from the anthracite districts of Pennsylvania. An investigation found that the coal roads have been making exorbitant profits, over 200 per cent. on the traffic being recorded in the cases of the larger carriers. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western; Lehigh Valley; Erie; Central Railroad of New Jersey; and the Delaware and Hudson, are among the roads affected. A total reduction of $8,000,000 a year in carrying charges is the estimate, which may result in a slight reduction in the retail price of coal.

FIRST ACTION IN EASTLAND CASE. The following four officials of the St. Joseph-Chicago Steamship Company have been indicted on a charge of manslaughter in connection with the Eastland disaster: George T. Arnold, president; William H. Hull, vice-president and general manager; W. C. Steele, secretary and treasurer; Ray W. Davis, assistant secretary-treasurer. On a charge of criminal carelessness, the captain of the Eastland, Harry Pedersen, and Engineer Joseph M. Erickson have been indicted. Bonds were fixed at $10,000 each for the latter two and $20,000 each for the four officials. The fateful boat has been righted, and several bushels of personal property—purses, jewels, etc.—were gathered up; but no more bodies were found in her.

CHINA FOR THE CHINESE—CERTAINLY. A preliminary agreement which the Chinese Government entered into with the Standard Oil Company, for the development of the northern oil districts, has expired instead of becoming a permanent contract, and this failure of the Standard to secure that rich project is taken to mean that Japan will conserve these oil deposits for the China that is to be, namely, Greater Japan.

AKED AND SUNDAY WON'T DO TEAM WORK. If any one has supposed that Billy Sunday and Rev. Charles F. Ake might work together in an evangelistic tour (we have heard of no such supposition), it is now clear that the combination cannot take place. A committee of one hundred of San Francisco's leading clergymen, of which Dr. Ake was one, secured Mr. Sunday for a campaign in that city after the evangelist finishes in Los Angeles, where he is now engaged, and as a protest Dr. Ake resigned from the committee and has denounced Mr. Sunday, his methods, his language, and especially his theology, in unmeasured and almost Sundayesque terms. "He says there is no such 'loathsome Gospel, frightful God, grotesque Christ, fantastic heaven, impossible hell'" as Mr. Sunday preaches. Taking some measure of comfort in the great numbers he has turned from evil living to good endeavor through faith in Jesus Christ, Mr. Sunday declined to do any denouncing in return.

GIVING THE PACIFIC TO JAPAN. Claiming that the La Follette seaman's law, which goes into effect this November, makes competition with Japanese vessels in the Orient trade impossible, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company has begun dissolution by selling five of its steamers for Atlantic service, and its last sailing was booked for August 25. This action, it is said, will leave but one liner flying the Stars and Stripes in trans-Pacific trade, the Minnesota of the Great Northern Steamship Company.

FOR A NEW JEWRY. A time-long project of Jewish leaders through many centuries is taking practical shape in plans adopted in Chicago, August 14, at a meeting presided over by Judge Julian W. Mack, of the United States Circuit Court, when a movement was inaugurated to establish a Jewish nation with a perpetual government. The war is credited with providing the opportunity. A congress of Jews is announced, to be held in Washington next October "to frame a proposal to the American Government."

KILLING A STUFFED GIANT. A news item of the week bears the brave caption, "Winning Opium Fight." It is about time. The opium trust demon is glutted with wealth. It has devoured enough Chinese intellectuals and homes. Since 1863 more than 400,000,000 pounds of the drug have been shipped into China as a result of the first breach in the country's opposition to it, the value of the stuff being close to one billion dollars. After such a commercial orgy, the opium trust can scarcely be "fighting" very hard, and satiation must in part explain the "winning fight" which has reduced the annual shipment of opium into China from around eight million pounds to under one million. While the trade slip away from it, the trust still gleams what it can profit from it, and the value per pound has risen rapidly, the traffic being valued at over $20,000,000.

CHRISTIANITY MOCKED BECAUSE OF WAR. A member of the committee on peace and arbitration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, William C. Allen, who has just returned home from a year's official tour of Asia and Australasia, states to the American League to Limit Armaments that non-Christian Orientals "bitterly deride Christianity, claiming that the religion of Jesus is not able to control the passions of men, has nothing to offer them, and that it is foolish for Christians to go to the Orient to teach them under such circumstances. Mr. Allen finds an offset in part to 'the great spiritual damage done by the war' in the eagerness of many in Japan and China to follow the Gospel. He reports a deep hatred of America in Australia and New Zealand because the United States has not entered the war on the side of the Allies; and he states that 'Australia acquired a military and naval fever when our fleet visited that country some years ago.' "The other Christian people there," he declares, "say they look to America as the only country of the future where civil and religious liberty and freedom from conscription will prevail." (But New Zealand and Australia have not yet escaped the tide of militarism that is so rapidly rising in some of our big newspapers.) "The compulsory drill of school boys in the two countries" (one plan for America now this Christian traveler states, "does not in practice work out well. There have been in Australia alone about 1,000 prosecutions within two and a half years of lads about 14 years of age on account of this drill. Parental authorities had to give way.") per of the bay rising ten feet and backing into the city three feet deep, only the sea wall preventing an inundation with great loss of life and property.

WASHINGTON FIRM AGAINST ARMS EMBARGO. Too late for extended report this week comes word of the latest diplomatic note from the State Department at Washington, in this case addressed to Austria in reply to that country's representatives of June 29 against the traffic in arms kept up from this country under circumstances which, from Austria's point of view, make that traffic unneutral. Secretary of State Lansing, August 12, replied in the plainest terms yet used on this subject that the American Government, on the ground of strict neutrality, refuses to order the placing of an embargo upon the traffic. The note cites past cases in point, and also looks to the future effect upon American safety of adopting the principle that a neutral nation shall sell war supplies to one of two belligerents, in case the other cannot acquire same with equal facility. Fuller notice of this important note must wait upon a later issue.

MORMON CHURCH FINANCES. For the first time in its history, the Mormon Church has published a report of its finances. There are 1,431 Mormon missionaries in various fields, the majority of them men; this work cost $227,900. Membership in the Mormon Church shows a net increase from 1901 to 1914 of 12,983. The Mormon birth-rate is 39.5 per thousand, and the death rate 8.3 per thousand. Last year the marriage-rate was 17 per thousand and there were born 14,717 Mormon children. The total membership of the Church is not given, but it is stated that 319,000 members were born under the Stars and Stripes. The church collected in 1914, $1,887,970 in tithes. It expended on church bursaries $730,960, school maintenance $330,984, and maintenance of the Mormon temples, $64,508. There was given $116,238 to the orphans, with $150,290 additional given by the Mormon relief societies. There are few pauper Mormons: 73 per cent. own their own homes. The general officers of the church do not receive payment from the tithes, but from revenues derived from the church's investments.

CANAL SHOWS RESENTMENT AT GOETHAL'S RESIGNMENT. Brigadier General George W. Goethals, governor of the Panama Canal Zone, has returned north and announced that he will tender his resignation, to take effect in November. Had he scarcely left Panama when big earthslides blocked the Gatun Cut (née Culebra), delaying a score of ships; and although the channel was reopened by August 11 sufficiently to permit ships to pass through, the continuing earth movements threaten to make a personal matter out of General Goethals' leave-taking.

GERMAN PROPAGANDISTS CHARGED WITH OVERT-STEPPING NEUTRALITY BOUNDS. The New York Herald is publishing copies of letters and other documents which have come into its possession, revealing what the World believes is an organized system for creating American sympathy in favor of Germany in the present war, the inspiration and the financial support of the campaign originating in Berlin, according to the World's analysis of these documents. At the time the Christian Herald goes to press the articles have just begun to appear in the World, and do not as yet establish a basis of fact upon which fair deduction and comments can be made. The sensational accusations will be given full notice as soon as the World articles are completed.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; contributor to the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge.

THE operations which culminated in the taking of Warsaw and Ivangorod completely cleared the eastern bank of the Vistula of Russian forces, and compelled a general retreat eastward of all the Russian armies operating in Poland south of Warsaw. It is perhaps needless to describe the details of the German advance along this whole line from north of Cholm to east of Praga, as it would be a mere recital of unfamiliar names, and could not be understood unless closely followed on a more detailed map than the average reader possesses. Suffice it, therefore, to say that nowhere, excepting at one point, the junction of the Bystrelin and Tysmenisa river, just north of the town of Kozk, which is almost directly north of Lublin, have the Russians been able to oppose a serious resistance, even momentarily. At this point they held the advancing Teutons for a couple of days, but ultimately were overcome and hurled across the rivers and to the north of Rodin.

The only point in West Poland remaining in Russian hands is the fortress of Novogeorgievsk, north of the isthla river and Warsaw. This fortress is supposed to be extremely strong and may hold out some time though as it is completely cut off from any communication with the other Russian forces, and all the circle of exterior forts to the east have been taken and at least two of those to the east, it hardly looks as though its resistance could be much prolonged. The garrison here is about forty thousand strong, whose fate will be that of the fortress.

The northeast of Warsaw the German advance eastward has also been generally successful. The railroad from Warsaw to Petrograd has been cut in two places, and practically all the country to the west of the line of that railroad has passed into their possession as far north as Malkin, about half way to Bieloostok. Some isolated places are still in Russian hands, but are surrounded, and their capture is a matter of hours. A general advance to the east and south-east from this railroad is now in progress.

Further north, the important fortress of Lomza was taken by them during the week, and an advance to the eastward against Bieloostok itself has been launched, which as this record closes is reported to have reached the junction of the Bohr and Narv rivers.

Still farther north the fortress of Iwya is practically invested, and apparently will be speedily taken, as in Petrograd reports themselves, the Russians are said to be in process of evacuating not only this fortress but the city of Vitebsk, directly to the east on the Moscow-Petrograd Railway.

In ourland the Russians checked for a time the German advance, but only for a time, since today (August 12th) we are advised that the city of Dunauberg on the Duna has also been ordered by the Russian military authorities to be evacuated. This town is only a few miles to the eastward of any point at which we know there is any German force.

Riga has not yet been taken. The Germans south of Riga, advancing toward Fridrichstadt on the Duna, met superior Russian forces early this week and were forced to retreat from their advanced point, Ekau, to Mitau, but according to late reports are again advancing.

The German troops moving on Riga from the west, along the shores of the Gulf of Riga, have not drawn any nearer the city during the week, and are evidently waiting the conclusion of the naval operations in that Gulf. The Gulf of Riga, though large, has only one comparatively narrow entrance, though vessels of any draught can enter. The entrance to this was occupied during the week by the German fleet, which bottled up the Russian warship in the gulf and sent forward min sweepers to clear the passage of floating and contact mines. The Russians destroyed two of these min sweepers, which incident gave rise to varied rumors of naval action in the gulf.

One thing seems absolutely clear in this eastern campaign: the Russians are not going to make any attempt to hold their second line of defenses, but intend to retire well into the interior of the country.

Another thing that appears possible is that the Germans meditate an attack on Petrograd and Kronstadt, and thereafter, if successful, a movement on Finland. It looks very much as though Sweden would take part in this latter movement. Her anger against Russia is rising and the moment seems favorable for settling her old scores with that power. Also, as soon as the campaign in Poland proper is completed, it seems more than likely that a new kingdom of Poland under the protection of Germany and Austria will be proclaimed, with a descendant of Augustus the Strong, a king of Poland in the old days, on the throne.

The fluctuations of exchange during the past week have been interesting as showing how strongly the tide of commerce has set in in favor of the United States. The pound sterling at 4.74½ has touched the lowest point ever quoted in the memory of living man, and the receipt of the shipment from London of united action by these four countries in favor of the Allies.

During the past week Turkey has ceded to Bulgaria certain territory on her western border, but we are not fully advised as to the extent of the territory nor the conditions of its cession. Also, the German bankers who had made a contract for a loan of $24,000,000 to Bulgaria, since the outbreak of the war, made a second payment on account. These two events would seem, under ordinary circumstances, to preclude the possibility of Bulgaria's joining the Allies; but the present circumstances are very extraordinary and Bulgaria is frankly for sale.

The importance of these Balkan countries to the Allies lies in the effect on the Turkish campaign. The Dardanelles must be opened and relief got to Russia, if that country is to escape being so nearly crushed that she will no longer be a factor in the war; and if this is delayed, even two months more, it will be too late, and if Russia is crushed, or nearly so, the consequences to Italy and the western campaign will be sinister.

The activity in this Dardanelles campaign became much greater a couple of days ago. The Allies made two additional landings, one on a point of the Gulf of Saros to the north of the Isthmus of Balair, which connects the peninsula of Gallipoli with the mainland. Rather heavy fighting took place, and while the Allies succeeded in maintaining their positions they did so at heavy cost. The other landing was on the peninsula itself, and the troops landed were able to make a small advance inland. These landings were accompanied by a general attack on the Turkish lines defending the southern end of the peninsula, resulting in a small gain.

Two air raids of some importance have taken place during the past week, one by the Germans on the east coast of England, and the other by the Allies on towns of Rhenish Bavaria. In both cases several non-combatants were killed. The submarines have been much more active the last few days, sinking over forty vessels.

Jerusalem Grateful for Help

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE

Jerusalem, June 14, 1915.

To the Christian Herald:

I write to thank you, on behalf of some of the most needy Christians of Jerusalem and of the distinctively Christian neighboring Communities—Bethlehem, Beth-Jalah, Beth Sahoor (Village of the Shepherds), Ram Allah and Ain Areek—for the opportune relief afforded by the £600 stg. placed at this Consulate for distribution to the needy Christians of Palestine, by direction of a telegram from Secretary Bryan, which amount, he stated, was sent by the Christian Herald.

I do not believe a similar amount of money was ever more effectively used, or did more good. In this opinion I am sustained by the judgment of the best people of Jerusalem. The very poorest of all the Christian Communities—Protestant, Latin, Greek, Armenian, Syrian, Coptic and Abyssinian—were looked up by competent Committees, and a small amount in cash given to individuals and families.

The present great need in Palestine is immediate relief for the starving. The cry is for bread, and if this cry has been piteous in the past months, it will be much more so in the future, as the terrors of this situation have been intensified by the unprecedented invasion of locusts—a devastating host "more terrible than an army with banners." The destruction of the sources of natural food supply already accomplished is appalling. If this Consulate can be of further use in this connection, please command it.

With assurances of deep appreciation and respect, Most faithfully,

(Signed)

OTIS A. GLAZEBROOK,

American Consul.

BRITISH BATTERY IN ACTION ON THE GALLI POLI PENINSULA

twenty million dollars in gold has apparently, from the quotations, had no effect on the market. The lira has also fallen heavily. Reichmarks remain at 82½ nominally.

The Balkan question still remains unsolved. This deadlock, if solved in favor of the Allies, cannot be solved until the Macedonian question is settled to Bulgaria's satisfaction. A few words about this Macedonian question may not be amiss.

The first Balkan War, in which Bulgaria, Greece and Serbia were allies against Turkey, resulted in a complete victory for them, and by the treaty of peace Turkey ceded, among other territory, practically all of the old province of Macedonia. This territory is inhabited by Bulgarians very largely, and therefore was naturally allotted to Bulgaria in the division of the spoils between the allies. Thereafter, a quarrel arising from the division of the spoils among these allies, Serbia and Greece banded themselves together and attacked Bulgaria. Very possibly Bulgaria could have won even against the two countries, had not Rumania joined in and attacked her on the north. The final result was that Serbia took one part of Macedonia and Greece the other, and Rumania got a slice of Bulgaria in the northeast, on the Black Sea. Now, Bulgaria will not enter into any combination with any of these countries until they restore the territory taken from her, and this only Serbia will consider doing. This is but one of the difficulties preventing

World Citizenship

OVER and over again, the world has to learn its lessons in the great school of wisdom and experience. Today, it is no uncommon thing to hear some truth proclaimed as new which was familiar to the philosophers and moralists long before the dawn of Christianity. "No man is good without God," said Seneca. "God tries a good man; he strengthens him; he prepares him for Himself"—a truth which the teachings of Jesus illustrated and sublimated. The ancients had a clear conception of world-citizenship. "God and nature have made all men related; they are members of one great family," they wrote, "we know that our country is the world." This was the highest view of citizenship. "You are a citizen of the world," wrote Epictetus, "and a part of it. The duty of a citizen is not to consider his own interest distinct from that of others." Plato held that no man is born for himself alone. The Stoics went further and declared that man is born to serve the whole world—that no narrow view of localized citizenship should confine his powers. "As the heavenly benefits pervade the whole universe, so one who seeks to please God must emulate his example in serving all and not his own alone. He must be beneficent as God is beneficent, magnanimous as He is magnanimous." Thus the thought of world-citizenship and universal service was instilled in the popular mind even during the early civilizations, each successive stage having some especial virtue peculiarly appropriate to the demands of the age.

We need to cultivate the world-citizenship principle today. While not forgetting the demands of our own country and people upon our patriotism, we should strive to take the wider view, which includes our whole duty as citizens of the world, and claims our highest allegiance and service. Jesus did not die to redeem the Jewish race only, but that the whole of humanity might benefit by his sacrifice.

Clouding the Peace Issue

FROM a neutral and reasonable point of view, the rumors of peace overtures that reach us by the cable are welcome, from whatever source they may come. After a year of continuous warfare which has kept the whole world at high tension, which has withdrawn untold millions of men from industrial tasks in Europe, and entailed a daily war expenditure of $60,000,000, besides incalculable loss to commerce, it is something of a relief to know that there has even been a suggestion of peace from any quarter. But our esteemed contemporary, the New York Times, in its issue of August 10, takes quite a different view of the situation. Admitting the credibility of the cabled report that Germany has made peace proposals at a "propitious moment"—as Japan did after her victories over Russia—the Times finds "abounding and compelling reasons" why the Allies should decline to listen to any suggestion for peace, whether made to one or to all. It holds that nothing less than the complete subjugation and humiliation of the Central Powers will satisfy their opponents. Peace, to be acceptable to the Allies, it insists, must result from the utter exhaustion of their enemies. This war must go on indefinitely, with its mad waste of human life; otherwise all that has taken place will count for nothing.

It would be hard to conceive of anything more bloodthirsty and irrational than this, which is put forward in all seriousness on the very first occasion when peace has been mentioned as a possibility. It may or may not prove to be true that, under the leadership of Holland, the neutral powers are considering a peace conference; or that Germany has made overtures looking toward mediation by the Pope on the basis of the restitution of Belgium. The one and only thing which discomposes the Times is that there should be any suggestion of peace at all, while Germany remains uncrushed. Therefore, the war must go on; even to the point of utter exhaustion!

We cannot believe that this is the view of Europe; it certainly is not the American view. There has not been a day or a week during many months in which the combatant nations would not have welcomed an honorable opportunity to close this war, which never should have been begun. Its cost in blood and gold has outrun all anticipations. Yet, though the assumption that the Central Powers are nearing exhaustion is purely gratuitous, it fits into the Times' argument, which is designed to arouse false hopes and to cater to the war spirit on two continents. And the Sun and Tribune are equally emphatic in upholding the same dangerous delusion. We believe all the powers are heartily sick of the war, and that, were the truth known, they would all be glad to have it come to an end. It may serve the purpose of the munition-makers and the militarists in America to agitate for its continuance, as their business as well as their plans for creating a huge military and naval establishment here, with every citizen a soldier, would be spoiled by an early European peace; but every sane and unprejudiced American must condemn any such expectation. No one wishes to see our country turned into an armed camp, its colleges and schools militarized, and its citizens of every calling subjected to military duty. And all alike, with the exception of the military coterie in Washington and its supporters in the munition traffic, would be rejoiced to see the great struggle in Europe come to a speedy end, and the world relieved of further sacrifice and suffering.

The Holy Grail

THERE is said to have been great alarm in Italy over the report that the Holy Grail, in the Cathedral of San Lorenzo, Genoa, was crumbling to pieces. The relic is believed by many of the superstitious people of Italy to be the actual cup from which the Saviour and the apostles drank on the night of the Last Supper. It was brought from the Holy Land to Genoa in 1101 by a Genoese commander Embracio, who had discovered it among ruins at Caesarea. In 1807 the cup was carried by Napoleon to Paris, but after his downfall was returned to Genoa. The vessel had been damaged, however, and its broken fragments were pieced together and braced with a gold band.

When it was rumored lately that the cup was in process of disintegration the Minister of Fine Arts appointed a special commission, who reported that the dampness of the vault had caused the cement used in repairing the vessel to become soft and non-adhesive. The vessel is to be again repaired and will be preserved henceforth in an air-tight receptacle.

All this talk and care and interest in such a relic as this seems ludicrous to a thorough-going Protestant. Interest in such externals has helped to make the church blind and deaf to the real facts of the divine life. The presence of God is not to be found in a cup, but in the soul of any man or woman or child who will welcome it. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God and that the Holy Ghost dwelleth in you?" wrote Paul.
